[449] Saint Gregory Palamas, as all the eastern fathers, he isn't against knowing God out of nature, but he knows about another knowledge about God, a higher knowledge, by sight, one that includes the first king of nature. The "sight" of God isn't the knowledge of God through creatures, or through the existing realities, and this is because they who see God in an unmediated manner, they see Him Who doesn't even exist, and that is because He exceeds all the existing realities, namely the creatures.

sick?[450] So, the commandments of God provide knowledge too. And not only knowledge, but deification too[451]. And we achieve this[452], by receiving and by seeing the glory of God within us, into Ghost, when God deigns to introduce us into His mysteries, as the mentioned saint says.

18. For that one said that all the fathers from before him said it, we are going too to except the fathers from after him, and so we are going to present only a few fathers from before him, in order us to see what they say that the glory of God is, a glory that is seen only by the experienced ones, in a mysterious and untold manner. Before all, let's see the eyewitnesses and the apostles of the Only One our Father: Jesus Christ Who any father is named fatherhood (πατρία), in the fullness of the Holy Church (Eph. 3: 15)[453]. And before apostles, their coryphée, Peter, who says: "Not by following to the crafted stories, I have made known to you the power and the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, for we have been made seer of His glory" (2 pt. 1: 16). What glory of the Lord Peter saw it, let another apostle tell us, by saying: "When Peter and they who were with him awakened, they saw the glory of Christ" (Lk. 9: 32). And what was that glory like, let again another evangelist to confess it:

[450] The "sight" of God is endlessly richer than the knowledge is, or it satisfies endlessly more, all the needs of the soul of entering the connection with the reality of God, for the powers of the soul are healed by fulfilling the commandments of God. The fulfilling of the commandments of God is the condition for entering the personal relation with God, and this relation fulfills all the needs of the soul for a consummate communion. In this sense, they contribute to soul's healing. By fulfilling the commandments, our soul accepted the positive dialogue with God, by answering the God's appeal to love. And thus, it is accomplished the health-giver and life-giver dialogue, one giver of meaning, of rationality for the life of the soul. By opening himself to God, by fulfilling God's commandments, the soul not only that hears and sees God, as speaking to the soul from outside, but God dwells within that soul too. A God Who gives commandments, He is a Person-God Who takes the believer, seriously, as person.

[451] Just because fulfilling the commandments means progress in communion, as persons, between believer and God, this fulfilling doesn't only bring a knowledge that is superior to the theoretical knowledge, but it brings also the deification of the believer.

[452] For this deification takes place in the same time with the dwelling of God within believer, it is reflected as the glory of God out of believer. With it, God unveils His mysteries to the believer. This is for the glory isn't empty of content, but it is the richness of God's loving reality.

[453] The father is the one whom our life comes from, and whom our inheritance comes from. In this meaning, the successive fathers who we have within Church, they have received this quality as fathers, from the First Father: Jesus Christ Who we have all the teaching and life from.

"And it shined, he says, His face as the sun, and His clothes became white as the light (Mt. 17: 2).

By that He showed them that He is God, "He Who puts on the light as a coat" (Ps. 103: 2[454]), as the psalm says. That's why Peter too, after he said that he saw "in the holy mountain" the glory of Christ, that light that, thought is sounds strange to the West, it illuminated the hearing too – for he saw there a luminous tent too, which words could be heard out of[455] - after he saw, therefore, this glory of Christ, he says: "And we have more strengthened the prophetic word" (2 Pt. 1: 19). What prophetic word do you have more strengthened, by being you taught by the seeing of the light, of, you seers of God? What else that that saying that God "puts up the light as a coat". "To this prophetic word, you do good that you take heed at it, as at a light that shines into dark place, until the daylight will come" (2 Pt. 1: 19). What day? Of course, that day that illuminated on Tabor. "And until the Morningstar will rise" (2 Pt. 1: 19). What Morningstar? Without any doubt, That One Who lightened him there, where he was together with James and with John. Until this Morningstar will shine, where? "Without your hearts" (2 Pt. 1: 19). Can you see that this light is being shown, now, within the hearts of the believers and of the consummate ones? And can you see how much it exceeds the light of the knowledge? And not only that knowledge from the Hellene teachings, because that one isn't even worthy to be called as light, because of being liar and mixed with lie and close rather to darkness than to light; not only on that one, therefore, but also that one from the godlike Scriptures[456]. This light is so different form the

[454] In KJB we have: Ps. 104: 1-2: "BLESS the Lord, O my soul. O Lord my God, thou art very great; thou art clothed with honour and majesty // Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment: who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain:"; in Rob we have: Ps. 103: 1-3: "Bless, my soul, the Lord! Lord, my God You have extolled Yourself very. // Into shininess and into great adornment You have dressed Yourself up; You Who put on the light as a coat; '' You Who stretch the sky as a tent;" (E. l. t.'s n.)

[455] By stressing the fact that the seen godlike light it speaks too, Saint Gregory Palamas is influenced by Saint Simeon the New Theologian; on the other hand, he highlights the character of that light as person, or that light's feature of manifesting the Person of Christ. In that light is speaking Christ Himself.

[456] Even the knowledge out of Scriptures, because of only speaking about Christ, and it doesn't show Him to us, it is lower than the "seeing" Christ's Person in reality, namely it is lower that living Christ's presence within us. Maybe this affirmation made Barlaam saying that the hesychasts despise the Scripture, by reckoning the Scripture inferior to subjectively living on Christ. But Christ lived by hesychasts, He was, firstly, known and checked through Scriptures. The Scripture and the living on Christ must go together. Neither it produces life light of the knowledge, so that the light of the knowledge likens to a candlestick that lightens in a dark place, while this mysterious light likens to the lightener that lighten during the day, namely it likens to the sun.

19. "But how could he compare, he says, to the sun seen with the senses, if it was godlike?" You, the most speculative of all, don't you know that and can't you understand that it is said to like in an example, not comparatively, that God lightens like the sun does, or above the sun[457]. Even if there shined, during the day, a second illuminator of the same kind with the son, and so the daily would become twofold, each of the two suns, because of shining into so much light, they would become even shinier. So, that one which would shine then, even if it shined like the sun, because of overwhelming the sunlight, it would no longer shine like the sun, but more than the sun. Thus, even if we spoke about Him, by using the comparison of the resemblance, there wouldn't be equality. But because we only compare Him through example, it will be obvious that He won't have any resemblance of same honor. But we have proven, as much as we could, in our "Word about the Godlike Illumination and about the Holy Happiness", that that light shown on Tabor to the chosen ones amongst Lord's disciples, it isn't either sensitive or intelligible in a proper sense.

20. They who fight against this light and against this enlightenment, they also say that al the lights shown by God to the saints, all those lights are symbolic contrivances and riddles for some immaterial and intelligible things, shown out of oikonomia and through contrivance, according to the circumstances of each moment. In order they to prove that, they say lies about Dionysus the Areopagite, by presenting him as in accordance with them, though Dionysus limpidly declares that the light that surrounded the disciples at the godlike Transfiguration, it will lighten us, endlessly and ceaselessly, in the future age, with all-shiny rays, as ones who will be then, according to the promise, always with the Lord[458]. What this - the reading of the Scripture without living on Christ, nor it is possible living on Christ without knowing Him out of Scripture.

[457] Something else is the comparison and something else is the example. The comparison represents the same thing on two stages, one more potentiated or less potentiated than another; or it presents some resemblances and differences between two things which are on the same plan. The example is a sensitive image of a unsensitive reality.

all-shiny and godlike, always and truly existent and unchangeable – light won't cease like? Since it is a known fact that all the symbols and riddles, contrived according to specific circumstances, they occur and disappear, and now they are and after they no longer exist, or, better said, they appear on occasions but they almost never exist in a proper sense, what it won't - that all-shiny and all-godlike light - cease like, to eternally exist both in proper sense and in changed sense? Will be able to declare the sun – the sun it actually is the shiniest in the world of the sensitive things, btu the sun started existing through changing and it is submitted to several changes during each year, and it is impeded, by many bodies, to penetrate them, and that now is eclipsed, now hides, and on occasion even obeys the commandments of the saints and so the sun is forced to interrupt its movement and then to start it again – will we declare this sun and its light, as existent and subsistent, and that light "which there isn't any change or any shadow of movement at" (Jas. 1: 17), as the shininess of the body that is partaker to God, of that body that is riche in the glory of the godhead and conveyer of the godhead, that light that is the beauty of the future and non-passing age, will us declare that light as symbol and non-subsistent contrivance? We won't do that, as long as we will love that light.

21. This light was limpidly called by Gregory the Speaker about God, and by John Chrysostom, and by Basil the Great, as godhead. "That light, I am saying, it is the godhead that showed itself, on the mountain, to the disciples"[459]. Or: "The Lord showed Himself shinier than Himself, when the godhead showed its rays"[460]. Or: "This power will be shown, shining to them who are clean in their hearts, through the worshipped body, as through a glass lamp"[461]. So, this glory wasn't only of the body, but it was of the godlike nature, that united in One of its holy Hypostases, with that worshipper body, it poured into him the whole its godlike glory and shininess[462]. That's why

[462] Not a part of the godlike nature of the Word dwelled into His body, but the whole one. This is for, He has become the whole hypostasis of the human nature, as He also bears the whole human nature. Of course, He covered it through the humbleness of the descent. And we cannot receive that either at once or gradually. To be noticed that the glory or the light irradiates into the concrete matter out of the godlike Person, and it have been made accessible

Makarios the Great calls it as the glory of the Ghost[463]. How one can say, therefore, that the godhead, the shininess, and the glory of that above-being nature[464], now it is, and not it is not, coming and passing, appearing and disappearing, not hiding itself from the worthy ones, but passing into inexistence, as the fantoms, as the symbols, as the riddles, and as many as are told by these daring people, who present also those who oppose them, as agreeing them? They understand the godlike Dionysus and Maximos, and they do that while not noticing the fact that the wise one in the godlike knowledge, Maximos, he has called the light from the Transfiguration of the Lord as "symbol of the theology" (of the godhead) in the sense that we are shared with it according to our measure, but that light also directs us towards something even higher (αναλογιχως χαι αναγωγιχως)[465].

22. The fact that all the realities which subsist and which are produced, they are called in the analogical and anagogical theology, commonly as symbols, Saint Maximos could call, as well, this light as symbol[466]. That's why he also entitled those words as "contemplation" (θεωρία)[467], as also Gregory surnamed to us through the Person of the Word become man. Withing any person, there is an inexhaustible spring of life and light, by the connection the person stays in with God, according to the person's nature. But the endless thesaurus of life and of light of the godhead, it is wholly and in an unmediated manner lived by Christ not only as God, but also as man. And we feel this whole thesaurus of Christ, even if, from another point of view, it is not wholly communicated to us. We live it as whole into Him, when we are in connection with Him, but not as become wholly ours.

[463] About Love 21; G.P. 34: 925 C.

[464] "Τήν υπερονσιότητος εχείνης". This term is taken from Dionysus the Areopagite.

[465] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Ambigua; G.P. 91: 1160, 1125 A. At the holy fathers the term "analogical" didn't have the scholastic meaning from later on, as knowledge "by analogy" to the created things, but it had the meaning as knowledge and receiving of God "according to the measure" of him who knows God and receives God. And the meaning "analogical" is opposed, at the fathers, on one hand, to the literal meaning of the word (Scripture), and on the other hand, it is opposed to the allegorical meaning. While the allegory uses something that hasn't existed or it doesn't exist, in order to indicate a godlike meaning, the anagogical interpretation sees a higher meaning in something that exists. So, Saint Maximos called the Transfiguration as "symbol of the godhead" in the sense that through it was shared the godhead "according to their measure" to the disciples who were there and that it hinted to something higher than itself, namely to the godlike being.

[466] All the existing realities are and are called as "symbols", in the analogical and anagogical theology, namely in that theology that shows their connection with the higher godlike content, which we are imparted with on the measure of our spiritual advancement. That's why Saint Maximos could call the light from Tabor as "symbol".

[467] The most explanations given by saint Maximos in Ambigua are called as "contemplations", for he finds in diverse types from the Scripture or from nature, a higher – or anagogical – meaning.

the Theologian, he called "contemplation" the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil[468]. Saint Maximos declared that light as Symbol of the godhead, due to his contemplation that looked at the higher realities. But that didn't mean to him as contrivance and inconsistent symbol. This is for, the godlike Maximos declares Mose and Elijah as "symbols", on as symbol of the judgment and another as symbol of the Providence[469]. Did he do that for those weren't really present, but they were symbolically contrived? But Peter? Isn't him symbol of the faith to him who wants to contemplate him, by elevating him on a higher level? Or, aren't: James a symbol of the hope and John a symbol of the love? And Christ Himself, on Tabor, "He showed Himself, as the same Maximos says, them who can follow Him, in the image of God, which He was created in before the world existed", isn't Him a symbol of the ascension through all virtues?

Can you see what that light was, that surrounded the disciples there? In that light, the chiefs of the apostles saw God transfigured, and they "were moved form body into Ghost before finishing their life into body"[470]. Do you see that it wasn't seen, that light, through the senses, before their sense were transformed by the Ghost? That's why too, that light couldn't have been seen by those who were nearby, despite it shined more powerfully than the sun. Thus speaks, therefore, this one.

23. And the Great Dionysus calls this light as simple, shapeless, above-nature, namely above all existing realities[471]. Therefore, how could be submitted to the senses, or symbolical, such a light?[472] So, by wanting him to write about that light, as

[469] Ambigua; G.P. 91: 1168 C.

[470] "They were moved from body into Ghost, before finishing their life into body". So, while remaining into body, their life into body were overwhelmed by the works of the Ghost. Their body was filled up by the Ghost Who gave them the power of seeing, even through their senses, the realities which are above senses. This expression belongs to Saint Maximos the Confessor, Ambigua; G.P. 91: 1125-1128.

[471] Here is being repeated the fact that not only the godlike being, but also the godlike light, they both are above what can receive the attribute as "existing". This is because of that attribute being characteristic to the creatures. One can see from here that in the Orthodox teaching, the apophatic isn't simply non-experienceable, in the sense of the negative intellectual theology. The apophatic is being experienced but though it is above what "exists", what is thought, and what is expressed.

a mysterious seer and as a sure knower and as a servant of that light, he says: "Our godlike advisers taught us for the present life, in a sensitive manner, the intelligible realities, and with the help of the existing realities, they taught us the realities from above-being, and, through a multitude of divided symbols, they taught us that above-nature and above-shape simplicity. But when we become incorruptible and immortal and when we reach that all-happy and into the image of Christ state, then we are always with Christ, full of his showing through all-luminous sights; this is for His showing will bath us in all-luminous flashes"[473]. Can you see that this light is above not only to senses, but to all existing realities, and that this light is above-nature?

24. Now we look sat this light by senses and divided symbols; but then, us by reaching above these, we will look at the eternal light in an unmediated manner, because of not being there, in the middle, any curtain[474]. This was said, clearly, by the godlike interpreter of these things: "Now, he says, we see as through a mirror and in riddle; but then, face to face" (1 Cor. 13: 12). By saying "now", he showed that sight that is possible and according to our nature. But him, by surpassing this one, and by being elevated above senses and above mind (above understanding), he saw the unseen realities and he heard the unheard realities (2 Cor. 12: 4), and he received withing himself the earnest of the second birth and of the sight related to it. That's why too, he said: "I know", for I heard and I saw. He reckons this as a work of the mind. But again, he says that he doesn't know if he was mind or body that what felt. So, this feeling is above feeling and mind (above understanding). This is for, when any of those works, and the fact that any of these works, one feels it and understands it. That's why he adds: "God knows", for God was The One Who worked then. And he reached above-man, through his union with God, and so he saw the unseen realities through The Unseen One Who, realities which, without descending from that above-feeling sphere, they became seen.

[473] About the Godlike Names; G.P. 3: 592 BC.

[474] Though during the prolonged prayer, the godlike light is sometimes seen in an unmediated manner, by and large, during the earthly life, tis light is seen through creatures as symbols. Only in the future life this light will be seen, ceaselessly, in an unmediated manner.

25. So, neither the Great Dionysus declared the sight of the eternal light as a sight submitted to the senses, when he said that that light can be seen, for he said that that light can be seen only by them who are in the image of Christ[475]. You will find out that in other places too, he calls as visible that light that is above-feeling. "This is for, if the freedom of the understanding creatures wanted to jump, daringly, over the borders of what it was given to them in order they to receive it with measure, they wouldn't obtain anything except those ones of the light; and they would even lose what it they were given with measure"[476]. Therefore, if the sight of the understanding beings isn't separated from that sight that is above-feeling, thought it is visible, what won't be above-senses for, the sight of them who have reached to be in the image of Christ, even if it is visible? But that seen showing of God, it is not only above senses, but it is also above mind (above understanding). So explains Saint Maximos too: "The Ghost, he says, it gives us then, through deification, the ceasing of all natural works of the body and of the mind, so that God is The One Who shows Himself through soul and through body"[477]. So, both the mind and the body they receive the same light, each one receives that light according to itself, but in an above-senses manner[478]. "The seen showing of God" and "the above0mind union", which Dionysus speaks about, they do not differ at all. Besides, since [475] About the Churchly Hierarchy 7: 2. G.P. 3: 553 D. That light is "seen", but it is not sensitive. This contradiction is reconciled by the fact that that light is seen by them who are reached in the image of Christ. This is for, Christ as embodied God He "sees" the above-feeling realities, by experiencing those within Himself. The "sight" of this light means, therefore, to experience it spiritually. Saint Simeon the New Theologian says: "We will become limbs of Christ, if Christ becomes our limbs. Christ becomes my hand, He, my leg…oh, I the miserable one; and the hand of Christ, and the leg of Christ, they are me, the sinner. I move my hand and my hand if Christ whole… I move my leg, and behold that my leg lightens like Him" (Hymn 15; Hymnes, quoted edition, tome I, Sources chrétiennes, no. 156, p. 287).

[477] Theological Heads 88; G.P.: 1168 A.

[478] Another paradox: the godlike light is seen after all the works of the senses and of the mind cease. Consequently, as it is not felt in a natural manner, likewise it cannot be understood in a natural manner. That light is seen throughs senses and it is known through mind, for within those it dwells a power that is above the natural powers of theirs. Still, the senses and the mind impropriate that work that is above their natural works. So, they experience the seeing and the understanding of that light. This is for, that light is given to them, and they do not conquer that light. And for they are given that light, they are given also the power of receiving that light. One person's openness towards us, it gives us the power to know that person. All the more is so the Self-giving as a gift, of the godlike Person.

we won't need air and space there, as they tell us the speakers about God, what will we need like the sensitive light?[479]

26. But Paul by reaching into God and by seeing the unseen ones of God, into ecstasy (in the going out of himself), did him see the being of God? Who would dare to say that? Likewise, they who are clean in their hearts through appeasement (hesychia), by being found worthy of seeing the unseen realities, the being of God remains untouched. They who are found worthy of this sight, they mysteriously receive the teaching about it too, and they cogitate about it. Thus, they are imparted with the gift of the intelligible light of God, with their mind liberated of passions and immaterial. But they know, in the same time, that the godhead is above even to these sights and above the knowledge coming from these sights. And thus, this above-mind knowledge is superior to the mind's knowledge. They do not reason about God out of the fact that they do not see God, but through itself the sight, they see what is above seeing; by experiencing, to say so, the exceeding of all realities, and not by cogitating it[480]. As experiencing and seeing the godlike realities is something else than the affirmative and superior to it theology, likewise experiencing the disappearance of all realities it is something else and it is superior to the negative theology, because of the overwhelming of what is seen and cogitated, by the spiritual sight[481].

[479] Saint Gregory of Nyssa, About Soul and Resurrection. G.P. 46: 104 C. The sensitive light will be overwhelmed there, entirely, by that above-senses light, as the air and the space will be too.

[480] The speculative theology, either it is affirmative or it is negative, it isn't a theology of the sight. The speculative theology is born right out of not seeing God. They who see God, they do not need a speculative theology. They too make an apophatic theology, or a negative theology (better said, a theology of the untold), but their theology isn't born out of not seeing God, but it is born out of the fact that even through seeing they know that God is above sight and above understanding. The seen itself is unseen, the know itself is unknown, from another point of view. They do not cogitate at removing all the existing realities (of the known world), but they experience them through seeing what is above them. They see that God isn't anything of the realities which can be seen, understood, and expressed on the plan of the world.

[481] The sight of God is superior to the rational affirmative and negative theology. It is the experiencing of the godlike reality, and does not mean inventing or supposing the godlike reality, with the cogitation, with the mind, or with the imagination. It is superior to the negative theology for the disappearance of all realities isn't forcedly produced by thinking, but because all the created realities and their ideas are overwhelmed or covered by the real sight of the light above nature. This apophatic is an endless plus, and it is not a minus in comparison to the realities known through senses and rationality. The unseen isn't simply

Is somebody saw the sun's disk in a mirror, more luminous than the sun from up in the sky, so that his sight was overwhelmed by the lightning of that disk, of course that he would see, by exceeding, also the unseen archetype, and not by seeing it but by unseeing it. Likewise, they too who are found worthy of that all-blessed sight, not by negation, but through that above-seeing-sight into Ghost, they know this deifying work; all the more they know Him Who produced this work[482]. They who learn from those ones, though, they are imparted only with the mental gift (the intellectual knowledge) of the light, and they can ascend towards God through negation; but they to obtain such a sight, and through that sight and with that sight they to see what is not being seen out of God, it will be impossible to them, if they do not reach also that above-nature, spiritual, and above-mind union[483].

27. This is for, Stephen too, as Gregory of Nyssa says, "not by remaining in the human nature and power, he sees the godhead, but for he is mixed with the grace of the Holy Ghost; thus, through what is alike he sees the alike realities, as the Scripture confesses (Ps. 35: 9[484]; 1 Jn. 3: 2). This is for, if the glory of the Father and of the Son had fitted in the human nature and power, he who declares the sight as non-comprised, he would have lied. But that one doesn't lie to us and the history is real"[485]. Was that the feat of the human nature? Or it was the feat of some angel who elevated the human nature - that was crawling down - at that heigh? Not at all. Because it wasn't written that Stephen, by having much power, of by being filled up with the angelic help, because of that he saw what he unseen. The unsees is seen; the non-understood and the unknown are experienced more intensely than the seen and known realities on the plan of the created realities are.

[482] Through the above-seeing-sight the spiritual people know the deifying work, so they know it as active seeing within them. Right because of that, they know that it that light works the godlike Subject, or the Person Who produces this working sight. He is especially known the Holy Ghost. The apophatic is an unmediated relation with the Person of the Holy Ghost.

[483] This means that are partaker to this sight only they who reach the union with the godlike Subject. They who only hear about this light from them who have this sight, they only can reach knowing God through the affirmative theology or through the rational negation.

[484] In KJB we have: Ps. 36: 9: "For with thee is the fountain of life: in thy light shall we see light."; in KJB we have: "For at You is the spring of the life, into Your light we will see light." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[485] Word no I at Saint Stephen; G.P. 46: 171 B. God was seen through God. It is a union of subjects. The godlike glory doesn't fit in the human subject, but the Subject of the godlike glory, God Himself, He comes with the godlike glory within the human subject.

saw, but it was written that Stephe, for being full of Holy Ghost, he saw the glory of God and The Only Begotten Son of God (Acts 7: 55). "This is because of not being able to see the light, says the prophet, he who doesn't look out of light"[486]. And if we see in the parental light, into the Ghost, the Son as light, it will be obvious that we will be having an unmediated union with God and a communication of the light from there, and not a transmission of that light through the mediation of the angels. Our philosopher, though, he doesn't admit that, and he reckons that the Great Dionysus teaches as he teaches too, and this is because the philosopher doesn't understand the meaning of the theology of this speaker-about-God.

28. It is right that the Great Dionysus says, by discovering the cause of the name angel, he says that "many views are shown to us through angels"[487]. But he doesn't' say that all the godlike showings, or all the unions, or all the illumination, all of these would be done through angels.

This is for, by saying that that all-extolled doxology was conveyed to the people on earth at the birth of Christ, by a great army of angels, and that the angels heralded the birth to the shepherds, as they were cleaned through a withdrawn and quiet living, he doesn't say that the glory of God that illuminated the shepherds, it was conveyed too, through angels[488]. But the glory that was illuminating the shepherds, it hadn't unveiled the mystery of the salvation to the shepherds, and, on the other hand, because of being the shepherds engulfed by fear, because they weren't accustomed to such visions, the angels heralded them what the showing of that light meant. The Virgin Mother too, She was announced by angel, that She will take God in Her womb and She will give Him birth according to the body, but God's union with Her hadn't been made through angel[489]. But we must say that here too, neither Her was taught through the union itself, but there was needed a heralder to herald that. But what we would prolong this discussion for, because himself that one says limpidly that "through the same union from above, which are imparted with, also the angels who are worthy of the knowledge that is above the angelic knowledge, the mind which have reached in the godlike image is united too, like the angels are, when any work of the mind it ceases"[490]. Or: "As, according to the opinion of the knowers into our holy mysteries, being one filled up with the godlike realities in an unmediated manner, it is a more consummate thing than being imparted with them through other people, likewise I believe that the unmediated impartation of the angelic groups, which are elevated through them at God, it is more intense than the impartation of those which are consummate through mediation"[491]. Zachariah sees one of the first angels which stay around God, as the Great Dionysus teaches us too[492]. And Hezekiel says that "this law was established in a total holly way by Himself the all-extolled Godhead that thrones on Cherubs"[493].

29. Thus, not only at angels, but within us too, there take places visions about God, and not only mediately through others, but also unmediated visions which do not pass from them who are in the first row to them who are in the second row, through transmission. This is for our Lord is the Lord of the lords, so that he isn't submitted to the laws of the creation. According to our holy teachings, Gabriel is the first and the only one introduced into the mystery of the untold descent (kenosis) of the Word, though he doesn't belong to that angelic group placed in the first row and around God in an unmediated manner. He must only be the beginning of the new creation. This is for, He Who descended for us all the way down to us, He has made everything new (Apoc. 21: 5; 2 Cor. 5: 17)[494]. That's why, by elevating to heavens the angels who are on the lower levels, and especially on those who are from around the world, it makes those angels, as Saint Cyril says, illuminators and accomplishers of the group from above[495]. Thus, these angels can command them who are on a higher level, to "lift up the eternal gates", and they can teach the angels from a higher level that He Who has put on a body, for His endless love for people, He is going to enter and to sit above all principalities and powers (Eph. 1: 21). He is the Lord of the Powers and the Emperor of the Glory (Ps. 23: 10[496]), and He can everything, so that He ca elevate the last ones above the first ones[497].

They only can do that through the union with God. Likewise, the people dop not reach that knowledge except through the same union, by imitating the angels and by being they imprinted by God.

[494] In the fact that God can enter both the unmediated and mediated communication with the people, through angels, or with the angels which are on inferior levels, it is shown God's character as free Person. The communication of His life isn't being done as the involuntary emanation out of an impersonal sun, as in the Neoplatonic conception, and whose power weakens on the measure we get farer from the source, and which constitutes ever weaker degrees of existence, and of the measure they are mediated by increasingly numerous superior levels. The accusation of Neoplatonism that sees the light of God as a weakened emanation of God's being (απόρροια), accusation which Palamas was charged with, in the quoted issue of the Dominican review "Istina" (p. 276), it is an unjust one (See the article published by Jean-Miguel Garringues o. p.: L'énergie divine et la grâce chez Maxime le Confesseur).

But, before God's showing into body, we haven't learnt about such things at angels, neither at prophets, except at them who described, from before, the future grace[498]. But, for This One shows Himself now, there is no longer needed that all the things to be committed through mediation[499]. This is said by the Great Paul too: "Now, he says, it has been made known, through Church, to the principalities and to the masteries, that of-many-kinds wisdom of God" (Eph. 3: 10). Likewise says, the coryphée of the apostolical group, Peter: "The things which you have been heralded now, through them who heralded us through the Holy Ghost sent from heavens; towards those the angels from heavens want to look at" (1 Pt. 1: 12). The smaller things being thus made as the greater through grace, it is still maintained the order of the good organization in undiminished and wonderful manner.

30. He who has unveiled us the angelic names[500], he has clarified and he has taught us, as good as one can get, also the reason why the angels were brought and called to existence in

[496] In KJB we have: Ps. 24: 10: "Who is this King of glory? The Lord of hosts, he is the King of glory. Selah."; in ROB we have: Ps. 23: 10: "Who is the Emperor of the glory? The Lord of the powers, This One is the Emperor of the glory." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[497] The supreme proof of the same character as Person and of the same freedom, it is, though, the fact that God makes Himself man and so God elevates the man who is reckoned as the last one in the hierarchy of the rational beings, and God elevates the man endlessly above everyone, for God is the Emperor of the powers and of the glory.

[498] Before the embodiment there reigned the law, but the law of the hierarchy, at its turn, it was wanted by the God-Person, because of the man's falling, and not because of the nature constituted of gradual layers of existence. That's why the law was given through angels (Acts 7: 50; Gal. 3: 19; Eph. 2: 2).

the beginning. And the fact that the angel who was entrusted with the mystery of the Word's descent to us, though he was an army leader, he wasn't amongst them who are placed, in an unmediated manner, around God, you can find out that fact as it was told by prophets. This is because, actually, this angel is on occasion called by another angels who has a higher rank, as by a commander, and he hears being told him, commandingly: "Interpret him the vision" (Dan. 8: 16). We must notice here too, that that one doesn't say: "Teach him the vision", but he says: "Interpret him the vision".

By and large, you can see that the gift of the knowledge is most often given through mediations, but the visions of God most often show themselves in themselves. That's why the Scripture says, that in the time of Moses too, the imprinted law was given through angels, but the seeing of God wasn't. But the interpretation of the seeing was given through angels. And through the mysterious visions are shown diverse things: existing, future, sensitive, intelligible, material, immaterial, superior, inferior, and of other sorts. And each of them is unveiled differently, according to the power of them who see the visions, and according to the purpose of God.

And itself the showing of Him Who is beyond all realities, it illuminated for other and other reasons and with other powers, within the holy dwelling places, or in other places, to them who were elevated up to those ones, or to the prophets, as the Great Dionysus says[501]. This is the truth, despite the fact that this philosopher called himself blind and he thrown himself, as a blind man, upon everyone without discernment, or better said he didn't know everything, but he asks us who preach, as much as it is possible, about the eternal light, to count up the chariots (4[502] Kings 2: 11) and the wheels (Jez. 1: 15, 21; Dan. 7: 9) and the spears and the other things of this sort, as they would have been honored equally as the light of the future age is. Hasn't him head from the Holy Scripture not even that "then the godlike nature will be to us instead of everything"[503], so that he to believe, on the ground of that, that that light belongs to God?

31. Actually, nobody saw God (Jn. 1: 18), neither will somebody see God; neither man, nor angel. But this is for there is angels and man who see sensitively or intelligibly (αισθητως η νοητως). This is for he has reached to be ghost, and by looking into Ghost how will he not see alike with alike, according to the words of the speakers-about-God?[504] But also to the seeing into Ghost, that light that dwells above all realities, it appears to still be totally hidden. This is because, which amongst creatures could comprise within itself the endlessly strong power of the Ghost, so that through it to see everything that belongs to God?[505] But what I am saying about that hidden? Even the shininess of that light, which has in a strange way (paradoxically) as matter (as means) the sight of him who looks, by getting bigger that spiritual eye and by making that eye able to comprise increasingly more of that light, just that light, they say, it won't ever end lighting up that eye with ever shinier rays and to fill that eye up with an ever more hidden light, and that light to unveil though itself, to that eye, things which have never been seen before[506]. That's why the speakers-about-God they call this light too, as endless. Through this light, when any power of knowledge ceases, God makes Himself known to the saints, uniting Himself, through the power of the Ghost, as God with gods, and being seen by these ones. This is for, through the impartation with the Highest One, they are changes too towards what is higher, and, we to say with the Prophet: "moving their strength", the stop doing any work of their soul and of their body, so that it will no longer shown, and it will no longer seen through them except That One, because of being overwhelmed the natural features

[505] Which creature can comprise in itself the whole power of God? To which created power it can become internal the whole godlike power?

[506] It will be open the perspective of an eternal growth in the knowledge of the light of the love of God, or of the impartation with that light. This is not only for that light will emit, out of itself, ever shinier rays, but also for the feeling of the spiritual eye of him who sees or feels, it will be ever more accentuated in its capacity of seeing that light, through the ray of the light that penetrates the spiritual eye. Thus, that eye that sees, it won't be only a subject of the vision that is shown to it, but that eye will also be a matter which the sight makes it ever more seer, and more transparent. The wood not only fuels up the fire, but it is also continuously adapted by fire in order to fuel up the fire more intensely. Seeing that light is, paradoxically, or contradictorily, also an act of the man, but also a matter of the seeing of that light. Of course, here is about a wood that won't be consumed by fire.

by the abundance of the glory[507]; "in order God to be everything in all things", as the Apostle says (1 Cor. 15: 28). This is for, by being sons of the comforting, we will be also sons of God; "and like the angels of God in heavens, who always see the face of our Father Who is in heavens: (Mt. 22: 30; 18: 10), as the Lord says.

32. That's why the Great Dionysus, at his turn, by saying that: they who have reached that blessed state and in the image of Christ, they will be filled up with the seen showing of God"; and he adds up, a little further on: "into a more godlike imitation of the ghosts from above skies"[508]. And further on, by mentioning also the unions of the angels with God, unions which are characteristic only to the angels who have been found worthy of exceeding the angelic knowledge, namely to the good angels, given that that knowledge is a gift or a good received from the all-shiny kindness, he continues saying that "also the minds (νόας) of the people reached in the image of God, those minds are united too, alike to angels, with this light, and those minds extoll this light by denying all realities, but those mind learn not by negation, but by union with that light, that that light is in a supra-existential manner, above all realities". So, through the union with this light that is above all realities, and that exceeds all existing realities, they who reach that union they learn that that light exceeds or it is above all creatures, namely not out of removing all realities, but, due to that union, they see that all realities are removed[509].

[507] This was said, somewhere, by Saint Maximos the Confessor. God alone sees and He is seen through them. But the man impropriates the sight of God as it would be his own. But Saint Maximos discerns, though, between the productive and the receptive or experiencing sides of the knower power (Opuscula theologica; G.P. 91: 33). The last one remains within saints in tehri states of ecstasy and in the future life. According to the teaching of the holy fathers, somewhere it disappears the border between the understanding of the godlike realities and seeing those realities. Between two persons who understand one another, there is also a certain spiritual touch. But this touch becomes even more conscious and more intense within them who are spiritually advanced. That's why the godlike light is called also as intelligible light or as understood light (νοητον), but also as seen (ορατόν). They who see this light, they see it through an understanding, they who understand this light through a "sight", or through a touch of it by their mind. In this sense, this light isn't material and it has no image.

[508] About the Godlike Names 1: 4; G.P. 3: 592 BC.

[509] Ibid 1: 5; G.P. 3: 583 BC. Those minds which have reached alike angels and in the image of God, by being united with the godlike angels, those minds herald that light to others by using negative terms, but experiencing that light isn't something negative, for there is a union with that light. The intellectual apophatic is only a matter of describing by using words. In reality, the apophatic is a positive experience. Still, the union with the light is, in the same

Thus, also this union is above and outside all realities. That's why, one can say about this light that it doesn't' exist, in sense of exceeding (μη ον, καθ υπεροχήν εστιν)[510]. This is for, what not even the angels can comprise, except only for they have been found worthy of that knowledge that is above angels, it is possible to may be comprised by some power of the mind, because of surpassing even this power of the mind.

33. And that what is above all mind's power, so that it cannot be comprised by mind, that is above all existing realities[511]. And that what exceeds any power of understanding, namely that what cannot be comprised by understanding, it is above all existing realities and, therefore, this union too, it is above any knowledge, even though, metaphorically, it is called as knowledge.

This light isn't, therefore, either intelligible (νοητον), even though it is also called so. This is because, what is above mind, what could that be intelligible[512] like? One could call this also as nescience, in the sense of exceeding, and this is rather much time, a denial of all realities, because it covers all of them. So, the union as positive experience is that one that shows that all realities are denied, and not their rational denial.

[510] Neither the experienced union can be described by using terms borrowed form creatures. The experience has such a thin character, such indeterminable, such unnoticeable, so that one can tall that it doesn't exist. But this in the senses of exceeding all thickened experiences of the creatures. That's why it cannot be called as knowledge. Even from intellectual point of view, it presents the same thinness or non-determinability.

[511] All existing realities, namely all the creatures, they are made so that they can be known by the mind, or the mind is made so that is able to know them. This is for the mind has, at its turn, in its being and in its works, the attribute of the existence. That's why, the mind cannot know God through its own natural works, because God is above the category of the existence. The mind must be endowed by God Himself, with His work that is above the mind's natural works, in order the mind to be able to know God. So, we are far from the Neoplatonic and of Evagrius pantheism, a pantheism reckoning that the mind, by finding its ultimate unity, that mind knows - by itself - God Who is One. Here is being clearly affirmed the transcendence of God. But, is it impossible to establish any bridge between mind and God? The faith admits the power of the grace. The grace can be impropriated by the mind. The mind can become the subject of the grace, or the subject of the work of God. The mind can become the subject of the knowledge of God by grace, or partaker to the self-knowledge of God. The mind, as subject, it can be imprinted by the godlike Subject.

[512] If that light is above all existing realities, or if that light is the negation of all existing realities, neither the union with it will be called as knowledge in the usual meaning of the word. That light can be called as knowledge only in the metaphorical meaning of the word knowledge. That doesn't mean that that light has no meaning, but it means that that light comprises a meaning that exceeds all meanings and it has all meanings within itself, in a virtual manner. That's why, on one hand that light is called as intelligible, and on the other hand it isn't called as intelligible.

more recommendable that using the word knowledge[513]. So, it isn't a part of the knowledge, it neither is a species of the knowledge, as what is above-being isn't a species of the being. That light couldn't be part, everywhere, to the domain of the knowledge by and large, and the knowledge by and large, it couldn't be able to comprise this light too. This light can rather be comprised in the domain of the nescience. But neither that it quite right. This is because that light is nescience in sense of exceeding, namely above even to nescience. So, this union has something unique and any name somebody would give to it: either union, or sight, or feeling, or knowledge, or understanding, or illumination, it won't be, actually, any of these, or, all of these are actually due only to it[514].

34. So, the treaties of the philosopher "About Knowledge" are an obvious nescience. Actually, he calls this one there as a part and as a species of the general knowledge, because it is also called, at its turn, as knowledge; and he compares this one to that one[515]. He didn't' realize that, if this one had the knowledge as genre due to the name, it would have the nescience too, since it has also the name of nescience; and it has the name of nescience even more than it has that of knowledge. Consequently, one and the same thing would stay under two contradictory genres; and what is above it would be underneath too, and what is unique and above any multiplicity it would be placed in line with the multiplicity.

But what increases this insanity even more, it is that he doesn't only simply say that the union is a subordinate part, but he argued there that it is above knowledge, and so he deemed right that here as species and subordinate part of the knowledge, he makes it even worse, by and large, that the knowledge. It is like somebody would say, about that one that is the only one above being, that that would be part and subordinate species of the beings, due to the name, namely on the basis that that is and that is called as being, and then he would dare to compart it to the genre of the being by and large.

[513] The knowledge provided by this light can be rather called as nescience, but in the sense that it exceeds all the knowledge, and it doesn't resemble to any knowledge.

[514] Only to this light are due all the positive names in proper sense, or neither of them is due to this light because of the imperfect meaning they have when referring to creatures, namely that meaning we are accustomed to.

[515] Palamas affirms the total transcendence of the knowledge into Ghost, while Barlaam includes even the knowledge of God amongst the knowledge referring to creatures.

He mixes up the unmixed ones, and he places above knowledge what is under the knowledge.

But, because in this way he compares the knowledge to what is above knowledge, he deemed the "above" (knowledge) as an unessential adding. By doing so, he deemed a thing as one with itself, then he stupidly compares them. Then, if because to the simple reason of the name, the above-knowledge knowledge it would be a species of the knowledge by and large, they who say that there are ten genres of things, they would be wrong. If that was the case, there it would be only one genre: the existence. And what is above all realities, it would be under this unique genre. And by being united with this one, all the other produce another existence better than this one genre of the existence. Likewise, given the fact that there is a touching above touching (αφη υπερ αφή) and there is a sight above sight and, simply speaking, there is a feeling above feeling – this is because also these ones receive the same names for understanding – if what is above feeling it was a species of the feeling, the feeling would be higher than what is above feeling. And it would be the same with each of the mentioned ones.

35. But let's come back. What is, therefore, that union that is nothing from the existing realities, in the sense of exceeding? Is it a theology through negation? But it is union and not negation. And, for negation, we do not need ecstasy[516], neither the angels do, while for that union both us and the angels need ecstasy. In addition to that, he who doesn't make theology by negation, he won't a non-believer one. But amongst believers are imparted with this union only the deified ones. Then, we can understand and express that theology done through negation. But this union is unspoken and non-understood even by them who see, as the Great Dionysus said[517]. Then, the light of that theology is some knowledge and a

[516] It might be futile, or redundant (or it might not…), mentioning here that is about spiritual ecstasy. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[517] About the Godlike Names 1: 5; G.P. 3: 593 BC. In this paragraph Saint Gregory Palamas undertakes a more insisting discernment between union and the knowledge of the existing realities, and then between union and theology by negation. The knowledge occupies itself with the existent categories. That union that takes place between us and God, it is above the existing categories. The theology by negation still is a knowledge; the union is above the theology by negation too. You can avoid making theology by negation and you will still be a believer. But to union reach only those believers which are imprinted by godhead. The theology by negation is understood and expressible; as such, the theology by negation is reasoning (γνωσίς τίσ εστι χαι λόγος). But the light of this sight is seen as subsisting in something (ενυποστάτος), working by understanding, and speaking spiritually and in a mysterious manner to the deified man[518]. Actually, the mind understands the attributes we negate to God, by theologizing them (by reasoning about them) by negation[519]. The mind is working here through unfolding (through conclusions). But this is union[520]. In addition to these, through the negative theology, the mind, after negating all the other realities, it negates even itself. But this is the union of the mind with God. And this is what the fathers told: "The end of the prayer is the kidnapping of the mind towards the Lord"[521]. That's why the Great Dionysus too, he says that through that light we are united with God[522]. This is for, in prayer, the mind gradually rejects the connections with the existing realities, firstly with those realities which tie the mind to the shameful things, and evil, and by and large corruptible, and then with those which are in the middle and which transform the man towards worse or towards better, according to the purpose they are used on, which all their learning and knowledge are for. That's why there is also an advice of the fathers "let's not receive that knowledge that the enemy makes it spring out during prayer, in order us not to be knowledge. The union is above understanding and above any expression. The union is more apophatic than the negative intellectual theology.

[518] The light of the intellectual theology is a knowledge and a reasoning. It is nothing else. The light of the sight is a subsisting reality different from our cogitation; it is hypostatized in the Hypostasis of Christ and, consequently, it is subsistent. That light even speaks to the deified human being, showing by that too, that it is a reality that differs from our reasoning, and it is even a personal reality, by being the manifestation of Christ. Here we are seeing the influence of Saint Simeon the New Theologian. By this, Saint Gregory Palamas is showing again, that according to him, this light isn't an "emanation" thinned out of a pantheistic substance in the Neoplatonic sense (or anthroposophical), but it is Christ Himself as Person, in the modality of His manifestation towards the godlike persons.

[519] One theologizes through the rational negation that God is not a being, He is not righteousness etc. or that these attributes aren't appropriate to describe God, for He is above them. So, the mind understands that God isn't these attributes. But by that, the mind hasn't reached God.

[520] In the theology by negation, the mind unfolds itself, by negating, on at the time, the diverse features improperly attributed to God. In union, the mind is gathered whole into God Who is encountered in His unity as Person.

[521] John Climacus, The Ladder XXCVIII; G.P. 88: 1132 D. The union of the mind with God isn't, therefore, the rational negation of the mind, but the mind is kidnapped into God, it is like the mind is "spellbound" by the wonder of God's showing and love. The mind ends the interiorized and fiery prayer.

[522] About the Godlike Names 3; G.P. 3: 680 A.

robbed of what is higher"[523]. Then, after the mind has been slowly rejecting these ties, as also those ties with the things which are higher than these ones, the mind exits, whole, from the existing realities, during the clean prayer. This going out (εκστασις) is much higher than the theology by negation. This is for it is characteristic only to those who reached the dispassion[524].

But the union still won't take place, until the Comforter illuminates, from above, him who prays, by sitting in the upper room of the natural peaks and waiting for the promise of the Father, and until he won't be kidnapped, thus, through unveiling, towards seeing the light. And this sight has a beginning also in what follows after beginning, which are different from one another, as they are more obscure or more limpid. But it doesn't have an end. This is for, advancing in it goes endlessly, as in the case of the kidnapping into unveiling too. This is because, something else is the illumination, something else is the clear seeing of the light, and something else is the seeing of the things into light, which even the things from far come in front of our eyer through, and which even the future things are shown as existing into[525].

36. But speaking about these aspects and clarifying them it is above me. And, likewise, about the previously mentioned things. But they belong to our theme[526]. So, let's come back to them. Therefore, seeing that light it is a union, though not lasting much except for the consummate ones. Because, what else could be the union with the light except a sight? Then, once this takes place after resting of all the mental works, how could be done except not through the Ghost? This is for the light is seen in a light and through a resembling light (Ps. 35: 9[527]). And [524] So, one reaches the "sight" not through a simple "method", or haphazardly.

[523] John Climacus, The Ladder XXVIII; G.P. 88: 1140 A.

[525] Amongst the countless stages of the sight, which one will endlessly advance into, during the future life, Saint Gregory is mentioning here three of them: The illumination, as a flashing light lasting only for an instant, the clear seeing of the light stretched everywhere, and the seeing of the things, of the circumstances, of the relationships, and of the souly states, present and future, in the variety of their indefinite richness.

[526] Saint Gregory Palamas admits that is above his powers to speak about the realities of the future age. And, alike, about the realities of the present age too. But, because these are related to the theme he is speaking about, he will still attempt to speak about those.

he who sees, for he doesn't work in any way, because of being him outside all the other realities, be will become wholly a light[528], and he will be transformed in the likeness of what he sees (τω ορωμενω ομοιουται); better said, he will even be united, in an unmixed manner, by being him light and by seeing light through light. If he looks at himself, he will see light; if he looks at what he sees, that will be light too; if he looks at that what he sees through, that will be light too. This is the union: to be all of these one, in order he who sees no longer be able to distinguish between that what he looks through and him who looks, except only that much that he knows that he is a light and that he looks at light, a light that is different from that of all creatures.

37. That's why the Great Paul too, he says that during that wonderful kidnapping, he didn't know about himself what he was (2 Cor. 12: 2). He was seeing himself, But how? Sensitively, rationally, or in an understanding manner (with the mind)? But, by being kidnapped, he went out of these powers. So, he was seeing on himself, through the Ghost Who commits the kidnapping. And what was he, because he wasn't able to comprise himself by any natural power, or, better said, he was untied of any natural power? Doubtolessly, he was that what he was united with, and he was that what he was knowing himself through, and that what he deserted everything for. This is for he has such a union with the light that not even the angels could reach it, if they haven't exceeded themselves by the grace that unites them. But he was then light and Ghost, which he was united with too, and which he had the power to be united too. So, he was outside all existing realities and he became that light by grace, or he wasn't even existing, in sense of exceeding, for he was above the created realities. This is for, the godlike Maximos says too: "He who has reached into God, he has left behind all the realities which are inferior than God"[529]. Or, again: "All the things, the names, and the dignities inferior to God, they will be underneath to them who will reach into God by grace"[530].

[528] Being occupied with regardless what else, through senses and through cogitation, it brings within us some sort of an inferior light, one belonging to another order. That's why him who is thus occupied, he cannot become wholly above-nature-light, except after there is no inferior light left within him, so that he will be filled, entirely, with the light from above.

But, for he reached then to be thus, the godlike Paul wasn't imparted, by any means, with the godlike being. The being of God is, therefore, above even what doesn't' exist, in sense of exceeding, as it is above God too[531]. This is for, inexistent in sense of exceeding, it is that what is spiritually seen through the feeling of the mind. And this isn't, at all, the being of God, but it is the glory and the shininess which are unseparated form His being, and which He unites Himself through, with the worthy ones amongst people and angels. And not only that, but for as the angels see God, the people see Him too in these ways, and they are united with God and they praise Him, it might be that the angel too, if he said that sight that is above his nature, the angel too would tell similarly to what Paul told: "I know an angel who saw, I do not know if he was an angel, God knows" (2 Cor. 12: 2-3). So, these visions of the saints are known only to God and to them who stay under the work of those visions, as says Gregory, the Speaker-about-God[532].

That's why, reckoning those visions as submitted to the senses, or reckoning them as hallucinations and symbols, and as being sensitive, and to likening them to the human knowledge, it won't be the deed of a man who realizes the limitlessness of the godlike height, one that wants to attract, with love for people, also our last fewness.

38. But behold, I have brought three witnesses, one out of each three groups of the Christian world: from amongst apostles, Peter; from amongst hierarchs Dionysus; from amongst hermits, Isaac, the knower of the appeasement life. And as it was written about the shepherds from the Lord's Birth, that immediately, at the word of the angel, they saw a multitude of heavenly army confessing together, likewise, in the same time with the word of the apostle rose together-voicing a multitude of apostles, and with the others two, a multitude of pious and priests. And this multitude, has given voice to a common confession, that there is a light that shows itself to the saints, and that light is other than the knowledge out of all the creates realities; all the more holy as the glory of the nature of God is, and it is seen only by them who have reached in the image of God; and that is far from being a hallucination, or something close to the sensitive lights, or a symbolical contrivance according to their image; it is far from being that, for it is hypostasis[533] and it is the beauty of the future age and it is the only true, eternal, unchangeable, without-evening, non-passing light, a light which we too become light through, and we become sons of the consummate light through.

[531] και ύπερ το κατ υπεροχην μη ον (and beyond supreme non-being), if the godlike light isn't in sense of exceeding, the godlike being is above nonexistence too, in sense of exceeding. It is not lived as a reality that isn't like all the creatures are, but it simply isn't lived either like the sight that is lived, as not being like the existing realities. If the glory of God that is lived as the non-existing realities, in sense of their exceeding, it is called as God, His being is above God as lives by us as Person who is somewhat accessible.

So, are you gossiping these ones, who are so great, by calling them untaught and searchers for inhalations? Do you dare, you the philosopher, to say that they commit sin in what regards the being of God, they who are the seers of God, the wisemen of God, and the preachers of God? I fear that you will deprive yourself of being partaker to that light, as the saints are; I fear that you, by opening your mind, lest you attract to you a ghost that is contrary to the truth; lest you dogmatize, as being of God, what doesn't exist. This is because, that what you aim through your struggle, aspiring to show it with the greatest zeal, that there isn't any sight above the works of the mind, despite that only through this sight that surpasses the works of the mind it is shown, in the most limpid manner, and in a total special manner, that God is truly existing, as also that God is above the existing realities. This is for, how won't exist the being of God, if to those who were elevated through clean prayer above any sensitive reality, it is made seen, during prayer, itself the glory of that godlike nature? But in the same time, how won't be the being of God above everything that is sensitive (submitted to senses) and intelligible (thought with the mind), if God is above this sight that, at its turn, it is above all feeling and understanding?[534]

[533] "Hypostasis of the future age" - foundation and content of the future age.

[534] Even Saint Maximos the Confessor and Saint Gregory of Nyssa called the creatures as "the ones who are" (τα οντα), and they called God as "He Who is in existent manner" (ο οντως ων). In the existence of the creatures there is something precarious. They do not have the reason of their existence in themselves. They have been given their existence, and their existence can be taken away from them. God exist through Himself, eternally. Nothing is chewing away His existence. Saint Gregory Palamas is affirming now that experiencing this firm, eternal, inexhaustible, impossible to be diminished existence of God, it takes place only by seeing the glory itself of God, and that doesn't depend, in a natural manner, on the mind's works. This is because, there ones are made in order to know the creatures having a precarious existence, one not-founded in itself, because the mind itself is experienced in this

39. But, what the goods of the future age are? Aren't they above all the powers of our senses and of our mind? "This is for, what the eye didn't see and the ear didn't hear and at the heart of the man didn't ascend, those have been prepared by God to them who love Him" (1 Cor. 2: 9). These ones will be seen then by the clean heart, according to saint Maximos[535]. How, then, there won't be any sight above all understanding (ορασις υπερ πάσας τας νοήσεις)?

No longer being able to oppose yourself, you cannot pretend too, sophistically, on the ground of the same name, that you agree it. This is because he who says, by using the metaphor and the identify of name, that what is above understanding, it still is understanding, because of the fact that that sight too, despite being above the name, it still is understanding, he no longer strives himself, later on, to show that that sight isn't above understanding[536]. Actually, he who told that isn't above understand what is above understanding, because of being that too called as understanding, he invokes as motif and excuse the identity of the name. But he who doesn't place that thing above the mind's works, he has no works as having a precarious existence as well, an existence that isn't founded in itself. Everything is affected by incertitude in the natural knowledge of the mind, because the things which are known and the subject who knows them, are hit by a lack of foundation in themselves. The scholastic trust Barlaam had in rationality, as supreme and sole forum of decision in any matter, it didn't allow him to admit that God can be fully known only through a work that is above mind, a work given to the mind, as a gift, by God Himself. To Palamas, in the glory of God that is seen through a work of the mind given by God, as a gift, it is experienced – as through one that is the sole adequate to that – the intensity of unconditioned existence, one that cannot have its spring except in the being of God. The unconditioned intensity of the existence of this glory, one experiences it as being superior to the precariousness of existence characteristic to all the beings which are known through senses, and through any work of the mind. This one is therefore experienced, as having a more profound existence than all the sensitive and intelligible realities, namely than all the realities known through senses or through cogitation.

[535] This is from: One Hundred Theological Heads, published by S. I. Epivanovici. To be see at J. Hausherr, "Orientalia Christiania Periodica" no. 5, 1939, p. 231. At Hristou, quoted work, p. 572, note no. 5.

[536] Barlaam would want to sophistically pretend that he agrees those who – by reckoning the sight as above understanding – they call it, as well, as understanding, as one that isn't contrary to understanding, but it is above understanding. He wanted to create the impression of agreeing that, but he only mentioned the name as "understanding" given to that sight. But he who really agrees something, he won't fight, later on, to demonstrate that that sight isn't above understanding. So, Barlaam couldn't oppose Palamas, neither could he pretend, sophistically, that he agreed Palamas.

excuse. This is because, that thing (the sight) couldn't be named as the work of the mind[537].

But in that all-happy living in the endless age, the sons of the resurrection won't need, any longer, the things which uphold the life of the present age: neither air, nor light, neither fire, not any similar thing, but "instead of all things we will have ethe godlike nature", according to Gregory of Nyssa[538]. And according to Saint Maximos: "the deification from then, of the soul and of the body, it will give resting to all the natural works of the mind and of the senses, for, both through soul and body, God will show Himself, the natural traits being defeated by the overwhelming of the glory"[539]. Therefore, what that light is, that is seen with the bodily eyes, in the absence of the air? Isn't that light non-sensitive and above the whole natural knowledge? Isn't the glory of God that which envelops and fills up with light? Ans what is that makes us seers above all the work of the senses and above the whole understanding? Isn't that the Ghost of God Who, not only the mind, but also our body, He makes them spiritual (pneumatic)? How can be then, that there is no sight above understanding and there is no other light of the heart, except the knowledge?

40. But I reckon our faith as well, as being another kind of sight, of the heart and above all senses and understanding, for it exceeds all the understanding powers of our soul. I call as faith not the well-believing confession, but the steadfast founding on it and on the things promised by God. For, how can we see, through it, the things promised us in the future and endless age? Through senses? But the faith is "the hypostasis of the hoped things", and the sense couldn't see, by any craftsmanship, the future and what is hoped for. That's why, the apostle added too: "the proving of the things which are not seen" (Hebr. 11: 1). Therefore, can any power of the mind see the hoped-for things? But how could it see the things which have never ascended to the man's heart? So, what's next? Don't we see, through faith, the things which God promised us, since they exceed all the works of the senses and of the mind?

[537] One can say about itself that "sight", that it isn't above understanding, because one cannot say that that isn't understanding. This is what Palamas does. And Barlaam pretends to agree him. But about that work which somebody is imparted with that sight through, one cannot say that it belongs to the mind. Barlaam can no longer hide the difference between himself and Palamas. This is because, while Palamas says that this is an understanding, but it isn't a work of the mind, Barlaam affirms that by being an understanding, it is a work of the mind. So, after pretending that he agreed Palamas, for the fact that he accepted that that sight is an understanding- to Palamas, though, that sight is above the natural understanding of the mind – Barlaam showed his true colors as opposing Palamas, by contesting that that understanding isn't a work of the mind.

But all of them who, from ever, they have been searching, through deeds, for the heavenly motherland, and who, according to the godlike apostle, they died without taking the promises, but by seeing the promises and by embracing the promises from far" (Hebr. 11: 13). So, there is both a sight and an understanding of the heart, above all the works of the mind. This is for, what is above mind it cannot be understood, except in the sense of exceeding. Because, otherwise, that will be a nonsense[540].

41. But, if all of them who "have been martyred through faith, they haven't taken the promise, for God planned for us a higher thing, that not to be committed without us? (Hebr. 11: 39-40), once they are consummate, won't they see the promised things? Or, will they see the promised things, but without seeing those promised things above any understanding? Or above all understanding, but like before they became consummate? But what will be the reason in that? So, they will see and they will see above all understanding. And not as they saw before, but seeing will mean to them achieving the promised things. So, there is a sight above any understanding. And even before that one too. Actually, our faith is an above-mind sight. But, the achieving of the believed things, it is a sight above that sight that is above-mind[541]. And, what is seen and possessed through that sight, by being above all the realities known with the senses and with the mind, it isn't, as well, the being of God, because the being of God is beyond that too, by exceeding. So, it is the hypostasis of the future goods[542].

[540] The realities which exceed the understanding, they still have a meaning in themselves. But the realities which are bellow understanding, they have no meaning. The heart has an understanding that exceeds the understanding of the mind. This is for, the heart is the throne of Christ, the dwelling place of the grace, the opening towards the endlessness of the godlike Person. The heart has a transparency towards infinite, towards the richness of the sentiments which have their starting point and their satisfaction in the felt godlike love, which the mind doesn't have it, but which the mind uses when the mind united itself with the heart.

[541] So, there is a sight above-all-understanding, but there is also a sight above this level too. This is for, a sight that is above all understanding, it is the sight of the faith. But in the future life, there will be a sight above the sight of the faith. And that for it will be the full possession of the things we saw, from far, through faith. The sight of the faith is had by that believer whose present life moves amongst the things from here. The sight of the future life will be moving amongst the goods from there, which are the highest.

Have you understood how much godlike greatness lose they who do not know this above-understanding sight? And how much more they extoll God, they who through the cleanness of their heart have tasted that sight, even for a little, and so they have within them the earnest of the future age, or, by receiving it through faith, they experienced, in many ways, the mysterious goods?

But the philosopher, by not giving room within him, to the height of this understanding, he didn't bring worshipping to God and glory worthy of God into Ghost, and on them who worship God into the Ghost of God, he reckons them as doing everything on the opposite. And he places them on the list of the blasphemers despite they are the only speakers-about-God who are spiritually advanced and worthy to be trusted.

42. And let's insist upon faith and upon the godlike and delighting sight of the godlike light. The faith is the cart of the apostolical power, the apostolical life, the righteousness of Abraham; out of faith it starts and into the faith it ends the whole righteousness, and out of faith will be alive every righteous one (Rom. 1: 17). He who disregards the faith, he will fall off the godlike benevolence. This is because "without faith there is no other possibility to be pleasant to God" (Hebr. 11: 7). The faith always keeps out generation free of all sorts of hallucinations and the faith founds us into truth and into us the truth, out of which no one will be shaken, even if the world reckons us as insane, us who through the true faith we go out through the ecstasy that is above understanding and we confess this truth with the deed and with the word, and we do not let ourselves "carried away by any wind of the teaching" (Eph. 4: 14), but we persevere in the knowledge of the truth of the Christians, and we preach that sight that is the simplest, the most godlike, and the truly undeceiving one.

But by leaving now the future realities, lets look with our above-mind sight (θεωρία) that belongs to the faith, at the thing which have been done since the beginning. This is for "through faith we understand that the ages have been done with the word of God… in order to be made, out of what was unseen, the realities which are seen" (Hebr. 11: 3). Which mind could understand what were then done like, all the realities, out of what wasn't at all, and that was done only by word? This is for what the works of the mind understand, of course it doesn't surpass these. This fact being understood by the wisemen of the Hellenes too, and by reckoning that nothing out of the realities which get corrupted does pass into nothingness, and that no one out of the produced realities comes from nothing, they cogitated the world as uncreated and endless. But the faith, by exceeding the ideas born out of looking at the creatures, it united us with the Rationality That is above all realities and with the unconstrued and simple Truth; And we have understood better than through a demonstration, not only the fact that all realities were made out of what didn't exist, but also the fact that they were made through the word of God. So, what is this faith? Is it a natural power, or is it above-nature? Without any doubt, it is above-nature, because "no one can come to the Father, except through the Son" (Jn. 10: 9), Who elevates us above ourselves and Who gives us the deifying simplicity and Who turns us towards the unity of the Father that gathers all realities.

That's why Paul "took grace towards obeying the faith" (Rom. 1: 5). That's why, if you confess Lord Jesus Christ with your mouth, and if you believe in your heart that God raised Him from dead, you will be saved" (Rom. 10: 9). That's why are happier they who haven't seen by they have believed (Jn. 20: 29), than they who saw and believed into the One Who resurrected Himself from dead and Who is the One Who began the eternal life (Acts 3: 15). This is for, these ones, through the above-world-eye-of-the-faith, they saw and honored the realities which the eye, seeing them, it doesn't believe them through itself, and which the understanding cannot comprise.

43. "This is the victory that conquered the world, our faith" (1 Jn. 5: 4). This is, though it is strange to say it, the faith that upheld the world from beneath too, before, in diverse ways and times, and then, by transforming that world in a more-godlike world, and by elevating that world at the height of the skies, it has made sky out of earth too. Who guarded the seeds of the second world? Wasn't it the faith of Noah? Who made out of Abraham Abraam and father of many nations, like the sand of the sea and like the multitude of the stars? Wasn't it the faith in those promises which were back then impossible to understand? For Abraam held his only begotten son for stabbing. And through him – oh, wonder – he believed, doubtlessly, that he had a multitude of sons. Wasn't, therefore, the old man seeming to them who looked at the things with the rationality (τω λογισμω) that he was insane? But the end of the things, led by the grace of God, it showed that the faith isn't an insanity, but it is knowledge that exceeds all cogitation.

Again, Noah was waiting, from the curved firmament of the sky, for deeps of waters. Where are the mumblings of the philosophy honored by you? "All the ones tending upwards and towards the middle: the light ones, the lither they are, the mode they get far from the middle". Where is the rare and thin substance, the first one not being able to cover, while the second one crosses through the corps which are not too dense by nature? Where are the exact spheres and the curves, the moves of many sorts and of great speed, by which, you are searching for the truth out of existences, so that you roll yourself and your listeners, out of truth, and you make them prey to the flood, by learning out of experience that what they ignored, in an evil manner, by knowledge.

But they will receive their faith before their death, and it will bring them to truth through a good science and it will make them, through experience, as totally non-tempted and dispassionate when facing the evil. The faith will show them even through things that all the external philosophy is insane (1 Cor. 1: 20), as one that won't understand even then, as it doesn't understand either now, the word of the great Peter: "The skies were formed yore out of water and through water; and through water the world from then perished drowned. And the skies from now are kept for fire, being preserved for the doomsday and for the perdition of the unbelievers" (2 Pt. 3: 5-7). So, what do you say about the knowledge of God, knowledge that is withing Christians, and about the salvation through it? Is it that salvation through the knowledge of the philosophy, or is it through faith that makes through nescience, the knowledge of the philosophy as useless?[543] If it is through knowledge, "the whole faith will become vain" and the promise will be abolished, that "if you believe with your heart into Lord Jesus, you will be saved" (Rom. 10: 9). So, not him who has in his heart the knowledge about creatures will have God due to that knowledge which he has, but he who has believed in his heart into Lord Jesus, he will have God dwelling within himself[544], through the non-spying faith.

44. But let's leave now them who through this knowledge didn't know God and let's overlook the fact that not all the knowledge out of philosophy it is true. Let's assume that all the philosophical knowledge is true, and so let's look at them who, through this knowledge about creatures, they knew God[545]. Contemplating and knowing through these creatures, it is called as natural law (Rom. 2: 14). That's why, even before Patriarchs, Prophets, and the written Law, the natural law called again the mankind and it turned them to God, by showing the Maker, to them who didn't go out of the natural knowledge characteristic to wisemen of the Hellenes. This is because, who won't know God, as in an icon, and as out of a caused work, if the man has mind and he sees so many manifest kinds of creatures, so many contrary powers and movements which come to balance through opposition, and then the stability that brings as well a balance on this way, and uninterrupted successions of contrary impulses, and unmixed union through unreconciled adversities, and unions of the distinct ones and mixings of the united elements of the minds, of the soul, and of the bodies, and the harmony born out of so many things, and the steadfast relations and positions, and the aptitudes and the orders of the substances, and the non-detaching of the whole? And who, by knowing God thus, he will reckon God as something amongst philosophy remains at things, or it deems the person as an object, in order to be able – as it claims – to know the person.

[544] The relation with the person is usually accomplished through faith, and not through the science that spies, because of science wanting to transform the person in an object constituted of multiple details. All the more the relation with God-Person is accomplished through faith, for the faith respects God-Person as Person and that's why the faith experiences God-Person in His specific intensity, simply and unitarily, and the faith find in God-Person, concentrated, alive, and carried by the intention of the love, all the goods searched for by the knowledge by separating them or by classifying them.

[545] Saint Gregory Palamas didn't reckon that all the philosophical knowledge is wrong. He admits that all of it can be true. But to him, the philosophical knowledge shows its truth when out of the knowledge about creatures it will draw the right conclusion about the existence of God.

the caused realities or amongst the realities which are in His image?[546] He will have, by that, also the knowledge about God by negation. So, the knowledge about creatures turned the mankind to the knowledge about God, before Law and Prophets. And now it still does that[547]. This is for almost the whole world, namely as many as they do not listen to the evangelical precepts, they owe only to the knowledge about creatures the fact that they do not have another God except the Maker of this world.

45. So, these ones know God only out of the knowledge of the created realities. They are those who haven't died to the law, through law, in order to live that life into Christ, or, better said, they haven't ever the law od God. But now, when God showed Himself into body, He has been believed amongst nations, he has been preached to the world (1 Tim. 3: 16), and the law of the grace has been unveiled to the edge of the earth, and when "we have taken the Ghost of God in order us to see the things given to us, as gift, by God" (1 Cor. 3: 13), and when we have been taught by God (Jn. 6: 45) and we have received the advises of the Comforter according to the comforting promise, for "That One, he says, he will teach you the whole truth" (Jn. 14: 26) –a truth that is not known yet – when he have "the mind of Christ" (1 Cor. 3: 16) and the spiritual eyes, do you still go back to live under the elements of this world as teachers of yours? What is your answer to that? We who "wait for a new sky and for a new earth, according to the promise" (2 Pt. 3: 13; Apoc. 21: 1), won't we understand and we won't extoll God out of those, in a supra-worldly manner, but will we know God only out of this old and changing world? - and not only changeable but also corruptible. This is for, by mentioning the new world, He deemed this world as old. And everything that gets old and it oldens, it goes to perdition.

46. But where we have learnt about this world from, and about that life that doesn't get old? Have we learnt that out of contemplating the creatures, or from Him Who was appointed Son of God into power, according to the Ghost of the holiness through the resurrection from dead, from Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 1: 4)? Is it not One our Teacher, Christ (Mt. 23:10)?

[547] And today it does that all the more, due to the considerable progress of the sciences, which proved an amazing and a complex rationality existing in the nature.

So, which words of Him we have learnt from, about the nature of the imperishable world? Wasn't Him commanding us not to call ourselves as teachers on earth? How could we, therefore, frequent the Hellenes and the Egyptians in order us to learn something savior from them? Our knowledge about God, it praises God as Teacher; neither angel, nor man, but the Lord Himself taught us and saved us (Isa. 63: 9). We no longer know God out of comparisons (εκ του εικότος), and so it is the knowledge of God out of creatures. But now "it has been shown the life that was at the Father and it has been shown to us" (1 Jn. 1: 2); he heralded us that "God is luminous light and there is no darkness into Him" (1 Jn. 1: 5); and they who believed in Him, he made them sons of the light (Eph. 5: 8). "And so, it was shown what we will be"; "for, if He shows Himself we will be like Him; for we will also see Him like He is" (1 Jn. 3: 3). You have again fuel for your gossip: "As He is, so we will see Him". And he who says these, for being him built, in an unmediated manner, on the stone placed in Zion, he is close to that stone in all aspects. "And he who falls on it, he will be broken, and whom it falls on, that one will be crushed" (Mt. 21: 44).

47. But let's study what the philosopher argues like, that there is no sight (ορασιν) above all the works of the mind. First of all, we are saying that we know the fact that the thing which are speaking about, it is nameless and above-name. So, despite we call it sight, we know that is above-sight. And if somebody wants to call it as understanding (νοησις), if he believes or if he knows, by experience that that is even above-understanding, he will confess just like we do. So, all contrivances and visions, affirmed or negated by that one, we are going to let those aside because of being vain and because of not having any connection with us or with the present "Word". But the fact that there is a sight that is above all understanding (φράσεις υπερ πάσαν νόησια), that one hasn't understood, neither has he believed. But we would forgive him even if he didn't' understand. This would be because understanding what is above-mind, it doesn't stay in the power and in the strivings of ours. And will accept him, leniently, even if he doesn't believe, because we know, according to the apostle "that we must help him who is weak in his faith" (Rom. 14: 1). But his attempt to shake those who believe and to direct against them and against the truth, battle-writings, and his endeavor to offend in all ways, not only the small ones (Mt. 18: 6; Mk. 9: 42; Lk. 17: 2), but even those whoa re advanced in virtue and piousness, who would be able to endure it silently, once he decided to be a servant to the truth?

So, he didn't understand and he didn't believe that there is a sight and an understanding above aby sight and understanding, being above name and receiving names which remain way behind it. He imagines that what the theologians reckon as being above-mind, it is negative theology, and that isn't above-mind. This is because, there are negated – he says – the known realities, but not the unknown realities. But we know too, that in this theology what is negated to God isn't understood by the mind. But neither this theology exceeds the works of the mind.

48. But, about the above-mind sight we couldn't say that. If our mind wasn't able to exceed on itself, there wouldn't be sight and understanding above the works of the mind. And, once the mind has this power, and once the mind is united with God actually only through this power, by crossing this power through God to work, during prayer[548], one can affirms that there is a sight above all mind's works, a sight that we say about that is above understanding. But one could call that also as non-seeing and nescience in the sense of exceeding.

So, what is more understanding than non-understanding, how could that be a part of the knowledge, by and large?[549] And how could that be divided according to these species" This is for neither the being has been ever divided by someone amongst wisemen, in: body, incorporeality, and supra-existentiality; neither the feeling, in the five senses and in what is above-feeling. This is because, what is above-being, how could that be under-being, and what is above-being isn't a species of the feeling, neither what is above knowledge could be a species of [548] The mind has the power to exceed on itself, but only through God. This is for, through God this power goes out of potentiality and acts. Each person has the power to know another person, but only when that person opens herself / himself this power of knowing passes into deed.

[549] After he said before that the knowledge received through the godlike light, it can be named also as nescience, as one that exceeds the knowledge, not Saint Gregory is adding here the fact that that sight can be called as non-sight too, in the sense of exceeding the sight, but not in sense of absence of the understanding, or the sight, and of the knowledge. This is for, in that sight are given, in a virtual manner, all the realities brought through creation to our understanding and sight. That's why, that sight cannot be classified under the category of the knowledge, which the knowledge of the creatures is indicated through, by and large; but it cannot be either reckoned as contrary to knowledge, to understanding, or to sight.

the knowledge. And the fact that the mind has the power to exceed on itself, and through this power to unite with the realities which are higher than the mind, it is said by the Great Dionysus, very clearly. And he doesn't only say this, but he also shows this to Christians, as a most-beneficial teaching. "We must, he says, to know that our mind has, on one hand, the power to understand, which our mind sees the intelligible realities through, and on the other hand, the union that exceeds the being of the mind and which the mind connects through to the realities from beyond itself"[550].

49. But what this one argues like, that there is no sight above all the woks of the mind? "This is because, he says, there is nothing higher than the theology by negation". But it is something else, oh, you dear, the sight, and it is something else the theology (the speaking about God), because it isn't the same thing speaking something about God with achieving and seeing God. But the negative theology is word. But the visions are above word and reasoning. This was shown by him who unveiled the untold realties (2 Cor. 12: 4). So, because the theology by negations still is word (and reasoning), the above-word and above-reasoning sight it will be above the negative theology. Therefore, the seers of the realities which are above-word and above-reasoning, they surpass the negative theology too, not by word, but by deed, through truth and through the grace of God and of the Ghost, for the grace can do everything and the grace gives us to see "what the eye hasn't seen and the ear hasn't heard" (1 Cor. 2: 9).

50. But that one, because of not understanding these things, he imagines that Dionysus confesses similarly to what he says, when saying: "Everyone who are found worthy to know and to see God, they reach in the godlike darkness, right through the fact that they won't see and they won't know, because of truly being elevated to what is above-sight and above-knowledge"[551].

In another place Dionysus says: "Only to them is possible to penetrate into the darkness where really is Him Who is beyond all realities, them who have surpassed everything and the clean things and all the peaks of the holy heights and all the godlike lights"[552]. "So, if somebody enters this darkness, says the philosopher, he will do it by negating all existing realities. So, the most consummate sight (η τελειοτάτη θεωρία) is this darkness, says the philosopher, of the theology by negation. This is because nothing is beyond of knowing nothing. So, that light that you are speaking about, whatever that would be, you must leave it, in order you to ascent at the theology and sight (θεωρίαν) by negation"[553].

But we call as the light of the grace, what the Great Dionysus says too, that "it always surrounds, forever and uninterruptedly, the saints, in that living into the future age, as also it surrounded the disciples at the all-godlike Transfiguration"[554]. Why such a crafty striving to detach ourselves from what will illuminate us eternally, and we will ceaselessly see then, and not only with our senses but with our mind too, or rather above all these, spiritually and in a godlike manner, as we have shown often and in details? What so much craftsmanship and toil for, in order to detach ourselves from Him Who is higher than us, from Him Who unites us, forever, with the realities which are higher than the mind, and Who gives us to see the realities which are above us? This is for, like that mind that is united with the feeling, in an untold manner, it sees the realities which are submitted to the senses, and, like the feeling represents to itself, symbolically and sensitively, the intelligible realities (known with the mind), once reached to perceiving them through its union with the mind, likewise these two (the feeling and the mind), united with the ghost, they will see that light that is spiritually unseen, batter said they will cohabit, once deified, eternally, with that light.

[552] About the Mystical Theology 1: 3; G.P. 3: 1000 C.

[553] Barlaam doesn't know anything higher than the negative theology, that leaves the mind in front of a void, and that doesn't unite the mind with God. The negative theology is a theology which the rationality places through, a precipice between God and rationality, a precipice that neither the negative theology nor God can fill it up. Out of this mentality it is explained the Catholic doctrine about the created character of the grace. The human being remains, even in the state of grace, locked up within the limits of creatureliness. That's why they do not speak, in the Catholic theology, about the deification of the creature. Not even relatedly to the Mother of the Lord, so much praised in the catholic theology and piety, they do not speak about Her deification. The Mother of the lord remains the peak of the creation, as moral beauty, but She is separated too, from God, through an impossible to be filled up precipice. That's why the Church, locked up in the order of the creatural, it needs, as tis turn, a locum tenant of Christ.

So, why is there so much crafty striving, that aims to determine us to leave that light that will surround us, eternally, in the age to come, in order us to rejoice with the sight (θεωρία) reckoned by you as all-consummate? And if now can forsake and surpass that light, but then we won't be able to, the present age is higher than the future age, and rightly so, are addicted to the present age, they who wage war against that eternal and true light[555].

51. But, I wonder, the Great Dionysus co-speaks with them? How could he do that, for Dionysus searched for that light more than everyone? This is for we showed, in details in the words we wrote before, about the godlike light and the godlike illumination, how he who opposes more than everyone to the enemies of the great light, he is the brightest illuminator of the world from Areopagus. But now too, let's analyze again his words referring to that. By writing that, Dorotheos the servant, he says: "The godlike darkness is unapproachable light, for the overwhelming overflowing of above-being light. In that reaches everybody who is found worthy of knowing and of seeing God, right through the fact of not seeing and of not knowing being him elevated in what is above sight and knowledge, by knowing right that which is beyond all realities known with the senses and with the mind (sensitive and intelligible)"[556].

So, here he is saying about the same thing that is both darkness and light, and there he is saying that he sees and he doesn't see, and there he says that he knows and that he doesn't know. So, how can be darkness that luminous light? "Due to the overwhelming overflowing of light" he says. So, in a proper sense it is light; darkness is in sense of exceeding (καθ-υπεροχήν), because it cannot be seen by them who attempt to get closer to it and to see it through the works of the mind and of the senses.

52. And because in The Unapproachable One, there reaches anybody who is found worthy of knowing and seeing God, who will be him who will be found worthy of getting close [555] If the highest knowledge about God was that of the rational negative theology, and the sight of the godlike light was something inferior to that, then seeing this light in the future age would situate us on a level that would be inferior to the present one, when we are living under the regime of the negative theology – this negative theology being deemed, by Barlaam as the highest.

to The Unapproachable One and to see The Unseen One? Will be so all of them who worship God? But only to Moses and to those like Moses, it was given to reach into the godlike darkness. But the theology by negation, it can be impropriated by each worshipper of God. And now, after the coming of our Lord into body, the theology by negation has become accessible to any human being, as it was shown before. So, this light (in a proper sense) and this godlike darkness (in sense of exceeding), it is something else than the theology by negation is, and it surpasses the theology by negation in an unmatched way; let's say it: as much as Moses surpasses the many, in his seeing of God[557].

But, he says, he who has reached into this light, he both sees and doesn't see. How comes that: he doesn't see? For he sees, he says, above-seeing. So, in a proper sense, he knows and he sees. He doesn't see in sense of exceeding (υπεροχικως), by not seen through any work of the mind and of the senses. BY the fact itself that he doesn't see and he doesn't know, namely by the fact itself that he has exceeded all the knower work, he is elevated in what is above sight and above knowledge. In other words, he sees and he works in a higher way than the human way, as one who has reached to be higher than the man is and he is god by grace and for he is united with God and through God he sees God.

53. So, they who preach only a contemplation (θεωρίαν) through negation and beyond that they do not admit any work or sight (οραση), and they affirm about this contemplation that it is a part of the general knowledge, and they do not admit any sight higher than the knowledge, on the other hand, they say that those who reach that contemplation through negation - a contemplation reckoned by them as all-consummate - they won't see and they won't know anything in a proper sense, they who affirm that appear rather to admit a lack of knowledge and sight[558]. Consequently, they have forgotten about themselves, by declaring this true nescience in sense of lack (of knowledge), [557] The darkness that Moses entered, by being one with that light that is above-all-understanding, it is superior, at its turn, to the darkness of the negative theology.

[558] They who place the theology by negation on the highest level, they reckon that the highest knowledge is to admit the lack of any knowledge, the knowledge of the absolute void. Thus, by refusing the apophatism of the light, as one that is superior to the negative theology, they actually contest the rational knowledge. Palamas proved, in these rows, that he is a great dialectician.

as higher than all knowledge, and, by taking pride out of the fact that they do not know anything in the sense of lack (of knowledge). Thus, they who do not believe in that greatest light, they also fall off the light of the knowledge[559].

And, actually, if the sight (θεωρία) by negation and the godlike darkness are one and the same thing, and this sight actually means a lack of seeing, according to them who say that beyond it there is no godlike sight, then this godlike darkness too, it will be an actual darkness, a darkness of the lack that makes crazy them who live into it. And it actually makes like so them who truly argue things like these.

These ones dare to say that they penetrate into that darkness that is above-light, through their negative theology, before they will have rejected their Egyptian mother, a mother that bear a liar name and that is baren, as the fathers say that we must understand the external culture like[560]; before clearly knowing that we live between two rows of adversaries, and that one must make alliance with the best ones; before that, through those ones, they to assault the evil ones and to destroy them, to kill them and to slaughter them, and to set other of them in running (it is about all those evil passions which, by having a familiar connection with us, they dominate us strongly, in the beginning, as some causes, and some together-working presences); before rejecting the bad habit of them who get out of the fountains of the creation the wisdom of God, namely the wisdom of the Hellenes; before dwelling together with them who live in peace with one another and who do not argue different or opposite opinions, namely with the ones who are wise in the spiritual matters; before watching their thoughts through withdrawal and quietude; before climbing the mountain, namely the peak of their soul; before looking from far at the new light; before getting close, before hearing, and before taking off their shoes, given the fact that is not allowed to touch the holy land (Exod. 3: 5), by attaching themselves to dead people and to those who are not real mediators; before changing the right hand in order to make it engolpion (Exod. 4: 6), namely before [559] Only that great light that comes to us out of the godlike Person, it has a meaning and it is knowledge, or the so-called light of the knowledge.

[560] Saint Gregory of Nyssa, About the Life of Moses; G.P. 44: 329 BC. The whole paragraph that follows, it is influenced by the content of that work of saint Gregory of Nyssa. One cannot reach the sight of the light of God without a purification, as one cannot reach, by speculations, to the formulations of the rational negative theology.

the mind sinks into itself; before totally toppling over the mastery of the tyrant through the staff that can do all things, namely by faith, and before having crossed, by feet, the salty water of the life; before transforming our bitter and harsh nature in a spring of joy above nature, through prayer and through deeds which are pleasant to God; before tasting that food that flows from above and before not running from enemies, but rather wanting to banish all the enemies away; before being consummately prepared for all these things so that they to reach the Sunday of the non-working of evil deeds, and before having they heard and exceeded those trumpets with many sounds, and before they having seen, one by one, other lights with rich overflowing – and these ones are the glory of God heralded through the creatures of many kinds, and then the preaching through prophets, apostles, and fathers, and all the teachings about the godlike realities; before they having accomplished all of these and before having reached together with the leaders who have dedicated themselves to God, on the top of the godlike levels, and then to be united in an non-understood manner, with God Himself, detached from all of these.

But we, by researching the negative theology, as much as we needed that, in the "Words" from before, written by us about light, we have shown that the light is image of that sight (θεωρίας) that is shapeless and fulfilled, which the mind rejoices of, into the Holy Ghost, but it is not itself that light. That's why, all of them who have been found worthy, through faith, to receive the mystery (of the salvation), they can praise God by negation; but they won't be united with God and they won't be able to see God through light, except they receive, by fulfilling the commandments, that above-nature power of the sight[561].

54. "But they who penetrate into the mysterious darkness, the must forsake, according to Dionysus the Areopagite, all the godlike lights" says the philosopher by quoting him. "Therefore, itself the godlike light, if we apply everywhere what you are saying, it must be forsaken too. And [561] They who simply admit, by faith, the mystery of the salvation into Christ, they can praise God. But they won't be able to reach at seeing the non-understood light, except by receiving from God the power for perceiving that light. This is because the words for negating any feature of God, those words only express His glory, known out of the mystery of the embodiment and of the salvation. But those wors are, though, only an image of the non-understood light of His light, and not itself the lived reality of that light.

this can be ascertained by the fact of no longer seeing anything at all; this is that mysterious darkness".

What can you say?! Thus, you count up amongst other many things, that light too, a light that is made eternal with the saints, the glory of the godlike nature, the beauty of the future and steadfast age, the without beginning and without end Kingdom of God. This is for, Himself Who shined into that light, on the mountain, he called this light as thus. But what does the godlike Dionysus say? He says in "The Mystical Theology", clearly: "That one cause of all realities, it is above all realities and it is shown plainly only to them who have crossed through all the holy and clean things"[562].

If that light is shown to them, and even in an unveiled manner, how comes that it won't show itself at all? And if this showing is the theology by negation, and by that it is the sole known non-comprising, as you affirm, and this theology is used by Hellenes, as yourself mention that too, then they too have exceeded all the cleanness and itself the godlike light that is the hypostasis of the future goods[563]. Woe to you! The knowledge of the insane wisemen not only that it comprises, according to you, but it even exceeds the promises of the future goods.

But Dionysus, the speaker about the wisdom of God, he wouldn't ever say something like that. This is for he mentioned, immediately after, in continuation, the godlike lights, the heavenly sounds, and the peaks of all the saint realities, which one must forsake. Those are the cleanings of Moses before he reached the foot of the Horeb Mountain, the sounds which welcomed him after he climbed above the feet of the mountain, the anticipated sights of the lights, the parting with the many realities. And that sight after all of these, it won't be the sight of God, but it will be the sight of the place where God sat. This means that all one sees through the work of the senses or of the mind, are some supposed rationalities of the realities which are beneath Him Who is above all realities and through which, not only Himself, but also His presence, are shown as above all

[563] If the negative theology is used by some Hellenes philosophers, and through it they do not cogitate except at the non-comprehensibility of God and not at the mystery of the Person or of the supreme Persons as well, but it is superior to seeing the light of the all-loving Trinity of Persons, a light that will wrap the saints in the future life, then the Hellenes who deny the Trinity will have more than the saints, in the future life.

cogitation. Therefore, seeing that place it exceeds the theology by negation too, or it shows this theology itself.

In the last case, if Moses climbed only until he reached that place, one could rightly dogmatize out of these, that there was no sight above the theology by negation. But, due to the fact that Moses detached himself even from the seeing of that place, and for he entered the truly mysterious darkness, by ceasing any knower work, in sense of exceeding, by "uniting himself, on a higher level, with The Uknown One and by seeing Him and by knowing Him, above-mind"[564], how will they close that sight from the godlike darkness, only within the limits of the theology and of the contemplation (θεωρία) by negation? This is for, Moses looked at it also before he entered that darkness that is above-light (supra-luminous = υπερφωτον γνόφον), through that place[565]. So, it is obvious that something else is the union and the sight into darkness; that is way higher than such a theology by negation.

55. But why to argue in words, and not show with the deed, the sure truth of what we have said? Moses, by detaching himself from all seen and which are seeing[566] things and cogitations, and by surpassing the sight of that place, and by entering the darkness, did he saw nothing? But he saw the immaterial tent "which he shown to the people from below, through material imitation"[567]. And this tent, according to the words of the saints, it is the power of Christ, the self-hypostatical power and wisdom, of God[568], which, by being, by its nature, as immaterial and uncreated, it shown in advance,

[564] According to Palamas, who reiterates the tradition of the Eastern Fathers, there are three stages of the ascension in knowing God: the knowledge of the godlike rationalities of the creatures, the knowledge of God by negating those realities, and the seeing of God in that darkness that is above-light. The second one, the theology by negation, it is only the place of God. Itself the presence of God is above that. The first and the second stages of knowledge, they have, somehow, a light within them, for they aren't totally non-understood. The third one is a darkness above these lights, but it is, in the same time, a supra-luminous darkness, for, on one hand, it is more non-understood than the first two stages of the knowledge, but on the other hand it is a richer, deeper, more unmediated knowledge of the presence of God.

[565] Anyway, Moses surpassed the negative theology as well, or the place of God, in order Moses to reach God's supra-luminous presence that is in a supra-luminous darkness.

[566] But before Moses reached the place of God, or the negative theology, he had to detach himself from all things and from all persons, in order him not to see and not to be seen. This is because even the fact of being seen is disturbing. He also detached himself form the cogitations which he was seeing through.

through the Mosaic tent, that it will receive, at one time, a seen composition, and there will come, in image and being, that Word from above being and imageless, that Tent that is above and before all realities and it comprises all realities; that Tent which were created and which are upheld in, all the seen and unseen realities; that Tent that, by taking body, He will give His body for us; and Who, by being hierarch before ages, he used Himself as a temple, for us[569]. That's why, Moses, reached into the godlike darkness, he not only saw the immaterial tent, which he presented through matter, but he saw itself the godlike spring of the hierarchy and the realities related to hierarchy, which he gave material image, of many kinds, in the priesthood of the Law.

So, the tent and the aspects related to the tent, the priesthood and the aspects related to priesthood, they are sensitive symbols and curtains of Moses's sights, from the godlike darkness. But those sights weren't themselves symbols. "This is for, to them who have crossed through all the holy and all the clean things, and who penetrate the mysterious darkness, those realities will be shown unveiled"[570]. But what could be symbols like, the realities which are shown unveiled of all cover?

That's why, the interpreter of the "mystical theology" says at its beginning: "Above-being Trinity, direct us towards the high peak of the mysterious realities, where are hidden the simple, untied from all, and unchangeable mysteries of the theology, into the above-light darkness"[571]. Therefore, who can say, any longer, that in the godlike darkness and beyond the theology by negation, there wouldn't be shown any higher vision? Or, who could tell that all the saints' visions are symbolical? And that, by being symbolical, those visions appear sometimes, but they never exist? But Moses saw the realities he saw, for forty days and nights, according to Gregory of Nyssa:

[569] God-the Word is the supreme Subject Who comprises in Himself all realities, through thinking and love, which all realities were created through, and which all realities are upheld in, after creation, and which all realities will be fully gathered together in, at the end. And by being comprised in Him, as in a churchly and holy dwelling place, themselves are sanctified. But this Church, by being, in the same time, Subject, He commits that sanctification through His work. As such, Christ is both Church and Hierarch. He is Church and Hierarch by excellence, and from before ages.

"being imparted, under darkness, with the eternal life"[572]. Those visions were shapeless. But, then, what could those vision be like symbolical?[573] Then, those realities were seen into darkness. And all the realities from that darkness were "simple, untied of everything, and unchangeable". But which one amongst the actual symbol, which are divided and sensitive, it isn't changeable, or composed, or ties to the created things?[574]

56. And because Moses saw those realities, the realities standing before him were seen. So, the seen realties were ither seen into light or they were in another light. But all the realities from there were simple. So, all those realities were luminous light. But, because Moses saw those realities after he exceeded on himself and so he reached into darkness, he didn't' see those realities either through senses or with his mind. So, that light is self-seeing[575] and it hides, in the same sense as exceeding, from them who haven't become eyeless[576]. This is for, what could be seen like, in some way, through the work of the mind, that that itself sees and understands on itself (το αυτοπτικον χαι αυτονόητο)? But, when the mind has been elevated above all the mental work and when the mind is eyeless, in sense of exceeding, the mind will be filled up with an above-all-beauty shininess, reached into the grace of God, and through that above-mind union having, mysteriously, and seen the light itself that through itself sees on itself. But how? Isn't the godhead still hidden? - someone could ask. By no means. The godhead

[572] About the Life of Moses 1; G.P. 44: 321 A. Relatedly to Barlaam's affirmation, that the light seen by saints it has no consistency, but it is a hallucination that now appears and then disappears, Saint Gregory Palamas, on the ground of the writing of Saint Gregory of Nyssa, he shown the consistency of the light also through its duration. This is for, Moses looked at it for forty days and nights.

[573] A symbol, in addition to the fact that it is sensitive, it must have a shape too, in order to be able to express an aspect of the godlike or spiritual life. But that life itself, it is without an exterior shape, despite having an internal structure. The various aspects of its internal structure are live concentratedly and intensively, and not in the variety of the external shapes. The godlike light, as spiritual reality, it is shapeless as well. It is lives in intensity as spiritual ambience of the godlike Person, and it is not seen as shape, though in it one feels the structures of the supreme Persons.

[574] Even the simplicity of the seen godlike light, it shows the fact that the godlike light is lived into intensity, and not in the juxtaposed horizontality or in the changeable succession of the shapes. It is a unitary intensity, but complex, of the godlike Person, or of the godlike Persons united through being.

doesn't come out of its hiding, but the godhead gives Himself, as a gift, to others too, and so the godhead hides them too, under the godlike darkness[577]. This is for, as it is written, Moses reached alone into that darkness, he was no longer seen (Exod. 24: 18). And what is even more than that, it is that, by elevating him above himself, and by mysteriously detaching him from himself, and by placing him above all the work of the senses and of the mind, God hid Moses from Himself – oh, wonder! – as God did to godlike Paul too[578]. Thus, by seeing, they didn't know, but they asked on themselves: what is that that we see?[579] And, again, what exceeds any overwhelming of the wondering, it is the fact that in this untold and above-nature showing too, That One remains in hiding. And to them who have been untied and hidden from all realities, He covers not [577] One must notice this ingenious answer. As in the whole this development, here too is felt the influence of Saint Gregory of Nyssa, namely of his writing The Life of Moses. God doesn't come out of His hiding, because he doesn't rationalize Himself on our level, He doesn't make Himself understood in banal, usual manner. But God elevates the spiritualized person in the exceeding darkness of His full of mystery and heavy of fulness existence. The spiritualized person will know or will understand now the non-understood as such, or what is above the usual understanding. He is in the non-understood or above-understanding darkness of the supra-obvious light. That one now has something within him that makes himself as non-understood by other people, for he is hidden into the darkness of the mystery that exceeds him and that is, in the same time, supra-luminous.

[578] And he even appears as non-understood to himself too, hidden into the exceeding darkness of the mystery: the supra-luminous darkness. The more the human being reduced himself to the biological processes, the more he appears to himself as more understood, but, in the same time, he won't understand anything of what he actually is. There is a darkness with the perfect pretense of knowledge (that darkness that is reduced to the banal reality) and there is also a darkness of the endlessly rich and complex deeps, a darkness which, just by recognizing it, it offers us an overwhelming light and an endless reserve of advancing into it. The more we really know on ourselves, the more we appear to ourselves as non-understood, as fuller of mystery, as more hidden to ourselves; or, vice versa, the more we appear to ourselves as non-understood, the better we know on ourselves. But these endless deeps of ours, are unveiled to us when we live in the godlike infinite.

[579] Moses and Paul were to themselves, so hidden into mystery, so non-understood in that sight that they had, so that they didn't know who and what was him who saw or what was the one seen through them. They only realized that weren't they who were seeing, because of what they saw and the power for seeing that, exceeded their power of seeing. But the paradox is that the sight was done through them, so, form this point of view, they enjoyed themselves the benefit of seeing. A stranger subject that was exceeding their subject, he was working within their subject, or that subject gave their subjects power to see. Their subject was framed into a stranger subject, one endlessly superior to them, but who didn't annul the existence of the won subject. This was because they benefited of that sight, as it would have been their own sight, and they were able to wonder about a sight that, not being theirs, it became theirs.

only all the others, but He covers them even to themselves[580]. And the proof for this above-knowledge hiding, it is the desire and the ask and the ascension of Moses to a clearer seeing. But also, a proof for that is the unceasing advancing of the angels and of the saints in the endless age, to ever clearer sights. So, also by seeing, they know that that light is above-seeing. How much more will they know God Who shows Himself through them?

This is for, our eye too, by focusing on the sun's disk, and by seeing it, it knows that is above-seeing.

57. But let nobody stick with this example because it is totally inappropriate. Let the understand only that much, that they who see the godlike light into unveiling, they know the overwhelming hiding not less but a lot more than we who, by attempting to comprised the non-comprised of the godlike nature through symbols, or through their meanings, or through negation, we know that that non-comprised is non-comprised.

This is for, the blind knows too, by hearing and by believing, that the sun's brightness exceeds the measure of the sensitive eyes; but the blind doesn't know that as him who sees[581]. And at night, the sun can be seen only, with the mind, [580] Although, at that time the cause that produces them that, it remains hidden, they who see that, they realize that it is a Person, that it is the godlike or supreme Person, and that is That One (εκείνος). That one is also the One Who sees within them, and it is not about an impersonal power. Actually, if there was only an impersonal power that was seeing within them, that impersonal power would become theirs, because of only they being subjects and only a subject can be conscious that he sees. Only by the fact that what sees within them, namely that supreme Person Who can see what they cannot see, for that Person gives them His sight, as a gift, that Person remains, in the same time, Subject of that sight, a Subject that respects other subjects. This is for, a subject, by attracting other subject sin the union with him, that subject doesn't annul the other subjects. The subject that gives gifts, by imprinting another subject, he helps that subject too, to understand what gift he was given, or, at least, the love he manifested by giving him that gift.

[581] They who benefit of this sight, they are aware of the fact that what is shown like light and what is seen as such through them who see it, it is a superior person, one that even as person is an inexhaustible spring of light, so, all the more as godlike Person, and they are aware of these aspects due to the fact that they always want to see more of it and to ascend to an increased sight (Saint Gregory of Nyssa*, About the Life of Moses* 2; G.P. 44; 376 D – 377 A). But even in the content of the shown light one can see the spring of that light as being a Person, likewise in the light communicated us by another person we see and we feel that that light belongs to a specific person. Through light, I am placed in relation with the person who communicated me that light. And the person makes obvious to me, through the light that person communicates to me, a more complex and a deeper indefinite than that intuited by me when that person is not present. Likewise, the godlike non-comprised, I living it more not only by them who have the experience of a healthy sight, but even by anyone amongst them who do not have eyes but they listen to them who can see. And not only that, but he who hasn't eyes, he can know also that the disk of the sun has an above-sight brightness; but the blind to be shared with the sunlight and to have that light, it is impossible[582].

Likewise, seeing God with the mind and knowing God above-mind, through negation, it can happen to them too who briefly experienced seeing God, as also to them who haven't raised towards Him that above-mind eye of the union, but they listen to them who did that. But the sight of the last ones, it won't be union. And he who doesn't believe them who see through that above-mind union, he can as well reckon God as above-mind, but only above his mental powers[583]. But, he who has plucked off, from his soul, all the ties to the realities from below, and who untied himself from everything, by keeping the commandments and by the dispassion that come to his out of complexly, more richly, and more deeply, in that light which it is communicated to me through, than through the void of the negative theology.

[583] Continuing the idea of the quoted saint, Gregory Palamas declares that there is a knowledge about God, with the mind, and that is the knowledge belonging to the affirmative theology of knowing God out of creatures; and there is also an above-mind knowledge, by negating all realities. Finally, there is a third knowledge, that is superior to the first two, and that is a knowledge through union with God. The knowledge by negating all realities, it is reckoned by Saint Gregory Palamas as being also above-mind, for some people benefit of it on the ground of experiencing God, and others benefit of that knowledge for, despite they haven't raise their above-mind-eye to the union with God, they faithfully listen to the first ones. The faith too, it is an eye of that above-mind-sight, though not of a direct sight, but of a mediated sight. As such, by making negative theology, that negative theology isn't limited to a simple rational exercise, neither it stops to the notion of an impersonal pantheistic absolute in Neoplatonic sense, but that negative theology believes in that God-Person expresses through negation. Actually, one can believe only to a God-Person. Only that faith in a God-Person, it is actually a faith. The faith is an interpersonal act. The faith is and act of trust, it is a moral act, it is an act of love. He who believe into a person, he is in a personal relation with that person. Our faith comes out of a work of a person upon us. The faith sees the Person of God for the faith is helped by an above-mind power, a power that comes from God-Person. Saint Gregory Palamas threw a bridge between seeing and living God, and the rational negative theology, so that Palamas Christianized the rational negative theology, namely helping the rational negative theology to know God not as an impersonal non-comprised, but as a Person-non-comprised.

doing so, and who, then, he has been elevated above any knower work, through the perseverant, clean, and immaterial prayer, and there, through an unknown union – in sense of exceeding – he is veiled up in an unapproachable shininess, only him, for he has become luminous light and for he has been deified through light, and by seeing light, he knows in this sight and in this impartation with light, also what is above-light and non-understood out of God. he reckons God not only as above the human mind's power of understanding – because there are, above-mind, also many among the created realities – but even above the all-supra-natural sight, the only one that unites the mind with the realities which are beyond the aspects of the intelligible realities "in a godlike and above-heavens union of the minds"[584].

58. But there have been enough things said about these. By resuming the aspects which we have been treating, we say that if somebody wants to call this sight as above-seeing (την υπερ θἐαν ορασιν), that understanding above all the sight of the mind, he won't differ at all from us[585]. But this philosopher, by reckoning that we call these things only as "sight", and not also as a "non-understood-understanding", he got furious because of the name "sight" and, by remaining to these words, he committed many sins against the prophetic grace. But we, by briefly unveiling three of four of these sins, we are going to let the other sins aside. So, this philosopher, by striving himself argue that the sight is below understanding, he says: "All the sights shown by prophets are a lot lower than the understanding, because of being contrived, described, and imagines by imagination".

[584] Dionysus the Areopagite, About the Godlike Names 1: 4; G.P. 3: 592 C. God is seen by him who is clean of passions, not only as The One Who is above mind's power, because of being there also some creatures which are above the power of the human mind – for instance, the angels -, but as One Who is even above that union itself, a union which the mind is united with the realities which are above those realities which can be understood by the human mind. But God is above in His quality as Subject and spring of His manifestation and, as such, he still is present within them.

[585] Saint Gregory Palamas admits this above-sight-seeing to be called as understanding. But it is an understanding that is above the work of the mind, and therefore it is a non-understood-understanding and an above-understanding understanding. The difference between such an understanding and such a sight it is very fluid on spiritual plan. The understood reality is so intensely lived, that it is like a reality perceived through a feeling, similar to a spiritually touched, to a spiritually seen, and to a spiritually heard reality. There is being accomplished a contact between our spirit and that reality.

The fact that most of the prophets saw the most visions while they were elevated into the state of ecstasy (of getting out of themselves), it is not doubted by anyone who listen to the prophets' words. But what are we going to say? Were the prophets seeing God, while they were experiencing an ecstasy towards the worst things? But God Himself says that He showed Himself to Moses "in image and not through riddles" (Num. 12: 8)[586]. Did Mose experience the ecstasy towards the evil thing, even then? But what Moses saw and heard while he remained in ecstasy for forty days and while he was imparted with that imageless life under darkness (Exod. 24: 18)? Did he experienced the going out of himself towards the evil things? He who writes such things, he will have totally gone out of truth.

59. But the philosopher commits here a twofold sin. This is because he lies to us, by arguing that the Great Dionysus cogitates here too, as the philosopher does, and so Dionysus declares all the prophetic visions as inferior to understanding, by quoting from Dionysus's writings the words: "God is named form other godlike imaginings (από τινων θείων φανταςμάτων), which illuminates the initiated ones or the prophets, according to other and other causes and powers"[587]. But this one says here too, limpidly, that God showed Himself "according to other causes and powers". God, as Himself says, "He showed Himself to somebody in his dream, to another in state of watchfulness, namely through riddles; and to Moses in image and not through riddle". Then, how the prophets saw only through the soul's imaginative power?

But, also the godlike imagination (φανταςία) ois very different form our human imagination. This is for, the godlike imagination truly imprints our really cogitating and incorporeal side. The human imagination, though, it unfolds in our soul's side that is close to our body[588]. What receives there the [586] God shows Himself to Moses "in image and not through riddles", in the sense that God Himself talked to Moses "mouth to mouth" and Moses "saw His glory" (Num. 12: 8). But this means a going out of Moses, from himself, towards the higher realities. Moses is so much kidnapped by the greatness of the Person of God, so that Moses no longer thinks at himself, or he forgets about himself, namely he "goes out of himself". It is what happens, actually, but on a smaller degree, when somebody is kidnapped by the wonderful charm of a human interlocutor.

[587] About the Godlike Names 1: 2; G.P. 3: 597 A.

[588] The godlike imagination has a spiritual character, but it also has a structure and endless possibilities to imprint one or another of God's structures or intentions into the human imagination, for the human imaginations contains in itself, at its turn, indefinite structures and imprinting, it is the highest part of the rational soul; while, over here, it is almost the last part of the souly powers. This one is imprinted in the movements of the senses; here, if you want to find out who produces the imprinting into the cogitating power of the prophets, you listen to the Great Basil who says: "The prophets saw by the fact that the Ghost was imprinting Himself in the leading part of theirs"[589]. So, the Holy Ghost is The One Who placed Himself within the prophets' mind and, by using their understanding as a material matter, He foretells in it, through Himself, the future, first to the prophets and, through them, to us too[590].

So, how could be this work of the Ghost simply an imagination of the same kind and of the same honor with our imagination? And how could be this imagination below our understanding? Better said, how isn't shown out of this too, that that is a light seen by the mind and that that is something else than the understanding; and that is about visions which aren't either sensitive or imagined, but they are totally different from the knowledge out of cogitation?

60. But the philosopher brings also another word belonging to the same one (Dionysus), that says: "The angels who shaped the sight, in order to introduce the speaker-about-God in the godlike realities". "And here, he says (Barlaam), by saying: he shaped (διαπλάσας), he showed that is about intentional possibilities, which can be imprinted on the face of the man, in his eyes, in his words, in his mimic, and in his stances, in diverse ways.

[589] At Prophet Isaih; G.P. 30: 124 B.

[590] The Ghost imprints Himself into the mind of the prophets as One Who know the future, and for He wants to herald something about that future. So, the Ghost Himself heralds a certain thing through the prophets' mind, firstly to them, and then, through them, to others too. The Holy Ghost imprints Himself, as Subject, into the prophet's subject, with one of His intentions, and by that the Ghost takes the "shape" of the mind, of the mind is configurated in its understanding, according to what the Holy Ghost communicated to the mind. The mind will us the imagination in order the mind to understand and to transmit what the Ghost communicates to the mind. This is for, the imagination gives shape to the realities which are above-shapes. But the Ghost Himself helps the mind in this adaptation of the imagination to what the Ghost communicated to the mind. So, there is a (virtual) imagination, or a power that leads the human imagination towards understanding and transmitting the things communicated by the Holy Ghost and into the Holy Ghost. The godlike virtual imagination works upon the human imagination. The last one is imprinted by the first one. They are no longer separated, but the first one takes place and it is actualized in the last one, and it shown itself as imprinted in the last one. The idea and the expression of imprinting are used by Saint Maximos the Confessor when speaking about the imprinting of the godlike will of Christ into His human will (Opusc. Theol.; G.P. 91: 80 D). imagination. This is because, nothing among the things which are contemplated by the mind, it doesn't get shaped through itself".

So, if somebody agrees this philosopher, that somebody will suspect that also the heavenly Principalities and Powers, they experience an ecstasy inferior to the understanding (a going out towards the realities which are below understanding), and that their sights are bodily and products – oh, wonder! – of the imagination. And not only their sights, but themselves their hypostases and their substantial existences, will be resemblant to imagination. This is because, the same saint says in the eight chapter of the "Heavenly Hierarchy", by extolling the names which the holy Principalities are expressed: "Their lordship is full of the longing for the true origin of their lordship and they shape themselves and they shape the realities from after them, with kindness, towards a similar lordship[591]. If, therefore, among the things which the mind sees through itself, nothing was shaped and all the shapes ones are products of the imagination or sensitive things, and, consequently, they are way below the things we cogitate, then, likening the Principalities and the Power to God it won't be done on the plan of the understanding, but it will be bodily and imagined and below the human understanding, as one that is contrived. And if their likeness to God is such, how could they be intelligible (spiritual) according to their nature?

61. But the philosopher deduces the same thing, also out of another word of the same saint: "When you hear about the angel that imprints (shapes = τυπουντος) the sight, by conveying to the speaker-about-God, according to his power, his holy knowledge", "how could not be the imprinted sight, he says, something imagined (contrived)?".

But we are going to topple him over, again, with the help of the "Heavenly Hierarchy". "The holy groups of the heavenly beings, he says, by shaping on themselves in an intelligible manner (spiritually), towards imitating God, and by wanting to shape their cogitating image towards resembling to the godlike origin, there are imparted, rightly so, with a richer godlike communion"[592]. Can you see that there are also intelligible imprintings (τυπος νοητοὺς)? How, then, on the ground of these names, could you reckon that the prophets experience the inferior ecstasy (the going out of themselves towards the evil or the lower things)? This is because, from these expressions, I cannot reach to reckon the visions of the prophets as below the human cogitation, but rather as above our minds and I learn to known the fact that these visions of theirs are similar to those of the angels[593]. This is for, the prophets, due to their cleanness, they became fit for the union with the angels, and, by tending towards godhead the prophets were united with the angels, the prophets were shaped and imprinted by angels, as the angels too are shaped and imprinted by the more advanced angels, and so they change their spiritual image towards a countenance of godlike shape. And through this shaping, they deepen and cultivate to themselves, as a good belonging to them, the holy knowledge descended from there. And what will be so odd, if the prophetic cleanness is shaped by imprintings alike those of the angels? This is for, by being together-servants with the angels in speaking about God, the prophetic cleanness is recognized that it can receive in itself the imprinting of God[594].

[592] The Heavenly Hierarchy 4: 2; G.P. 3: 180 A.

[593] Barlaam reckoned that any shaping or imprinting is done on a sensitive material. He didn't admit that there can take place also an imprinting of something godlike, into understanding; what is imprinted it will preserve the godlike character, and what receives the imprinting or the shaping, it will preserve the human character. From here, Barlaam deduced that everything that is imprinted into mind, that will lower the mind on an inferior level. So, itself what is imprinted it would have an inferior character, if it is not even a contrivance of the mind, one close to the bodily shapes. Saint Gregory Palamas shows, a contrary, that there is also an imprinting of an intelligible and even godlike reality, into the human mind or understanding, one that doesn't lower the mind to sensitive sights. The mind is shapes or it is imprinted by the godlike realities in a spiritual manner, as for instance by the superior understanding, by the clean joy, by the love for every good thing etc. This is for, even the angels, who are totally understanding beings, or incorporeal, they are shaped or they are imprinted by the godlike goods, and they live those goods within them, and they become like those goods, or according to their godlike model.

[594] By serving God as the angels do, the prophet can receive as well, themselves the imprintings from God (τουσ του θεου τύπος). The imprinting from God, like that produced by angels, it is shown not in a material contrivance introduced in the prophets' mind, but it is shown in the urge to serve God, like the angels have it. The appeal of the superior Person of God, it produces into the human mind, as answer, the will to serve. Of course, that, in its showing, this urge to serve externally through the body, it passes from the character of a spiritual imprinting to a material form. But in mind, or in understanding, or into soul, it doesn't take such a form, but it is manifested in certain spiritual states and tendencies of the soul. These states and tendencies have also a general character of "type" or "model" for other people. For instance: the humble, gentle behavior, it represents a 'type" that can be imitated

"This is for, the clean heart, he says, it is that that it presents its mind to God, shapeless (ανεἰδεον) and prepared for being imprinted with the imprintings (models) of God, which God usually shows Himself through"[595].

62. Zachariah of Barachias, he taught that even the ghost from within us is shaped (πράττεσθαι) by God, showing either the bringing anew of the ghost, from what doesn't exist, to existence, by God, or the reshaping and transforming of the ghost towards the good existence[596]. "The breath of the word of the Lord over Israel, says the Lord, He Who stretches the sky and founded the earth and contrived the ghost of the man into him" (Zachariah 12: 1). So, what are we going to say: will there be body also the ghost from within us, because of being shaped (contrived) when it is brought to existence, or transformed?

And He Who shapes, being begged, He is good to them who desire Him.

And he who tells us that he was shaped when still being a child, as friend, by the great pedagogue of the Pont (Basile the Great?) "With that good and all-clean shaping", does he praise by others. Thus, any man has, on one hand, a strictly personal character, and on the other hand, if some dominant traits have been intensified in him, he becomes a 'type" to others.

[595] Τοισ ενσημαίνεσθαι τύποις, δτων εμφανης πεφυκε γίνεσθαι. This text is taken from Mark the Hermit, Heads about Watchfulness 24; G.P. 65: 1064 B. See also Saint Maximos the Confessor, Gnostic Heads 2: 82; G.P. 90: 1164 A; The Romanian Philokalia, volume II, p. 199. For God Himself makes Himself shown through certain imprintings imprinted to the soul, these imprintings exist virtually in God too, as intentions to develop, in good, the human and angelic subjects, according to their models from within God (logoi). God has these "types" within Himself, through His features of: kindness, holiness, righteousness etc. These types are imprinted within people, who take God as their model, or who are imprinted by God's "types" in a way or another, and that makes their "rationalities", which are children of the godlike rationalities, to be developed on the line of these models. This is for, the rationalities of the human persons, as long as they exist only in the thinking of God, they still are influenced by the "mode" which God live in, in eternity. When they take a concrete existence, God behaves towards them as he behaves, from eternity, towards their shapes as thought into God, according to His living into Himself. And even themselves the rationalities of the things and of the persons into God, they are some kinds of virtual shapes which God can imprint as Person-model, actualizing them, within the persons who open themselves to God, and who strive themselves to live according to the virtual models, and by that, those persons become, as their turn, "types" to other persons. But through these "types", God Himself makes Himself known, in a benevolent descent towards people.

[596] Saint Maximos the Confessor said that, after God brought us to existence (το ειναι), God leads us, with our collaboration, to the good existence (το ευ ειναι) (Ambigua; G.P. 91: 1073). Saint Gregory Palamas adds that that is being done through the contrivance and shaping of our personal ghost.

and reckon as worthy to the desired the art of shaping the body?[597]

But how would come God to all our things, in order Him to shape our hearts, individually, as the godlike David says (Ps. 32: 15[598]), if we didn't understand through the shape heart the inside man? And Moses, by spending forty says and nights under darkness, in that shapeless life, didn't he see shapes (godlike imprintings)? "You will make all of them, He says, according to the shape (κατα τον τὑπον) shown to you in the mountain" (Exod. 25: 40)[599]. So, what are we going to say? Moses, reached into the godlike darkness, he went off himself, and he went towards the inferior realities, and he was seeing through phantasy, because it was written that he saw a shape (τυπον)?

63. But the philosopher, because he doesn't admit any difference between the intelligible and godlike (νοητων χαι θείων τὑπων) shapes (the imprintings), when he hears that the speaker-about-God perceived the realities he saw, as diverse, and that he was imparted with the sight shaped by angels, and that he was elevated at the understanding knowledge of the existing realities or of the seen realities, he deduced from here that "the knowledge is superior to sight (κρείττον γνωσις θεωρίας), because, from this one, the prophet was elevated to knowledge, and not lowered".

So, one could say that all of them who explain to us, through the unfolding of the meaning of the godlike words, they elevate us from the inferior realities towards the superior realities. So, the Lord, by giving us the Gospel on earth, as a shortened word, he would have given us something inferior. And they who interpret the Gospel, they go out of Gospel and

[598] In KJB we have: Ps. 33: 15: "He fashioneth their hearts alike; he considereth all their works."; in ROB we have: Ps. 32: 15: "He Who built their hearts, individually, He Who understands all their things". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[599] By living into a shapeless living, Moses "saw godlike imprintings" (θείους τυπους), of course, in this life of his. This is because, such forms cannot be seen in themselves. So, by receiving such imprintings, the life of Moses didn't receive material shapes. The life without shapes adapts to the godlike imprintings into it. Although into the mind it is imprinted the shape (the imprinting) of the tent, according to which Mose made the seen tent, the mind still doesn't take and it still doesn't receive in itself a material shape. But the "shape" of the tent comes from God, namely it exists in God, but in God too it has, and even way more so, an immaterial character. This is for, the shape of this tent is Himself the Hypostasis of the Word Who comprises all realities within Himself.

they elevate us to its understanding as to something superior? Woe, what insanity! Because, they who interpret, they do not get far from the godlike words. But, by talking out of those words, the knowledge, as out of some springs of the knowledge, and as out of a fountain of the eternal light, they give that to us too, and they elevate us from the nescience that we are in, to knowledge, as to something superior. In such cases, the explanations show sometimes the movement, and some other times the cause.

When, therefore, the Holy Scripture says that the prophet received teaching "by sight" (εκ τής θεωρίας), and that the angels elevated him from sight to teaching, it doesn't say that the angels took him aways from sight; but it says that the prophet learnt form that sight the things we didn't know before, as out of a cause of the knowledge and for the angel understood better the aspects comprised in that sight, for he was an angel, he explained that sight to the prophet and so the angels elevated the prophet from nescience to science. So, the nescience which he was removed from, it is inferior in comparison to the knowledge which he was elevated to. But the sight that gives us the knowledge, a sight that he has in himself, in a concentrated manner, according to the likeness to God, how could not that be higher than the knowledge provided by it?[600]

It was necessary, though, that him who started against our fathers, not to leave either the prophets without being despised. For they are the first fathers and fathers of the fathers into Ghost. So, it was necessary those too to be partakers to the insult brought to these ones.

[600] Out of the fact that the sight needs to be interpreted, Barlaam deduced that the interpretation means the elevation to knowledge as to a superior level of the one who sees. So, the sight would be inferior to understanding. Saint Gregory Palamas affirms that the sight isn't inferior to knowledge, for it comprises the knowledge within itself. Explaining something, it doesn't lead to something that isn't sight, but it unfolds what is in it in a concentrated manner. The sight has, as unmediated content, the reality. The explanation can get far from reality. He who sees, he has in his sight the reality known in an unmediated and concentrated manner, he has the conscience of the reality according to the likeness to God Who knows all realities in an unmediated and concentrated manner. That's why, the best explanation is provided by him who has the sight, or by the angels who has too the same sight and for he is on a higher level of understanding it. This is for, the sight has a depth of meanings that can never be exhausted, because of being itself the luminous manifestation of the Person of God in His intentions of making the creature eternal into the infiniteness of His life and love.

64. But, because of having enough with the fight against the fathers and the prophets, he who has taken, as pretext, them who embraced the appeasement, in order, to say so, him to rush against all the godlike things, he then pretends to be himself the chief interpreter of the most mysterious words of the Gospel, and he claims that he can teach what they who are clean in heart see God like, and what the Son comes together with the Father and make their dwelling within them like (Jn. 14: 23). "So, they who are clean in their heart, he says, they do not see God otherwise except by analogy (by resemblance), or according to the cause, or by negation. And he is more seer of God, he who knows more out of the world's parts, of he who know the higher ones. And even more so, he who know that he rather doesn't know. And the most seer of God of all seers, is him who knows the seen parts and the unseen powers of the world: the attraction of the elements towards earth and all the others, and the rejections of all of these among them, the differences, the features, the touches, the connections, the harmonies, and, shortly, all the told and untold syntheses of this whole. This is for, he who can better contemplate all of these, he can know God through analogy, as Cause of all of these. And by placing God above all of these, by negation, he again knows God as above all realities. This is because, he says, one knows God only out of things. Not out of what somebody doesn't know, but only out of what somebody knows, he knows God. So, the more somebody know more numerous and more important parts of the created world, and more exactly, the more he will differ from other in knowing God. And itself the mode of the knowledge of God by negation, that seems to despise the knowledge of the thing in favor of God, it cannot take place without knowing all the things. This is because, we cannot know except the negation of the things whose existence we know about"[601].

65. Woe him, for he blames himself! These things aren't at all contrary to his opinions from other places. This is because, on the other hand, he defines as consummate man, him who know everything. If, therefore, as he has declared also now, we can know only the negations of those ones and we can refer to God only the negations of those ones, whose understanding we have, God will be compelled – oh, what insanity! – to be The One known out of the negation of all realities. And then, either somebody know all the existing realities, so that out of the negation of all realties he to know God, and that one gives himself to us as another god – for only God know everything – or, if he doesn't know something, he will reckon that that something would be God. This is because, what he doesn't know, he cannot deny that to God, as himself says[602]. And again, if somebody only out of the things he knows, he knows God in His quality as their Cause, for all the things escaping his knowledge he won't reckon God as their Cause[603]. Therefore, he will measure the godlike power according to what exists in the world. This is because, he doesn't know more that there is in the world[604].

But we, by being elevated beyond knowledge, we have been entrusted that it is as easy as possible, to God to bring to existence tens of thousands of worlds, and not only similar[605] to one another, but even differing from each other. And out of all of these together, we know God, through affirmation and [602] If, according to the rational negative theology, only out of the negation of all realities which we understand, we can know God, we will be compelled either to understand all realities in order us to know God by negating those realities – and this is impossible to the human being -, or what we do not understand, that will be God, for that represents top us, through itself, the negation. Out of both sides of the alternative, it comes out an incomplete knowledge about God, and not a complete one as the negative theology claimed, by reckoning that it doesn't need another knowledge of God superior to the negative theology. The knowledge is here being conceived in a quantitatively, and not spiritually.

[603] Neither the affirmative theology can know God completely. This is because, according to the affirmative theology, God is known only in His quality of Cause of the known things. Anyway, the affirmative theology doesn't offer us a knowledge of God except of the ground of the realities from the world. This is because, only the realities from the world are known, or knowable, through the rational powers of ours. And neither they can be fully known. So, neither the affirmative theology can claim that there isn't a superior knowledge about God. Thus, neither the knowledge provided by the negative theology, not the knowledge provided by the affirmative theology, namely no kind of rational knowledge, it can express a knowledge of God that doesn't required to the completed by a knowledge superior to it. This is the knowledge out of revelation, one that implies also the knowledge by sight, or by experience.

[604] The affirmation that God can be known only through the things from the world, it means a disrespectful narrowing of God, one neighboring the pantheism.

[605] To really known God, it means to known that in Him there are possibilities for countless other worlds. To see God into light it means understanding that in Him there are countless meanings superior to those shown us by the world. Any human person could make other and other countless things, all the more can the Supreme Person do that.

negation. Even out of the things which we do not know, we know God's endlessly powerful power. So says Paul: "Christ has ascended above all names, not only of the realities which are named, namely of the realities known in the present age, but also of the realities which will be known in the future age" (Eph. 2: 20-22). So, also out of the realities which were unknown to him, Paul praises the greatness of God. Likewise, in another place of his Epistles, he asks: "Who will separate us from the love of Christ?" and by mentioning all the sensitive and intelligible realities, the ones from now and the ones to come, he adds: "No even another creation will be able to separate us from the love of Christ" (Rom. 8: 35-39). So, he passes with his sight from the inexistent things, and he speaks about them as they would exist. And if out of one, we can know tens of thousands, and if we can now out of what is limited, the limitless power, how won't be us able to know out of the few things we know about God, wholly, as we say that we know the lion by seeing his claws on a corner of the sofa? How could we not know God thus, as the Maker of all realities, and how could we not discern Him, by negation, from all realities, and how could we not add Him, by faith, to what exceeds the knowledge about God out of things?... for, out of the inexistent things, all the existent things have been created only with the word[606].

[606] So, one doesn't need to know everything in order to know God by affirmation, as Cause of all realities, and by negation, as differing from all realities. Only Barlaam as philosopher, he pretended that ne needs to know everything in order to know God by affirmation and negation. The contemplation of God as The One Who is more than Cause of all realities and contrary to all realities, it is brought by the faith. This is for the faith is a mysterious relation with God, from the initiative of God and through the openness of the man. And this experience of God, one that is born out of some kind of sight, out of some kind of unmediated "light" of God, it sees God as Person, and that Person Who was able to created the existing world, He is lived, in His freedom, as One Who could created other countless worlds too. We, as people, we do not feel ourselves strong except in the relation with another person, or with other persons. This is for, we find in them a support and a strengthening of our existence as we cannot find in things. All the more we find this support and this strengthening in the Supreme Person. Through faith, the human being feels that all the things depend, in an absolute manner, on the Supreme Person, for all of them could be brought to existence only by the word of that Person. Only another person makes the existing things to fill up a void. Only the Supreme Person could make the things coming to existing from a void, from nothing, and to be upheld in order they not to become again a void. Itself the fact that we cannot enter and remain in relation with God except by faith, it shows us that He is Person. Or, the possibility of our faith consists of the fact that God is Person. This is for, the faith is the way which we enter through and which we remain in relation with the person as person, and, therefore, all the more with God as Person.

66. This above-knowledge knowledge, it is common to all of them who believe into Christ. But the end of the true faith, one that comes only out of the working of the commandments, it doesn't provide us only the knowledge about God out of the existing realities, known and unknown (here we are understanding by "the existing ones", of course, the created realities), but out of the uncreated light that is the glory of God and of Christ God and "of them who have reached the ultimate target of the image of Christ"[607]. This is for, Christ will come into the glory of the Father, and "The righteous will shine in the glory of their Father, Christ, as the sun" (Mt. 13: 43), and they will be luminous light and they will see light, that is the wonderful and all-holy sight of the cleaned heart. It is shown so, with measure, and as an earnest, their too who have crossed, by dispassion, through all the holy realities and, by clean and immaterial prayer, they have crossed through all the clean realities. And then God will deify, manifestly, "the sons of the resurrection" (Lk. 20: 360, who will eternally be with Him and who will be glorified together with Him Who gives to our nature, as a gift, godlike glory and brightness. But the glory and the brightness are not had either by the created realities, as quality of the being of God. How could somebody reckon, then, the glory of God as being of God? This is because, by being God unimpartable, unseen, and untouchable, He makes Himself impartable, comprised, and shown, and one Ghost with them who pray to Him with a clean heart, through an above-being power, in time of prayer a sight, according to all-mysterious and untold prayer towards our common Father, for us: "Give them, He says, as I am into You and You into Me, they too to be into Us, one in truth" (Jn. 10: 21)[608].

[607] Dionysus the Areopagite, About the Godlike Names 1: 4; G.P. 3: 592 B. The knowledge about God it doesn't come only out of knowing the created things, by affirming and by negating the features of God, but especially out of the light that irradiates out of Him as Person, especially out of Christ Who has come, as Person-God, close to us, and out of them who have reached the consummation of the image of Person-Christ within them. And one reaches this state not through rational knowledge, but through the faith into Christ, as personal relation with Christ, and by strengthening this relation by fulfilling the commandments, namely by fulfilling the will of Christ Who wants a closeness between us and Him, by harmonizing our will to His will.

Of this kind it is, therefore, the seeing of God, that only they who were have been found worthy of the blesse end, they will see it in the endless age, but it was seen here too, on Tabor, by the chiefs of the apostles, and by Stephen, when he was stoned to death, and by Anthony, who was striving to appease himself, better said by all the saints, namely by all of them who were clean in heart, as he who wants can find out of their written words, or out of their lives. And I would even say that neither the prophets nor the patriarchs didn't remain without tasting out that light; better said, except by a few, all their visions, and especially the all-godlike visions didn't lack this light. This is because, otherwise, why would want to show Himself in a stranger light, He Who has His own eternal light, on behalf of the clean in heart ones, by showing Himself in a mysterious way, but still seen, as says also the Great Dionysus. Being the sight of God so, how wouldn't be this eternal light promised by Him Who blesses them who are clean in heart, but He would promise them, instead, the knowledge out of creatures, a knowledge that can be achieved by the wisemen of this time?

67. And the fact that the philosopher reckons the knowledge obtained out of creatures as the most consummate sight, he previously showed that to us, by saying: "No one will miss anything out of the overwhelming greatness of that, if he has known the seen parts of the world and the unsee powers".

But to deduce, by analogy (by comparison), from the work to the Creator, and from the good composition of the world to the above-wisdom World, that can be done by the wisemen of this time too, says Saint Gregory of Nyssa. And I would say that even the unwise and the non-believers (into Christ) can do that, as we see all the barbarians knowing a God Maker of all realities. This One must be known, necessarily, also by the theology by negation, once the Make of all realities isn't anything of the created realities. Do not have, also many amongst heretics and pagans the wisdom of the present time and the understanding about God that comes out of that wisdom? But are they blessed by the Lord? What can we say being, or above what "is", meaning, by "what is", everything that has been created. This impartation takes place into "sight". This is for, "|into sight", he who sees, he encounters, in an unmediated manner, and he is imparted with The Seen One. From The Seen One come rays into him who sees, and through those rays comes Himself as Person.

about those among Hellenes who distinguished themselves in philosophy way more than the Christians from now, and they formed they philosophical thinking on the ground of the knowledge out of creatures? Did they achieve, by that, also the blessed and eternal reward, And, nonetheless, even more than everyone, and eve more than they who didn't know anything else except they knew our Lord Jesus Christ? How wouldn't they have achieved it way much more, if God had been known out of creatures? How wouldn't have they been seers of God, more than others, due to the fact of achieving more knowledge out of creatures? But all of us know the Son, out of the parental voice that taught us from above; and Himself the Holy Ghost and itself the untold light showed us The One out of the Father, and Who was confessed as "beloved". And Himself the Son unveiled us the name of His Father and, by ascending to heavens, he promised to send us the Ghost, in order Him to remain with us forever. And Himself the Holy Ghost, by coming and by remaining with us, He heralded us and He taught us the whole truth. So, how can we know God only out of creatures, and not out of what we do not know, but out of those ones which we know?[609] I wonder, if one doesn't experience the wedding, won't he know the connection of God with the Church, because he cannot make the analogy (the comparison) with the wedding? So, will you advise all people to run away from virginity, in order they to find out the knowledge about God? But you will be shamed by Paul who, by not being married, he was the first to tell that this mystery is great "but in connection to Christ and Church" (Eph. 5: 32)[610].

68. But here comes the time to mention that godlike voice that said: "We thank You, Father, Lord of the heaven and of the earth" for, by uniting Yourself with us and by unveiling Yourself to us through Yourself, "You hid that to the wise sand to the skilled" (Lk. 10: 21; Mt. 11: 25). Skilled are they whoa re self-taught and in front of them. That's why, by hearing your saints speaking, they disregard some of them, and they misinterpret the saying of other of them; and they even dare to falsify some of their words, attempting to deceive everyone. For instance, Gregory of Nyssa, when explaining what is the sight (θεορία) of God unveiled to them who are clean in their heart, after he says that 'also the wisemen of the present time can know God out of the good composition of the world", he adds: "but it seems to me that the greatness of the Blessing says something else"[611]. Starting from here, the fathers uphold something that doesn't match the thinking of the philosopher. And the Great Dionysus the Areopagite, being preoccupied with the way which we know God in, once God isn't either intelligible or sensitive, and by answering through the question: "isn't that right one to say that, doubtlessly, not out of His being, but out of the order of the things we know God?", and then he unveils us also the all-godlike knowledge, that is, by union, above-nature, with that light that is above-shininess and above-knowledge, these ones let aside the above-mind knowledge, as being nothing, and they do not pay attention to the query form of this sentence, as that would be meaningless, but they utter that sentence as stumped of both ends, as one would argue, by it, that God can be know only out of creatures. The philosopher wasn't able to see even so little, that the word of the saint refers to the human knowledge that belongs, naturally, to everyone, and he didn't refer to that knowledge given, as a gift, by the Ghost[612]. If the man, he says, has feeling and mind, as natural power of knowledge, how will be us able to know God through those powers, because God isn't either known through senses nor through mind? Of course, not in another manner than out of the sensitive and intelligible creatures. This is because the knowledge, by being knowledge of the creatures, and that knowledge stopping at the edge of the creatures, out of these, they show him God. But they who have not only the powers of the senses and of the mind, but they have been also imparted with the spiritual and above-mind grace, they will no longer know God out of creatures, but they will know God spiritually too, for God is Ghost, namely in a way that is superior to feeling and mind, as one who have wholly become gods and who know God into God[613]. So, through this (through the union of the mind with the realties which are above-mind, o. n.), are understood the godlike ones, as the same saint says[614], and not through us - namely, for we have totally gone out of ourselves, and for we have become wholly of God. This is for, it is a higher thing to belong to God than to belong to ourselves. So are given, as gift, the godlike things to them who have been united with God.

[610] We know God not only out of the things we know about Him out of creatures, or out of direct experience, but also out of the things which we do not know. Won't be able to know about the wedding of Christ with the Church, he who doesn't have the experience of the wedding? The wedding of Christ with the Church, by being way higher that the human wedding, somebody can be elevated to understanding it, without that somebody to have, previously, the experience of the human wedding. One must not know all the created things and circumstances, in order him to be elevated at the knowledge about God.

[611] At Blessing 6; G.P. 44: 1269 B. Out of this word too, of Saint Gregory of Nyssa, one can see that the fathers do not reject the knowledge about God out of creatures. But they do not reckon, as Barlaam, that this knowledge is everything, as the scholastic theology did. The fathers admit, above the knowledge about God out of creatures, a knowledge about God by unmediated "sight" of the godlike Persons.

[612] About the Godlike Names 7: 3; G.P. 3: 869 C – 872 B. Dionysus the Areopagite, as Saint Gregory of Nyssa as well, they admitted a knowledge about God out of creatures. But they did that with some concerns. This is because, they asked: "Isn't that right to say that God" who "isn't either sensitive or intelligible", so Who isn't known either through senses or through understanding, He "isn't known out of His being, but out of creatures?". But what he admits with certitude, it is the fact that this God Who is above-senses and above-understanding, we know Him through the union with Him. Barlaam took from what Dionysus said, only the knowledge about God out of creatures, one that was admitted by the saint with some doubt, and Barlaam changed the interrogative form of the sentence in an affirmative one. Barlaam disrobed this sentence of its interrogative character, as also of the fact that Dionysus speaks in it about the natural knowledge which all the people have the necessary power for, and not about that knowledge through the Holy Ghost which are imparted with, only they who believe into Christ, and especially so they who are clean in their heart.

[613] Palamas is developing here, in continuation, the interpretation he has given to the quoted sentence belonging to Dionysus. He says: if the people have as knowledge powers only the sense and the understanding, and because God doesn't fall either under senses or under understanding, God won't be known through those natural power, except out of creatures. But they who receive the Ghost, as a power of knowledge that is above the natural ones, they will know Him in an unmediated manner, through the union with Him.

69. Can you see that he gets us far from the will of trying to known God out of creatures, by unveiling us another knowledge that is above-nature, and godlike, and spiritual, one that comes to us, after negating the creatures, through that above-mind union? For he has said that through it are given, as gifts, the godlike realities, and through they are due to be known, namely spiritually and not according to ourselves, once we do not receive the knowledge about God neither through senses nor through mind. This is because, this knowledge is non-consummate, and because it is appropriate only to the non-consummate cogitations. But what wanted the saint to say by mentioning the words "I wonder if not" in connection to the that according-to-us-knowledge about God, a knowledge that comes to us out of creatures? – these words being overlooked by the philosopher as redundant. For we have seen the light and we have heard the voice of God in a mysterious way both with our sensitive eyes and ears, the philosopher thought that he can say that one can know God only out of creatures and through the man's powers of knowledge. But, to them who can catch the exact meaning of the saint's words, it will be obvious that the saint teaches clearly that only that beginner knowledge about God it comes from knowing the creatures. That's why the Saint added: "from this one we ascend to what is beyond all realities, on a certain way, and according to a certain order, according to each one's power"[615]. That's why, that kind of knowledge was appropriate to them from before the Law, who still were children regarding the knowledge about God[616]. And they say about Abraham that he took the beginning of his knowledge from that one, but later on, he no longer spoke and he no longer knew God only through that. What we can say, then, about Job, who, by seeing God limpidly, he was shouting out: "With the hearing of my ear I heard You before, but now my eye has seen You" (Job 42: 5). What can we say about Moses, in that beyond-beings darkness, for forty days? Actually, it was appropriate that to the non-consummate in knowledge, to be placed to them, before the unseen realities of God, the seen realities of the world, as also to the unveiled senses was given the knowledge about God, out of Law, throughs sensitive symbols. Or, again, as there are some people who have been imparted with a knowledge about the more consummate realities, and more unveiled knowledge of the realties from outside God, likewise there are they who looked at the unseen realities of God, as did it Moses and Paul, and they alike them, although we are guided towards those realities by the realities which we can see.

[615] Ibid; G.P. 3: 872 A.

70. But what's your pursuit, you philosopher, with your sophisms of many sorts, oblique and ill conceived, as for instance with the affirmation that "he who knows about a certain thing that that thing exists and it has cause and it has power, he must know also what that thing is, and then its cause and then its power". If somebody said that God cannot at all be known out of creatures, you would be right to ask for such things, answers to these questions, answers required by any rational being. But, once we place ourselves above the knowledge that is common to everyone by nature, the knowledge of the mysteries of God, a knowledge that comes through the Ghost, what would you benefit, you who resist this knowledge, answers like these which belong to the very-beginner knowledge about God, knowledge that one gains it out of creatures?[617]

But you got accustomed to oppose. Because the spiritual people say that there is not only knowledge, but there is also a light seen by the mind, you strive yourself to demonstrate, in details, that also what is called knowledge it is a light too; and, by opposing, you know that you overcome everyone by that. "Without this beginner knowledge, there won't be anybody rational, he says, as there won't be either advancement of the rational one towards consummation". Of course, there won't be somebody a man before being, previously, a child. But if he has become a man, he will leave the things of the child. And if, while being a man, he still cogitates at the things of the child and he praises himself with them, how won't he become a laughing

[617] Barlaam, in his quality as philosopher, he claimed that they who affirmed that they saw God into light, to answers questions which are asked only in the case of knowing a certain created thing: what the substance of the respective thing is and what is its unity and its cause and its power? Saint Gregory Palamas shows him that those questions were already answered by the fact that they who know God into light, they knew God, previously, out of creatures. If they didn't know and didn't recognize God out of creatures, Barlaam could ask them for an answer to those questions, in order him to know what is God Whom they experience by "sight". But thus, one must suppose that in God Who is seen by through experience, there are involved the characters which the rationality asks for, but they are, in the same time surpasses.

stock? And how won't experience that, he who says that he is a Christian, but he still occupies himself with the Hellenes' sciences, attempting to pick up, out of those, the fruit of the knowledge about God?[618]

72. And then, what do you want to say by arguing that: "If the rational part of the soul is ill, how can it become understanding by industriousness?". Really ill it is the rationality of that soul that reckons his understanding worthier of trust than the words of the Ghost, and that doesn't cherish the godlike commandments as a great and consummate medicine of the souls. This is because, he said before that these ones can clean up a half of the soul; but now, by abolishing all their cleaning power, he attributes it to the knowledge, by saying that the beginning, the middle, and the end of the knowledge about God, of the health of the soul, and of the cleanness, they come from knowing ever-more things and everything; and that we must not, by any means, to ignore the many realities, if we want to reach something everywhere, but we must achieve the encyclopaedical knowledge about creatures, if we want to be us found worthy of those understandings alike the angels, unitary and undivided[619].

This is, therefore, as somebody would say that he who wants to see an undivided number, he must see that number, first, in its many divisions, and the unity isn't noticed by making abstraction from the many, but only by summing them up. But one must know that that what results out of summing up, that one can be also divided in it parts. But that is about [618] Saint Gregory Palamas admits the need for knowing God out of creatures, as also the need one to cross through that knowledge. But he reckoned that knowledge as characteristic to those who still are children, from spiritual point of view. They who have progressed spiritually, they must be elevated higher, to that knowledge through "sight", through experience. Barlaam reckoned the first one as the sole possible to everyone.

[619] Because Barlaam conditioned the knowledge about God on the skillfulness of the logical knowing of the creatures, and because not everybody has this skillfulness, he deduced that nobody can heal this illness by guarding the commandments of God. By that, he condemned the majority of the people to a fatal nescience about God, and he reserved that knowledge to the speculative philosophers or, in the best scenario, to the scholars too. That was a conception of fatal intellectual aristocratism, one parallel to the social aristocratism, or of an impossible to mend division of the people related to the participation to the godlike goods. Palamas, according to the Holy Scripture, he affirmed - on the opposite - everyone's capacity, even of the simple people, of knowing God, and of participating, by that, to God, and he deemed that as depending on the people's will to clean themselves of evil.

One Who is without parts[620]. And I know, as one who has found out from the fathers, by even listening up to some of them and believing them, that both these many and the whole sensitive world, they looked at them not by senses, neither by reasoning, but by a power and a grace characteristic to the deified mind, a power and a grace that make the things which are far away, to be under the eyes, and which shows the future things, in an above-manner way, as being present[621]. Of course, the speaker-about-God form the Areopagus, he extolls the Maker of the nature also out of the things which belong to us by nature[622]. And that's no wonder. This is for, only Him is the One praised also by the inanimate and without senses and non-rational and irrational realities too; once only to Him is due, eminently, the worshipping into Ghost, which God Himself said about, that [620] Barlaam admits that the knowledge about God must be the result of a unification of the diverse knowledge. But this unity of theirs, in order to be as comprising as possible with the rich unity of God, according to Barlaam it must be composed of as much knowledge as possible. Palamas argued that the unity of God doesn't' correspond to a summing up of the parts. This is because, it that had been the case, the unity of God could have been divided again too.

[621] By reckon g that to The One God, the man cannot ascend except by concentrating all available knowledge, Barlaam conceived God in the impersonal sense of a unit that can be divided too, or that actually is divided in the form of the world; Palamas opposed to Barlaam the God-Person Who is One, and His Tri-personality, namely a unit that cannot be divided, though God can manifest Himself in indefinite works and in their results. According to Palamas, God as One, He is beyond the impersonal pantheistic unity of the reality, and therefore God is beyond the possibility of being reached by unifying all the knowledge. One reaches God by union with Him into love. God's unit is transcendent to the synthesis of the parts of the creation, or to the knowledge. God's unit is the living, original, and indestructible unit of the Person. That's why also at the connection with God, one reached not by unifying the knowledge, similar to the fact that at the unity of the subject one doesn't reach by summing up the knowledge about the part, which the subject manifests through (Dionysus the Areopagite, About the Godlike Name 1: 4; G.P. 3: 589-592). One reached this unity through a leap done by the mind with the help of the grace, or by active and loving openness of the human subject to the godlike Subject; namely, for the human subject lets himself to be caught in the loving current that comes from the godlike Subject – and not by summing up the many aspects of the reality known through senses and through reasonings (About the Godlike Names 2: 12).

[622] Palamas admits that Dionysus admitted as well, a knowledge about God that comes out of the various multitude of the creatures. But the mind must exceed this multitude through the intuition ("sight") of Him Who is One as Person, by extolling Him as the Maker and the Upholder of all realities (About the Godlike Names 1: 5; G.P. 3: 593 D). Here isn't only about a summing up of the parts of the creation and of the knowledge about creation, but it is about a surpassing of them, by ascending on another plan, to a unity that is different from the unity of the world's parts.

that is the only true worshipping, the only one worthy of God and the only one that God wants.

73. But out of the words of the Great Dionysus, which the philosopher quoted, without noticing that he did that against himself, by letting aside the others because of their multitude, I am going to mention here only the last one. This one says, in the first chapter form The Churchly Hierarchy: "And the common goal of the whole hierarchy it is the zealous love for God and for the godlike realities, whom they serve in a godlike and unitary manner. And before this, the full and without return getting far from the contrary ones, the knowledge about the realities which are in their quality as existences (as creatures), the seeing and the knowing of the holy truth, and the deified impartation with the unitary consummation"[623]. Out of these ones, the philosopher deduces the followings: "The hierarchy is the greatest amongst the things given us by God. And the hierarchy's purpose if the knowledge of the existing realities (of the creatures), as this quote teaches us. So, the best thing from within ourselves it is the knowledge about the existing realities (of the creatures), namely the philosophy".

What he says likens to what Dionysus said, but only related to the sound of the words and not to their holy meaning. This is because, the Saint says that the true knowledge of the existing realities "it is the total getting far from the contrary realities", namely abstaining from committing the evil deeds, and that must precede the sanctified, deified, and unitary work. And this is because, as well him who is carried away by the evil deeds he lusts of what seems good to him, but he shows, by deeds, that he doesn't know what is really good; also, he who is dominated by anger, he wages war to him who opposes what seems good to him; and, simply speaking, everyone who persevere in an evil life, they persevere in a live that seems good to them, but not in a life that is really good. Only him who has got far from evil and who has rejected his ill opinion, only him reckons as evil the things which are really evil, and only him has the true knowledge of the existing realities (of the creatures), and not only an apparent knowledge. That's why, only the getting far from the evil things it is knowledge about the existing realities in their quality as existing realities (creatures); and, as such, it precedes to that sanctified, deified, and unitary work. And the sanctified, deified, and unitary work, it is the keeping the God's commandments, and that is being achieved by running away from evil and through the persevering and zealous love for God and for the godlike realities.

This is, therefore, the common goal of the entire hierarchy" to hate the things which are contrary to God's commandments and to love God's commandment and to love God Who gave them to us, and, for due to the love for God, the people to live under God's commandments. This is the knowledge of the existing realities (of the creatures), in their quality as existing; this is the seeing of the truth; this is the impartation with consummation; this is, the feasting with the spiritual sight, one that is unveiled, according to the promise, and it illuminates, it deifies, and it nourishes, in an understanding manner, on everyone who, through the cleanness of their heart, they live in it in an understanding manner, or, better said: spiritually.

74. But himself Dionysus obviously says that. This is for, by later on interpreting his own words, for them who do not want to understand the godlike realities and who attempt to crook his words according to they wrong opinions, he said: "I said, therefor, with holiness, he says, that this is the goal of our hierarchy: our likeness to God and our unition with God, as much as possible. And to that we are going to reach, as the godlike words teach us, only through the loves and through the holy works. This is for: "he who loves Me, he says, he will keep My words and My Father will love him and We will come to him and We will make to Us a dwelling place within him" (Jn. 4: 24).

Can you see what he calls as the real knowledge of the existing realities (of the creatures)? - the working of the commandments. And which is the end of those ones? – the union with God and the likeness to God. But why he called this likeness as love? – for the love is the fullness of the virtues; and by entering the image, he accomplishes his consummate likeness to God. And by the words "in godlike and unitary manner" and through "the sanctified work", he showed the keeping of the commandments, the exclusive motion towards God and towards the godlike realities. This is for the good won't be a good if it is not done only for good. The getting far form contrary evil, the knowing of the existing realities (of the creatures) and the sanctified seeing and knowledge of the truth, at their turn, they show the hatred for passions, the disgust for sin, and the running away from sin without ever tuning back to sin.

Finally, "through the unitary consummation" and through "the godlike impartation with The One" and "through that look that nourishes and deifies in understanding manner", he showed the promised godlike visiting and dwelling, one that consummates through union and it nourishes the eye through sight, the spiritual eye[624].

75. So, if only by keeping the commandments it will come the true knowledge and the true union with and likeness to God, what the philosopher calls as knowledge it will be a false knowledge, he limpidly says, at the beginning: "Out of keeping the commandments it is not possible to come this knowledge". And a little farther, by showing the place where this knowledge comes, he says: "It comes from not ignoring the many, neither the rationalities of the things; better said, it comes from knowing all the things and from striving to find out everything that somebody announces that he knows, whether Hellenes or Egyptians, so that he won't miss anything of what was told and which are known about the nature of the world, lest by that lack him to ignore God", once, he says, God can be known only out of creatures. He does something resemblant to one who, by hearing that the body is nourished and maintained only with food, that one would say that he who wants to live, he must not lack any type of food and not to interrupt nourishing himself ever. One like this praises the useless insanity of the rich meals and the passions of the belly's covetousness, as those would be something as necessary as possible to the human life, while not wanting anything from the superior things.

Doubtlessly, God has given the cogitating part of the soul, as matter, the rationalities of the nature, but as ones which can guide to a higher knowledge. We, therefore, by taking out of them only that much that we need, we leave what exceeds that, to them who cannot receive a more consummate food. And if these ones, even after they have passed over the age of their childhood, they do not want to leave that food that is appropriate to children, we try to pluck them off, like on some monsters, from this bosom of the universe, because of no longer being that beneficial to them, and we do that as ones who use that bosom of the universe with temperance, once we have parted ourselves with that food that is no longer appropriate to us. But they, because of no longer being children, but they are consummate in evilness, they rise themselves against us, and they rather aspire to pull us too, down in their evil habit, rather than they to ascend at the due measure.

76. That's why I am saying that the Son comes with the Father and They make a dwelling place in that one "who knows the rationalities of the world; this is for that one knows the truth; and God is the Truth and the Father of the truth. But also, anyone who is knowledgeable, he leans on and he lives in what he knows. So, he who has the knowledge of the things, he will be steadfastly founded into God. And by having his steadfast dwelling place into God, rightly so, That One He said that He will come and He will make to Himself a dwelling place in him. This one is, he says, him who have made his mind full of understanding light". This would be the most consummate knowledge about God, as the philosopher says.

But I am hearing the Gospel saying that the devil is liar and the father of the lie[625]. And I know that through the same feeling, knowledge, and science, we embrace the contrary things too. So, he who know the truth, he knows the lie too. If, therefore, according to the philosopher's words, he who know he as well leans on and he lives in what he knows, and that's why – according to him – he who has the knowledge of the things he will be into God and God will be into him, then also the lie and the father of the lie have made a dwelling place within him, and he has his soul full of the darkness of his mind. And, actually, much darkness overshadows that soul that unveils such cogitations. I wonder, He who said: I know who are you: you are the saint of God" (Mk. 1: 24), he too has Christ in himself because of that knowledge? But he who know and who doesn't fulfill the will of God, has him steadfastly dwelling God within Him? How then "he will be beaten much" (Lk. 12: 47)? Christ tells us in Gospels that His dwelling and the dwelling of the Father, it comes out of keeping us the commandments, and the showing comes out of dwelling. But the philosopher reckons just the opposite, that the dwelling comes out of what it seems to him as apparent. And about appearance, on the opposite, he says that it comes out of knowledge, and not out of commandments, out of a knowledge which he declared before that it doesn't come, at all, out of keeping the commandments. He filled his own mind up with this sort of light and truth. And not even that he said before, about this knowledge, that it cannot be provided by the godlike commandments, but he even called it as philosophy, one that is provided by the disciplines of the philosophy. By that, he proved that such a knowledge is insanity in front of God. So, what he reckoned before as insanity, now he has declared it as being God and Word – The One Begotten of the Father. He filled up his mind with this sort of light and truth.

77. But, because through the same feeling you comprise the contrary ones too, when are you feeling yourself warm you the philosopher? When you body burns by this quality of the warmth, or when, by having your body cold, you take notice of the contrary of the warmth? Of course, when you feel the warmth within yourself, and when you burn because of that heat. So, you will truly have God within yourself when you have within your soul the godlike habit. And the truly godlike habit is the love for God. And this comes through the holy working the commandments. This is for, despite this love is since their beginning, it is also at their middle and at their end. This is for the love is God Who promised only in this His coming and His dwelling and His showing. So, you will be useful to yourself and to others, and you will be able to correct yourself and others, when you achieve, out of fulfilling the commandments such an inward state. Because now, by pretending that you want to correct others, you have proven yourself as one who breaks them and gossips them. And you break them while praising yourself as correcting them, I am going to show further on. But the obvious proof that under your mask of straightening them you rather attempt to denigrate them, it is the great zeal you manifest for not allowing your writings to be read by us, despite you wrote them intending to correct us. That is like some physician said that he prepared a very useful drink, for a sick, but then he would totally stop that sick using that drink. From here it is obvious that you knew, in advance, what it has been shown now openly, that those called by you as medicines are, instead, venoms. So, you knew from before that you hadn't been left undiscovered, when all of these had been said.

78. But, without your permission, we laid our hand on some of your writings, at the end of which you say that you want to serve towards straightening, relatedly to what one of your friends told you wrongly about the knowledge about God. And what your friend told you wrongly is this: "They who are clean in their heart the know that through the holy light that appears within them that there is God; and that God is like a light, better said God is a spring of understanding and immaterial light. And they you haven't ascended up to this work, they always look at the common Spring of the Providence: in the created realities, the kindness itself; in the living creatures, the life itself; and, simply, in all realities, they look at The One Who is everything and placed above all realities".

And that, says the philosopher, it isn't right, and I know that he said bad things about these aspects also on other occasions. This is because, by not taking heed at the word "like" added to the word light, he declared that we would say that we would know what kind of light God is. But, once we have drawn the attention upon the addition "the spring of the light", and we have concentratedly deduced that "God is the Spring of the light", we ask him what meaning is having here the word "like"? And he confessed, unwillingly, his nescience, and he asked for forgiveness. This is for, one cannot understand this word except as "somewhat like"[626].

[626] We are noticing the unliterary sense which the light seen by hesychasts and by saints it must be understood in, according to Saint Gregory Palamas. But despite the whole explanation provided by Palamas, that bad will regarding the interpretation given to this light according to Barlaam's affirmations, it has persisted up to these days at the Catholic adversaries of Palamas and of the Eastern Tradition about the godlike light, seen by the saints and which is seen through the saints. The "friend" who told Barlaam these things, it seems that it was Palamas.

But now he has been caught with something else: "By becoming obvious that he says that even to the most-advanced seers of God, God makes Himself known only from the existing realities (out of creatures), the knowledge about God that is being learnt here through the showing of an understanding light, as one that is something else than that out of creatures (out of the existing realities), it isn't, by any means, a real one".

We must answer these by saying that once it has been proven through the extended analysis which we have done it above, that God isn't known only out of the existing realities (out of creatures), but also out of the inexistent realities in the sense of exceeding, namely out of the uncreated realities[627], but also through the eternal light that is above all realities, that now is given, as gift, on the measure of an earnest, to the worthy ones, and in that endless life it will surround them endlessly, then this sight is necessarily true; and he who doesn't admit this one as true, he has fallen off the godlike knowledge.

"But the whole knowledge about God, he says, it results out of the realities from around God, and not out of the realities of God". But where have we said, in our word, that this showing isn't from "around God"? This is for, we place that light above all the realities which are otherwise, but we do not say by any means that that light is out of what God is. And you can find the speakers-of-God placing also many other visions above that knowledge about God achieved out of creatures. But they discern this one from all the other ones and they honor it eminently with the godlike name, as the only deifying showing of God.

But now we must end this "Word" that it has become too extended, and that belongs to the words we wrote in order to reject the affirmations of the philosopher in his Words about Knowledge.

[627] Here Saint Gregory Palamas is specifying which are "the inexistent realities" in comparison to the created realities, which "exist". They do not exist, for they are above what we know in a natural way – we who exist. Therefore, here isn't only about a theoretical negative theology, but it is something way more positive and fuller of existence than the created realities are.

Of Saint Gregory Palamas

Out of the Word of Saint John Chrysostom at the First Martyr Stephen[628]

"Nothing was disregarded by the disciple in his desire of following his Master, but he proved both the innocence of his soul and the manhood of his patience. That's why he was found worthy of the godlike sight. "This is for, by looking, he says, at the sky, he saw the godlike glory and Jesus sitting on the right hand of God" (Acts 7: 55). And the honor of our Savior is of such a kind, that the martyr placed it above that of the angels. "This is for, by looking, he says, at the sky, he saw the glory of God and Jesus sitting on the right hand of God"; so, the martyr saw not only the glory and the place of the unseen ones, but he even saw the Desired One Himself Whom even the heavenly armies fear of looking at (1 Pt. 1: 12). This is for, there the martyr focused his eye, where the Cherubs cover their faces; the martyr look at those realities which the Seraphs do not dare to look at (Isa. 6: 2). The martyr ascended with his sight at the endless height, and by that he was shown as above the Angels, higher than the Masteries, and beyond Chairs. This was for, he was attracted by the word of our Master, a word promised from before: "Where I am, there will be My deacon too" (Jn. 12: 26). Stephen is the first deacon of our Savior, as he is too the first martyr of the ascesis, and many became martyrs by seeing Stephen's ascesis. This is for Stephen is much loved by them who live in ascesis.

That's why he shouts out too, with his deed itself, before Paul: "You make yourself followers to me, as I to Christ" (1 Cor.

[628] Out of the Word of Saint John Chrysostom at the First Martyr Stephen, G.P. LIV, 701 and the followings.

11: 1). This is for, it is possible and it is useful to the who live in ascesis. I am too, a disciple, and I was the first one living into ascesis after the Master and I was the first to look at the realities hidden into heavens. This is for, I have seen the Son of the Father sitting on the right hand of the Father and I have seen as accomplished the word: "The Lord said to My Lord: sit at My right hand, until I will render Your enemies as floor to Your feet" (Ps. 109: 1[629]; Mt. 20: 44; Acts 2: 35; Hebr. 1: 13).

[629] In KJB we have: Ps. 110: 1: "THE Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool."; in ROB we have: Ps. 109: 1: "Said the Lord to My Lord: "Sit at My right hand, until I will place Your enemies as floor to Your feet." (E. l. t.'s n.)

Of Saint Gregory Palamas

About the Godlike and Deifying Impartation; or about the Godlike and Above-Nature Simplicity

1. Let's now see what both[630] of them say and it seems to be somewhat important: "If you say that the grace from within saints is uncreated, not because something else but for they are imparted with God, for all the creatures are imparted with God – for God crosses through all of them and he shares to all of creatures, to some of them their existence, to some other of them, in addition to existence also the feeling and rational life, or understanding – the grace will be uncreated regarding all the creatures, to some of the creatures in order they to exist, to some other creatures in order they to survive, and to other creatures, in addition to these, in order these creatures to think and understand".

We co-speak with the saints, so that we wanted to disregard these affirmations by defending ourselves. This is for, in the Christian dogmas, the guide is the faith and not the proving. But because there are people who could be deceived by the affirmations of these two, we must ask these two, at our turn,: if you say that the grace from within saints is created, because of the fact that all the creates ones are imparted with God, to you, all the creatures will be called as holy and all the creatures will be deified by you; there will be holy not only the rational creatures, or, better said, those amongst the rational ones who are imparted with the deifying gift of the Ghost, but the irrational ones too, and even the inanimate ones. And what about the fact that some people are imparted with an existence and a life which are higher that those of other people? And what about the fact that one can see differences amongst saints? According to your judgment, to you the bee will be holier than the fly, and the sheep than the bee, and others than the sheep, and the human being more than all of these, an so might be even Isabella; and again, the ant would be holier than other insect, or, if you wish, the ox or the elephant or another amongst animals will be holier than the ram, and the human being will be holier than those ones, even if he is as Ahab. Such a saint will be also he who attracts you through worthy of contempt dogmas, to such risible opinions[631], and who is, manifestly, an enemy of the Gospel of Christ[632].

2. If the deifying grace of the Ghost from within saints, it had been created and it had been something like a habit[633], or like a natural imitation, as he who walks amongst us is teaching us and so he troubles us[634], the saints aren't deified above-nature, neither are they born out of God (Jn. 1: 13), nor are they Ghost as ones whoa re born out of Ghost (Jn. 3: 6), and so they cannot become of one Ghost with our Lord by attaching themselves to Him (1 Cor. 6: 13). If that had been the case, Christ wouldn't have given, only when He came to us and [631] I think that he is hinting here at Barlaam, who attracted Akindynos to his teaching.

[632] The adversaries of Palamas rejected his argument, that the grace is uncreated, for the fact that he who is imparted with the grace he is imparted with God, with the argument that then all the creatures will have to be imparted with the uncreated grace, because all the creatures are imparted, to diverse degrees, with God. Palamas answers them that, according to such judgment, all the creatures should be holy to different degrees. By this, he lays the ground for difference of a totally another order, between the impartation with the grace enjoyed by the believers, and the differences amongst the gradual impartations of created goods enjoyed by diverse creatures. The simplistic judgment of Barlaam and of his adherences, it placed on the same plan the impartation with something uncreated from within God Himself and the impartations with goods produced by God, through His creator acts, namely between the direct and person impartation with God and the indirect impartations with some features produced through creator acts by God's kindness. It is like somebody would place on the same plan the fact that she/he received from another person something created by that person, or she/he received that person as such, or a power that irradiated out of that person, through love. Barlaam, as representative of the scholastics, he locked up the whole life of the world into the created order.

[633] The scholastic theology started to define the grace as a created "habit", even though it called the grace, in the same time, as supra-natural habit.

[634] He who was doing that at that time, he was Akindynos, the descendant of Barlaam.

only them who believe into His name, power they to become sons of God (Jn. 1: 12). This is because, even before the coming of Christ, that natural imitation existed amongst all the peoples and it exists even now amongst believers and unbelievers, if He is within us in a natural manner.

But you listen to Pious Maximos, who says in his Dialogue with Pyrrhus: "And Moses and David and all of them who have received within them the godlike work, by rejecting the human and bodily traits, they have been moved by the Ghost of God"[635]. And again, in another place: "The image by ascending to archetype, and by being conquered by the godlike work, better said by becoming god through deification, he is sweetened by ecstasy more than the existing creatures and he thinks, at himself, into the archetype, due to the grace of the Ghost that has overwhelmed him"[636].

3. So, they who are deified, they not only will become better by nature, but they will receive the godlike work, of the Holy Ghost Himself[637]. This is said by Great Basil too: "When we think at the dignity characteristic to Him, we see Him together with the Father and with the Son and when we think at the working grace within those who are partakers to Him, we say that He is within us"[638].

But if the grace was within the saints too as in all the creatures, also as God, according to your wise contrivances, like it creates the corresponding ones in all the other creatures, what would be the need for Christ and for His presence like?[639]

[635] G.P. 91: 297 A.

[636] Ambigua; G.P. 91: 1076 C.

[637] The grace elevates them who receive the grace, out of the created order and it places them, through the unmediated communion with God, into the created order, above-nature.

[638] About the Holy Ghost 26: 63; G.P. 32: 184 C.

[639] That is actually a thesis of the scholastic theology that the Ghost creates the grace within us, and therefore also the holiness within saints, as the grace created all the corresponding ones within all the creatures. So, the holiness wouldn't really godlike within saints, but it would be created as well. The saint remains, as well, locked up within the order of the created. Rightly so, Palamas asked those who argued that thesis: but then, what was needed for the embodiment of the Son of God? The Holy Ghost couldn't have created the grace, within people, even without the becoming-man of the Son of God? Or, out of this scholastic teaching it would turn out that also everything that is apart in the humanity of Christ, it would have been created. But then, what the Son of God embodied Himself for, because He was able to created all of these in a humanity, without making Himself the Subject, of the Hypostasis of the assumed humanity, and without communicating to His assumed humanity His uncreated energies? But in our humanity, the Ghost of Christ does the same thing as within Christ as man: the Ghost makes us subjects of the uncreated divine energies of God, or of Christ. Christ

What would be needed for the Baptism into Him, and what would be needed for the mastery and the power which come to us out of Him? What would be needed for, the breathed Ghost, sent and dwelled since the beginning? This is for, like the Ghost was in all realities, likewise He was within us. And God will be too, for He deifies, as He creates[640]. But the Great Basil says limpidly: "If God does the same thing by creating and by giving birth, Christ won't be Creator and Father through the same work. This is for Christ is God. And we won't need the adoption through the Holy Ghost"[641]. "And He has risen us together, says the Apostle, and He places us together into the heavenly ones, into Christ Jesus. This is for, you are saved into grace, through faith. And this isn't from you, because the grace belongs to God; not out of deeds, in order nobody to boast himself" (Eph. 2: 6-8).

But you promise the deification only out of the deeds of the natural imitation, by saying that the deifying grace and the godlike grace it is the imitation out of the nature's powers. But, "if somebody doesn't have the Ghost of Christ, that one won't belong to Christ" (Rom. 8: 9); and "The Ghost of God dwells within us" (ibid); and "all of us have been watered out of a sole Ghost" (1 Cor. 12: 13); and "he who sticks with the Lord, he is of the same Ghost" (1 Cor. 6: 17); and "Christ dwells within the hearts of believers, through the Ghost" (Eph. 3: 16-17); and "by listening to the word of the truth, which we have also believed through, we have been sealed into that Holy Ghost of the promise that is the earnest of our salvation" (Eph. 1: 13-14); and "into this we will know that we will have remained into Him took us out of a life spent exclusively within the border of the created. The conception about the created grace, it either makes impossible any unmediated communication between God and the world, or it confounds God and the world to one another, in a pantheistic manner.

[640] According to the scholastic teaching of Barlaam and Akindynos, there is no difference between the creator and the deifier works of God. Everything is deified by being created, and that means that the creation itself it is the birth out of God. The grace is, at its turn, a created power given to the one who receives the Mysteries. But then, what one would receive the Mysteries for? The conclusion is either the locking up within the hermetic borders of the created, or a pure pantheism.

[641] Saint Basil, Against Eunomius 4; G.P. 29: 697 A. If the deification is one with the creation, there won't be needed a special work of the Holy Ghost. But the Holy Ghost adopts them who have been created, and He elevated them on a superior plan of life, to the life common with God. The Holy Ghost elevates us form the plan of the creation in the unmediated relation with Person-God. The Holy Ghost is the proof of the free love of God for us, by no longer letting us living as simple creatures of Him.

and He into us, for He has given to us out of His Ghost" (1 Jn. 4: 13); and "you haven't take slavery Ghost, but adoption Ghost" (Rom. 8: 15).

4. And you declare that they are imparted only with creatures, and they see only the creatures, they who, for the fullest cleanness of their heart, the limpidly see and the experience the shininess of God and they receive the Son Who comes and makes a dwelling place and He dwells within them with the Father and He shows Himself to them, according to the promise. What are you saying, man? Do you reckon that the Ghost of Christ, the Ghost of God, the Holy Ghost of the promise, the earnest of the inheritance of the saints, the Ghost of the adoption, the promise of the Ghost which was taken by the Son from the Father and the Son has given it to them who believe in Him, the Ghost poured over the male and female servants of God, according to Prophet Joel (Joel 3: 1), according to you, is that Ghost creature and natural imitation, so that you call them who do not want to blaspheme, as wandering from place to place and ill-faithed? Don't you feel ashamed, man, of the Apostles who says that "your bodies are church of the Ghost Who dwells within you" (1 Cor. 3: 16)? Deigned him, ever before, to honor the abode of the servant with the name of church? And if the Ghost have been be within us as in all things, each one among the speechless animals and beasts and among the creature crawling on earth, it would have been the church of God. Not to mention here the fact that the Hellenes too, they honor these ones into they who honor them too. The Apostle would have vainly praised the believers, if that had been the case, namely on the experienced believers: "Don't you know that you are the church of God and the Ghost of God dwells within you?" (1 Cor. 3: 16), "lest you are untried" (2 Cor. 13: 5).

5. But "you share the godlike Ghost, he says, by saying that He is subordinate, uncreated, and supra-ordinate, and you measure God by saying that some of the saints receive a greater grace, while others receive a smaller grace; and this isn't the likeness to God which each one earns it by imitation, but it is something else than that, something that comes from above and it is a gift and it is uncreated".

Whom are you saying all of these against? Against us, or against the prophet? or, better said, you say these against God Who says through on of the prophet: "I will pour My Ghost over all bodies" (Joel 13: 1); and you say that also against the apostle who speaks about: "The divisions of the Holy Ghost" (Hebr. 2: 4); and against Dionysus who limpidly writes: "One is The One Whom they want, they who have the same image, but Whom they are not unitarily imparted with, despite He is One, but He shares to each one the godlike ones which are appropriate to him, together with the fulfillment according to his worthiness"[642].

So, not the Ghost is divided and quantified, but rather He measures them who are imparted, for He imparts Himself to each one, according to that one's worthiness, according to the Ghost's savior and healing righteousness. Properly said, The Ghost doesn't divide Himself but the illuminates undividedly, but we cannot comprise Him wholly[643].

6. These things were written also about Paul, briefly, when the great light spoke to Paul, enveloping him like a lightning bolt (Acts 9: 3; 24: 13). And they who climbed the mountain, together wit the Lord, they saw His glory "not whole, in order they not to lose, together with their sight, their lives too"[644]. So, not only that the Ghost is undivided in the divided human beings, but the Ghost unites too, them who are imparted according to their power, as a unifying power, and the Ghost elevates them towards the deifying unity and simplicity of the Father Who gathers them up. Thus, by getting out with kindness, for the union of the ones who are under the care of the Providence, and by multiplying Himself, the Ghost stiller mains within the Father and according to that above-nature power[645]. Even though this overpouring and sending and advancing is showing – "for to each one was given the showing of the Ghost towards benefit" (1 Cor. 12: 7) – can one say that [642] About the Churchly Hierarchy 1: 2; G.P. 3: 373 B.

[643] The mystery of this undivided impartation it implies the mystery of the Ghost's quality as Person. Anybody desires the unitary wholeness of the beloved person, but she/he receives that wholeness as much as she/he can. She/he is given that wholeness wholly, for the beloved person gives herself/himself wholly, as a gift, but she/he receives her/him as much as she/he can, depending on how great her/his receiving love is. One receives that wholeness more, another less; and one receives it more according to an aspect, while another receives it more according to some other aspect, according to her/his capacity of love, namely of receiving.

[644] The third sticheron from the Lithia on 6th of August.

[645] We can see a resemblance to the fact that the person goes out towards those whom the person communicates with, but the persons till remains as a unitary spring of her/his manifestations, undivided in herself/himself, though, in the same time, the person communicates herself/himself wholly through each of her/his manifestation and to several persons simultaneously.

the Ghost is divided, by measuring His showing according to the measure of them who are united with Him in a mysterious manner? And if He never show Himself consummately, such showing being useless to everyone, but the Ghost exceeds, infinitely, all showing and understanding, can one say that the Ghost is divided and is composed of something subordinate and supraordinate? Can't you understand, you whoa re wise in all regards, either the fact that what is shown, or what is thought, it isn't imparted with God, it isn't God's part, so that God would have suffered certain division, as you say, but He shows and not-shows Himself wholly, He is understood and non-understood, and He is imparted and He remains unimparted?[646]

7. And if, according to the Great Dionysus: "the deification is the likeness to God and the union with God"[647], how could we admit that the deification is a natural imitation? We need a likeness, in order us to be in harmony to that union which the deification is done through. And without union, that likeness is not enough for deification. And the likeness we need, it is that coming to us out of working and keeping the godlike commandments, one that isn't committed only through natural imitation, but by the power of the Ghost, a power that comes to us out of the holy birth of ours from above and that is imprinted, in an untold manner, into the baptized ones. Through that, they who "not out of blood, neither out of the man's will, not out the will of the body, but they have been born out of God" (Jn. 1: 13), as some recently born children: "they can reach the measure of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. 4: 13). "He won't know something of the ones which he received from the fathers, neither will he work, he who hasn't his existence in a godlike manner"[648].

[646] To the simplistic affirmation the adversary, that God either He doesn't show Himself and He doesn't give Himself as a gift, at all, or He shows and gives Himself, as a gift, wholly, Palamas opposes the living understanding of the mystery of the person, and of the dialectical mode which, on one hand, the person shows and gives himself as a gift, and on the other hand the person cannot be received wholly. God, as loving Person, He manifests Himself and He gives Himself, as a gift, wholly, in each of the above-nature works, but, in the same time, he remains undivided in Himself, or He remains as wholly undivided and unimpartable. This is for, even the human person can be seen and cannot be seen wholly, in any act and manifestation of the person, or the person gives herself-himself, as a gift, in any of her/his acts or manifestation, or the person gives herself/himself as a whole while remaining ungive, as whole.

[648] Quoted Word 2: 1; G.P. 3: 393 B.

So, please learn, you my beloved, that the godhead has been above-nature since the beginning. Neither at the beginning the nature ascends by itself. What then could be its end like, as natural and uncreated? And if, through its characteristic beginning, it is way above the natural imitation, what could be like - once consummate - natural imitation? John of Zachariah baptizes too. But only into water (Mt. 3: 11; Mk. 1: 8; Lk. 3: 16; Jn. 1: 26, 31033; Acts 1: 5; 11: 16). Jesus, the Son of God, he baptized too, but into water and Ghost (Jn. 3: 5). What's added to it? Only the name? Not at all. But it is itself the grace and the deifying power, Himself the Holy Ghost, poured into the baptized one, not according to the being, but according to the grace that starts from Him, through the grace of the holiness that is, by nature, within Him. And fi this is creature and we, who have been imparted with it, we have been imparted with something created, how will be the Holy Ghost uncreated?[649]

8. But if we say together with the Great Athanasius, that "we are made partaker to the godlike nature through the impartation with the Ghost, so that it would be insane him who said that the Ghost is out of created nature, and not out of the nature of the Son"[650]. And how Christ, the Son of God, by baptizing Himself[651], as well into faith as John too, and by seeding power and grace into the baptized ones, He is "declared", according to Paul, namely He is known and confessed as: "The Son of God into power and according to the ghost of the holiness and of the resurrection" (Rom. 1: 4)?

So, what is the power of God that was shown and that proved Jesus as Son of God? Was that a creature? And what was Jesus recognized like, as Son of God, due to that power?[652]

[649] In the scholastic doctrine represented by Barlaam and Akindynos, the grace isn't a ray of the love starting from within the Holy Ghost, but it would be something created. But then, the grace either won't start from within the Ghost, because of being – if that had been the case – the Holy Ghost created too, or the question will raise: how could still be given to us, as gift, through grace, especially the Holy Ghost? The ghost wouldn't have been, in such a case, actually, a Person, into the grace we are given, as a gift. We wouldn't have entered an unmediated connection with Him.

[650] Epistle towards Serapion 1: 24; G.P. 26: 585 C – 588 A.

[651] Palamas is referring here to Jn. 3: 22, where it is said that Jesus was baptizing as well. But at Jn. 4: 2, it is added: "though Jesus wasn't' baptizing, but His disciples did".

[652] The negation of the showing of the uncreated grace, or of the unmediated power of God, it has consequences amongst the most undesirable, for itself the faith that Christ was the embodied Son of God. What would have been Him proven by as such, if nothing uncreated had been shown within world, and into our humanity, through Him?

And let aside the power that He cleaned up leppers, He illuminated blind people, He straightened the hunchbacked, he healed the paralyzed – because of being that a Pharisaic shortsightedness to look first at what it is – but that power that firstly untied, in an unseen manner, the chain of the sins, and it gave place to the Ghost of the holiness and it directed and it illuminated the inward man and it resurrected through the union with God, from dead, and it has made the soul living in a godlike manner, and it has given the truly godlike and really existent life of God. This is for the resurrection of the body is nets to the resurrection of the soul. And the death of the soul is the straying from the life into God[653]. And this is the really awful death.

And that one from after, namely that of the body, it is all-desired. This is for, that is a sign of the love of God for people[654]. Of it will be deprived, woe to them, the group of them who will be condemned at the future judgment. This is because, them who didn't use well the talent of the godlike grace, given them by God, it will remain to them a forever union with the second death, as John unveiled us in his Apocalypse (Apoc. 20: 14 and 21: 8), a union worse than death. And if those ones will live without dying and will be dead in the same time, here too are many who live as they would be dead, as the Lord of the life and of the death told us (Mt. 8: 22).

So, there is a death of the soul too, despite the soul remaining, by nature, immortal. How will the therefore live, by being imparted with the created life? The soul will be rather dead, while living this life. So, the soul must be imparted with that life that doesn't part with the Ghost, if the soul wants to resurrect to a higher life[655]. That's why Basil the Great, who was imparted with that and so he spoke out of his experience: "And the life which the Ghost communicates out of Himself into another hypostasis, that life won't be separated from the Ghost, but the Ghost has too the life in Himself and they who are [655] Only the godlike uncreated Ghost gives us immortal life, namely a truly living life. Without the Ghost, the soul despite being immortal by nature, the soul will live a dead immortal life, and that is the most awful thing.

imparted with Him they too live in a godlike manner, as ones who have achieved the godlike and heavenly life"[656].

9. But, do you want us to teach this too, with the whole clarity, namely the fact that they who have been found worthy of being deified by receiving the Holy Ghost Himself, they do not receive Him according to His being, but according to that illumination and uncreated grace? Listen to him who says: "The purpose of the hierarchy is the likeness and the union, as much as possible, with God Who makes them who follow Him, as godlike images, as all-transparent and unstained mirrors which receive the ray of the initial light and of the godlike origin"[657].

And if by being One He Who doesn't impart Himself unitarily to everyone, but He imparts Himself diversely, what will impede the saint and they who aren't saints, to be imparted with God, but there to be also differences between those impartations, by being one uncreated and another created? Of if somebody asked Athanasius the Great - who said "One God the Father", or the beginning of all realities, according to apostle (! Cor. 8: 6), "but the Word if out of the Father in a born way and the Ghost is out of the Father in a proceeded way"[658] -: how do you reckon, after you have affirmed that all realities are out of the Father, that only the Son and the Ghost are really unseparated from the Father, Athanasius would answer him immediately that that is due to the difference of subsistence (δια την την υπάρξεως διαφορά), for the Son and the Ghost are out of the Father as the shininess and the ray of light[659], namely through the Self-subsistence (αυθυποστάτος).

[656] Against Eunomius 5; G.P. 29: 772 B. The Ghost, as supreme Hypostasis of the life, he communicated the truly immortal and living life to another hypostasis, namely to another person. This is for, if it is characteristic to a person to communicate her/his life to another person, all the more is that characteristic to the Holy Ghost Who is the Supreme Communicating Person. Through this ceaseless communication of godlike life from the immortal and truly alive Person, the human person will be elevated and remains into an immortal truly and fully alive life, if the human person open herself / himself to the communication with the Ghost. Otherwise, the human person remains immortal but not quite alive. The Ghost and those persons have, through communion, a sole life, that life that is truly godlike and immortal, and alive. Except the Ghost and His uncreated, Self-existing, and inexhaustible life, there isn't personal life not only immortal but also truly and fully alive. A live having a created content, that content being, of course, created through the Ghost as well, it still will have the shortcoming of the created, so that it will somehow be dead, and of an unbearable monotony.

Likewise, we are going to say, that, though all the realties are imparted with God, the difference between the impartation of the saints and the impartation of all the others, it is very big. This is for, you tell me why, among the realities which are imparted with God in order they to live sensitively or rationally or understandingly, there is not which we say about its life that it would be in the image of God and deified, neither that one of them would be godlike, or penetrated by God, or bearer of God, or, better said, that it would be God, if that doesn't belong among the deified ones? And the realities having by nature only a life according to the senses, or even those which totally lack the feeling, no one of them ever happen to live in a godlike manner, regardless they too are imparted with God.

10. Can you see that, despite God being in all realities, and regardless all realities being imparted with God, God is only within the saints and only the saints are imparted with God in a proper sense? And thus, it is a true and sure thing, that as there are many called as gods, but we have only one true God; as there are and they are called as sons of God, but we preach a sole true Son of God, for He is also the One-Begotten, likewise there being many or, better said, all of them who are imparted with God, but only the saints are imparted with God and with Christ. "For it is impossible, says Paul, that they who have been enlightened and who have tasted out of the heavenly gift, and who have been made partakers to the Holy Ghost" (Hebr. 6: 4), to be like before they have been imparted. But also, our Lord promises that He will come and He will make dwelling place at them who love Him and who are loved by Him (Jn. 14: 23), of course, like He wasn't and He wasn't dwelling within them before.

Then, they who are deified, they must have much likeness to God, and the adopted ones they must have much likeness to the Son. So, as only God exist, only Him lives, only Him is saint, only Him is good, "only Him having the immortality and dwelling into the unapproachable light" (1 Tim. 6: 16), despite there are many who exist and live, being they saints and good and immortal and dwelling into the light and into the place of the living ones, likewise the saints alone are they whoa re imparted with God, though all of them are imparted with God in a way.

11. Do you admit that such a great difference of impartation it is enough to show us the impartation of them who live in a godlike manner, as an uncreated impartation? But Paul said too: "I no longer live, but Christ live in me" (Gal. 1: 20)? Then Maximos too, he said about himself - and about them like himself - that "they do not bear into him the temporary life, that has beginning and end, but the godlike and eternal life of the Word Who dwells within them"[660]. And again: "The godlike and non-understood life, though it given the joy of itself to them who enjoy it by grace, but it doesn't give them the understanding. This is because it remains forever non-understood, even into impartation, to them who enjoy such life; this is fore, this life has according to its nature, as one that is uncreated, the limitlessness"[661]. And again: "He gives as reward, to them who listen to Him, the uncreated godhead"[662]. And he calls as uncreated godhead "the en-hypostatical illumination, that one that is uncreated, but it is a non-understood showing into the worthy ones"[663].

12. And Athanasius the Great says: "When we are called as partakers to Christ and partakers to God, it is shown the chrism and the seal that is not out of the nature of the created realities"[664]. And again: "This is the God's love for people, that whom He is Maker, them He later becomes Father"[665]. And He makes Himself that when the people He created receive "in their hearts the Ghost of the Son who shouts out: Abba Father" (Gal. 4: 6; Rom. 8: 15). Otherwise, they wouldn't have been made sons, because of being they creatures by nature, if they hadn't received the Ghost of Him Who exist by nature and truly[666].

The en-hypostatical illumination is the manifestation of the Supreme, Eternal, and Inexhaustible Person. The human person reaches that life that is illuminated such, through the leap of the faith, but also of the gift from God, above what it represents the natural life.

[665] Ibid. Gal. 1: 4, 6; Rom. 8: 15.

[666] It is a leap even for God, from being Creator to be Father to what he created; it is a leap into love. The Creator produces out of nothing and He keeps the created one to some distance, by not communicating Himself to the created. The Father gives life out of Himself. The Father commits the full love between Himself an His creatures. The creatures must be both creatures and sons, in order the Father to fully show His love, a love that makes His sons out of the creatures He created out of nothing. The creature must receive the uncreated life, in order the creature to become son of God.

That's why the Word made Himself body" (Jn. 1: 14), in order Him to make the human as receiver of the godhead"[667]. And again: "As the Ghost and the power of the Highest were promised to the apostles, likewise to the Virgin". And the Great Basil asks you to make yourself "through the Holy Ghost, as partaker to the grace of Christ, and you to be son of the light, and you to be imparted with the ternal glory"[668]. And again: "He who is moved through the Holy Ghost with an eternal movement, that one has become wholly saint. This is for, by dwelling the Holy Ghost within him, the man has within himself the worthiness of the prophet, of the apostle, of the angel, of God, while the man was before that dust and ashes" (Gen. 18: 27)[669]. And again: "Not for he takes the servant, he becomes son out of servant, neither for being imparted as a servant he dares to call God as Father"[670]. And again: "The ones according to the image are imparted with the Maker, and this is done through the Ghost. This is because all the created ones are unhappy, because of being deprived of God and of the glory of their Maker, according to the created nature, if they are not imparted with godhead. This is because it is worthless that work about God of him who sees God's being as empty and desert. But neither the creature is so unworthy, nor God is so lacking of power, in order God not to send His holy giving, as a gift, to the creatures"[671]. And again: "The creation becomes new again [667] The human couldn't become bearer of the godhead as a subject making the godhead as his own, though the godhead is a gift, except he has received, previously, the Hypostasis of the Word Who is Hypostasis of the godhead, as own hypostasis. (Saint Athanasius, Against Arians 2: 59; G.P. 26: 273 A). In Christ, the doors of the human have been opened, without the human being destroyed. The godlike light and life entered the human with the whole fullness. This is for, our will by becoming the will of the embodied Word, it no longer resisted the will for cleanness and for love from God. On the opposite, not it is fully collaborating.

[668] About the Holy Ghost 15: 26; G.P. 32: 132 B.

[669] The Holy Ghost Who has in Himself the eternal life, by dwelling within the believer, the Ghost gives eternal life to the believer too, without beginning and without end, for the Ghost becomes the man's Ghost, as gift, as He is the Ghost of Christ too. Such a man is imparted with a life which he feels it without beginning and without end, for that life is inexhaustible. The man achieved within himself all the dignities which the believer can achieve into Ghost: of prophet, of apostle, of angel or of heralder of God, for the man heralds God by irradiating God out of himself. Such a believer become even God, according to grace, for his Subject is the Ghost, or his subject has been penetrated by the Subject of the Ghost. (Pseudo-Basil, Against Eunomius 5; G.P. 29: 769 B).

[670] Not for he has takes a servant as servant-hypostasis, he becomes Son out of servant, but for the Son remains Son even after His embodiment (Idem, quoted work, col. 741 B).

[671] Pseudo-Basil*, Against Eunomius* 5; G.P. 29: 724 AB.

when it is imparted with the Ghost, because of the lack of Ghost the creation oldened"[672]. "This is for it must collaborate with the newness from the beginning its renewal and contribution from now. This is for, the Ghost has made again visible the image, for He Who breathed isn't other from Him Who breathed at the beginning, but He is That One Himself Whom the breath was given through, then together with the soul, not into the soul"[673]. And Saint John Climacus, when praising the grace of the godlike Baptism, he says: "Then the man was made towards living soul (Gen. 2: 7), and now towards of-life-maker ghost" (1 Cor. 15: 45). There is a big difference. This is for the soul doesn't give the live to another, but the Ghost doesn't only live but He also provided that to others too. Thus, the apostles even resurrected people from dead"[674].

13. These things are exposed in detail by the godlike Cyril too, while rejecting those who say that the godlike instilling was done to the man towards (as) soul. This is for, at the end of his words, he says: "And what was instilled out of Him one understands that that belongs to Him, to his being. So, how could have been the Ghost changes out of God into the nature of the soul? So, the animal was animated by an untold power and through the likeness to Him the animal become what the animals had to be by nature: good, and righteous, and capable of all virtues. But the animal was sanctified by being shown as partaker to the godlike Ghost. This is what the animal lost through sin"[675]. Where are they who say that the deifying grace of the Ghost is a created and natural imitation, and not a godlike and untold work and seeded in an untold manner? This [674] Homily no. 25 at John 2; G.P. 59: 150. The Ghost spreads the life out of Himself, within them who want to receive that life, for He is the Ghost of the endless life of God. That's why the Ghost spreads that life even out of the people whom the Ghost dwells within, for he has imprinted Himself as Subject into their subjects. Out of these people there irradiates the life as it doesn't irradiate out of the people who are only souly, who have a quenched life within themselves, regardless how intelligent and powerful those people would be in the worldly sense. These people too, they have a certain life within them. But this life is somehow dead and it doesn't have the power of irradiation, it doesn't have that ember that irradiates the heat.

[675] Against Anthropomorphites 2; G.P. 76Ș 1081 AB. According to Saint Cyril, through the godlike breath, on one hand there were imprinted the moral potentialities of the soul, while on the other hand, the soul was given the possibility of becoming saint. This would mean: the soul became alive. This is because, without the instilling of the godlike and full of life grace, the soul is dead.

is for, Saint Maximos too, he says: "We experience the deification, as being above-nature, but we do not produce the deification"[676]. And again: "Nothing that is according to the nature produced the deification"[677].

14. But let's turn back where we have started from, and let's take the word further on. So, nothing impedes us to say that as "nobody is good except God" (Mt. 10: 18), likewise nobody is imparted with God except the best amongst angels and those people who receives again within their souls, in a mysterious way, the godlike breath that was removed from Adam because of his disregard related to the godlike commandment. I would gladly ask him who rejects this opinion: isn't totally necessary in order somebody to be imparted with something, him to have within him an impartation from before, and there to be within him something from before? So, those which live through the impartation with God in a sensitive or rational or understanding manner, what feeling would they rejoice of, or of what rationality, or of what mind, until they were imparted with God? Only of existence, somebody could say, as these were added to that. But one shas his existence too, through the impartation with God. it is obvious, therefore, that these ones aren't imparted with God as such, as God's work, but they are said as they are imparted with God as results of God's creator work and power, as also about all the ones produced by some craftsmanship one can say, by an obscure likeness, that all of those are imparted with the skillfulness of the craftsman, but they totally lack his working understanding[678].

[676] Towards Thalassius 22; G.P. 90: 324 A; The Romanian Philokalia, vol. III, p. 75.
[677] Quoted Work 22; G.P. 90: 321 A.
[678] Saint Gregory Palamas is specifying here the essential difference between the impartation with God, of the saints, and by and large of all believers and clean people, and the impartation of them or of all things, with God, in their quality as creatures. The saints are imparted with God as Person, in an unmediated manner, namely the saints are in an actual communion with God, while the things are imparted with God's creator work, in their quality as results of God's work. The first one is the impartation with God as such, the last one is the impartation with a God's work. The impartation of the saints is an interpersonal relationship between them and God. This is the leitmotif in the whole teaching of Saint Gregory Palamas, as taken from the biblical and patristical teaching. Better said: as long as on the ground of the human personal creation the things too are the proof of God's creator work, but the things aren't together-conscious-subjects, with God, to a certain work of God, the saints have become themselves as together-subject with God, of God's work. The saint isn't only the result of a creator work of God, but the saint receives and works as God and together with God. In this sense, the saint has become go by grace.

15. The saints, by having as basis, from before, the created nature, they achieve as adding to that the above-nature and godlike impartation, not as a tool produced by a craftsmanship and as the products of that craftsmanship, but like those who have received the science that "is always together-present, but it is shown through works when it is needed", according to the diverse charismas of the Ghost[679]. "And as the Word is within us, likewise is the Ghost within us", sometimes as The One Who is Himself within our heart, when "the Ghost confesses together with our shot" (Rom. 8: 16) and when "He shouts out within our hearts: Abba, Father" (Rom. 8: 5; Gal. 4: 6; Mt. 10: 20), and some other times as The One Who speaks through our tongue; for "aren't you the ones who speak", says Him Who gave us the uncontradicted wisdom, "but the Ghost of your Father Who lives within you" (Mt. 10: 20)[680].

But it must be understood as a whole in parts, in the division of the gifts. That's why "all of us we are limbs to one another" (Eph. 4: 25)[681]. In addition to that, "like the power of the sight is in the healthy eye, likewise is the work of the Ghost into the cleaned soul"[682]. That's why, the same one called the illumination out of the Ghost also as irradiation (flowing = [679] Saint Basil, About the Holy Ghost 26: 61; G.P. 32: 180 C. It is specified the same difference between the impartation with God's creator work and the impartation as an unmediated communion with the Person of God. A tool produces by itself the things it has been crafted for. These things aren't an adding. But the science is something else. The science must be gathered later. The science is added through personal will. Only the persons can enjoy this impartation. Of course, the grace isn't only a science achieved by the human being. But, in any case, in it is shown that the human being already exists and, on this ground, the human being can become the subject of the work, as grace received from the godlike Subject, for a together-working. Once achieved, the science is like a potentiality which the man can use when ought, according to the diverse needs. So, the science it by that too, an image of the grace, one than can manifest in diverse charismas.

[680] Here are being made obvious several things: a) both the Word and the Ghost are within us; b) the Word becomes word within us when we wish, or a spring of words, by together-working with us to that, either by speaking to us, or by asking us to speak in order us to answer His appeal; c) the Ghost becomes within us a spring of power of the words, namely also an urge to us to speak out of the Word Who is within us; d) He becomes, in the same time, a spring of life that moves within us and that makes us alive, and He irradiates out of us through words and in all ways. Thus, the words become ours, though they aren't only ours, and the Ghost Who fills up our words with life, it is ours to such an extent, that when He speaks, we speak; or, when we speak, he speaks. Likewise, His life and power become our live and power.

απόρροιαν) of the Ghost[683]. "This is for, as those which are around the vivid colors, they get colored too, out of that light that is spread out of colors, likewise him who looks openly with the Ghost, he will be transformed out of the glory of That One, and so he will become more luminous, by being lightened by the truth of the Ghost as by a light"[684]. The Gregory who is called the Theologian, when listing up the qualities inherited by sister Gorgonia from people, he says: "I know well that the qualities you have are bigger and way more honored than the qualities form the seen world; the murmur of the ones who celebrate, the paly of the angels, the heavenly good composition, the seeing of the glory, the illumination of the All-High Trinity, cleaner and more consummate than any other, the godhead shining with the whole light into our souls". And after he said those, by turning towards her, and reiterating on short what he said before: he said: "You enjoyed all of them, whose irradiations you had even on earth, for the sincerity of your heart's urge towards them"[685]. This is for, this is the irradiation (απόρροιας) that even when communicated to remain undivided form the one who communicated it, and so it doesn't suffer any diminution through communication[686]. This is for, what the light could suffer like, such a thing, because of the ray, or the ray because of tis shininess?

16. Do not bring to me, as proof, the material irradiations. But you remove from that irradiation all the inappropriate meaning, and so you will understand, as much as [683] The Thomist critiques of the teaching which Saint Gregory Palamas defended, from "Istina" Review, 1937, no. 3, they make a big deal of the expression απόρροια, which Saint Gregory Palamas would have taken from Dionysus the Areopagite, and which would prove the Neoplatonic character of this teaching. Behold that the mentioned word was used even by Saint Basil the Great. But this "irradiation" or "flowing", it doesn't have nothing Neoplatonic at the holy fathers. This is for, it doesn't mean else but the presence of God, whole, as Person, in each of His acts, and not a thinning of the divine nature because of the irradiations coming out of the divine nature. Or, if we do not have during our life on earth, in the whole its intensity, the godlike light, this isn't because of an objective weakening of that light, because of getting far from its source, but that is because of our incapacity of receiving it entirely, as a disciple cannot receive the whole teaching of his magister, though the master puts the same whole zeal of his personality in what he communicated to his disciple. It is, at most, a free accommodation of the imparted gift to the mode and to the capacity of him who received the gift.

[684] About the Holy Ghost 21: 52; G.P. 32: 165 B.

[685] Word no. 8, At Gorgonia's Funeral 23; G.P. 35: 816 BC.

[686] Here Saint Gregory of Nyssa is saying, directly, that the "irradiation" doesn't mean an objective thinning of what is communicated.

possible, the mode the Ghost gives Himself, as a gift, to the worthy ones. How illuminates the Ghost, in an untold manner, to all of them who are worthy? "Like some rays of the sun, he says, which, by illuminating the cloud, they make the cloud illuminating by giving to the cloud a golden color"[687]. You think also at the fact that these clouds, the vessels of the light, they ignite a godlike feeling of that light and, by having by nature some kind of eye capable of being imparted with that light, the clouds can become themselves some kind of light close to the light of the sun, and they can use such a light. Thus, only the saints, for they have become deified and in the likeness of God, they are imparted, in the proper sense, with God. And not only when they not only that are imparted with Him, but they also convey Him. And they know not only the things which happened, but they also know the realities which have never been brought to existence out of nothing. And they not only live, but they even give life, and that is not characteristic to the created power. But after proving the truth, let's pay attention to the heralders of the truth too, who say that only the saints are imparted with God. This is for, we always present them as witnesses of the truth.

17. So, Basil the Great says: "Only then will be somebody able to come close to our Savior, when he has cleaned himself up of the abomination gathered by him through evilness, and when he has come to that according to nature beauty, and he has given back to his imperial countenance, through cleanness, its ancient shape"[688]. And again: "The Holy Ghost, unapproachable by nature, he makes Himself comprised for goodness. This is for, by filing all the things up, through power, he imparts Himself only to the worthy ones"[689]. "The Ghost [687] Pseudo-Basil, Against Eunomius 5; G.P. 29: 769 B. Of course, the fathers didn't have, at their time, the possibility of clearly expressing the report between person and the person's acts. That's why they mostly used images taken from nature. But despite that, one can see that the fathers didn't reckon the irradiations as a diminution. Saint Basil (Pseudo-Basil) didn't speak about a diminution of the sunrays in report with the sun, but his attention was focused on showing that the sunrays give the could the color of the sun, which in the case of the grace would be, the deification produced in the person whom the grace dwells within, namely the likeness of the person to the godlike Person, as the likeness takes place between two persons who enter a relation and continue that relation.

[688] About the Holy Ghost 9: 23; G.P. 32: 109 AB.

[689] Something else is the fact that the Ghost fill all the things up through power, ands something else is that He imparts Himself in a personal communion. Only the worthy ones are partakers to the last one. He who is imparted with the Holy Ghost in this sense, he becomes a doesn't impart Himself in the same unique measure, but He imparts His work according to the measure of the faith[690]". And again: "he Who is non-comprised by the world, how must be reckon that He makes Himself seen only to the saints, for the cleanness of their heart, or how many corresponding honors are due to Him?"[691]. And again: "The Lord, by providing His disciples with the cleanness of their lives through His teachings, he gives them also to be receivers and seers of the Ghost"[692]. And again: "they who stepped over the earthly things and they have been elevated above those, they have been recognized as worthy of the grace of the Holy Ghost"[693].

18. But let's present you the difference between these impartations also through parables, as through certain obscure images. The pot is imparted with fire also after entering its use, the fire from the oven has been removed; for it preserved the traces of the fire. This is for, the vessel has from fire: its color, density, and smooth strength of its matter; this is for, the fire, by drying out the moisture and strengthening and blacking up the vessel, the yellow color of the fire it intertwined with the earthly natural white, and so, out of yellow and white and black there occurs, through their mixing, the color of the burnt kneading, and the tenderness of the earth is tight up, for the pores are being closed form deep, under the power of the fire, so that, by getting thickened, they no longer allow the penetration of the water. So that, what was done through water, from now on, it remains untied and non-moist. And even become way lighter and warmer than the stone, or than the earth, compared to an equal size, by the fact that was close to the fire. This is for, the vessel is imparted with fire also when crafted towards use. But it is imparted also when placed on the hot stove, and it is warmed up by fire or it is in contact with the fire. But then conscious subject of His work, or together-subject with the Ghost, to that work. He is no longer simply created, and maintained into existence, and guide like an object is. The impartation is personal relation, is communion.

[690] Quoted Work 9: 23; G.P. 32: 108 C. The Holy Ghost communicates His work on the measure of the faith, namely on the measure of a persona attachment to His Person.

[691] Quoted Work 22: 53; G.P. 32: 168 C. Within them whoa re their heart clean of any other affection, or within them who are attached only to Him, He is comprised as Person, for He can establish a personal relation with them, as he cannot establish with anyone.

[692] Quoted Work col. 168 B. The disciples can see the Ghost as Person, for they keep the teachings which they received, namely they fulfill the commandments, and so they unify their will to His will.

the vessel is imparted not only with the results of the fire, but, to some extent, also with all the works of the fire, not lacking either the warmth or the fire's burning power, and the vessel even conveys easily the fire's work, which the vessel is imparted with, to everybody who comes closer, if that one is able to be imparted, though, according to the nature, it is not imparted and it is earth as such. And when the vessel is removed from the oven, the vessel will be imparted with the results of the fire, but not with the fire's works.

19. So, you take, as much as possible, through likeness, from the vessels, the aspects useful for understanding the present theme. The life and the existence, the natural knowledge, and all the ones resembling to these ones, they are results of the godlike work, but they are not works in an actual meaning. The deified life and the grace of them who exist and live in a godlike and above-nature manner, they truly are a godlike and above-nature work, which the union with God is done through, with them who are worthy of God. So, all the realities brought to existence from nothing, by the godlike command, they are created and they are results of the godlike works, but they are not works. And our Lord, by making, together with the Father, Their dwelling place within the worthy ones (Jn. 14: 23), He commits the things occurring into the bearers of God, not through the creator commandment, but through the godlike union and dwelling, through the deifier power, and through the deifier grace, by communicating to them who are united with Him, the traits which are His own by nature. So, the saints are imparted not only with the results, but with themselves the works of God, imitating the angels and the angels' worthiness. This is for, the Great Basil says: "for This One is the holiness by nature, and to them is characteristic to be sanctified through impartation"[694].

[694] Against Eunomius 3; G.P. 29: 660 B. In the created things and beings, in their quality as created, God isn't seen directly, but only indirectly, as in the results of His work. This is their impartation with God. But within the good angels, and within the believers who strive to clean themselves of all tendencies which are contrary to God, God is seen in an unmediated manner in His actual work, and God even makes them together-subjects to this work. The difference between God in Himself and God within angels and saints, it is only that that in the last ones God is through the impartation of them with Him; they are not saints and gods by themselves, but they are sanctified and deified through the impartation with God. God doesn't need the communion with them in order Him to be God; they need the communion with God in order they to have the godlike life within them. That's why, their created being doesn't cease to remain as created base. This is seen within them and they also see this, despite they have become the bearers of godlike characters and works. That's why they participate with their effort of openness, of cleanness, of exclusive attachment to God, of putting their being and will to God's disposition, as an environment which God works through, and themselves become subjects of God's will and work, and they no longer want to work their own. The work of God takes and angelic form, or human, but only for it is noticeable the fact that the angel and the man have put themselves to the disposition of God. That's why, one can notice also the fact that the work of God it exceeds the possible contribution of the created angelic or human work. The angel and the man are ontologically transparent to God, for they are morally transparent.

20. Thus, the saints will shine as our Lord shined on the mountain. And they will have not a created kingdom, neither a kingdom differing in any aspect from our Lord's kingdom, but they will have the same kingdom as His. Thus, Christ lives and speaks here (Gal. 2: 20; 2 Cor. 13: 3), though Paul is the one living and speaking[695]. Thus, Peter kills (Acts 5: 1-10) and he resurrects (Acts 9: 37-42), though God alone is The One Who kills and resurrects. Thus, together with him, on the mountain, James and John see with the bodily eyes too, the non-dusked and non-followed-by-others light (Mt. 27: 1-8; Mk. 9: 2-8; Lk. 9: 28-36), that light that surrounded Paul and later on, by darkening Paul's sight so that it wasn't able to endure the overwhelming of the shininess (Acts 9: 3; 22: 6-11; 26: 13). This is because of not being the body's nature able to see that light. Thus, Stephen looks from on earth at the sky with his body too (Acts 7: 56). And the giving of the Holy Ghost, as gift, it is done by the touch of the human hands (Acts 8: 17), a touch that conveys, to him who come close sincerely and truly, the godlike work and the godlike grace, which, at their turn they are conveyed, by that, to someone else again, and through that one to another, successively, being those extended with the whole time[696].

[695] The interference between the Person of Christ and the person of the saint it is of such a nature than they cannot be separated, but they cannot be either confounded to one another. On the opposite, the saint is strengthened as person in the union with Christ, but the saint doesn't want to talk about that. Christ lives and speaks as Subject into the saint, but the saint still lives and speaks as subject, but more intensely, into Christ. The live and the speaking of Christ have become of the saint and vice versa. Christ has become the internal subject of the saint's live and speaking, but without making the saint a passive shell, but the saint has become, at his turn, an internal subject of the life and speaking of Christ. Christ involved the saint in His living and work, or, Christ has impropriated the purified living and speaking of the saint, for the saint has identified himself, by his own will, to the will of God. This is a mysterious phenomenon that takes place also between the human persons who fully love one another.

[696] Only as uncreated power, the grace penetrates all bodies and it can be conveyed through the body too. This fact explains the apostolical succession of the conveying of the grace. Otherwise, it becomes rather a conveying of a "habit" created by the churchly administration,

Who could praise – oh, You the Word of God, oh, You the Only Begotten - the power of Your presence of earth? It is never ignited Your godlike altar by strange and earthly fire. This is for, it is a strange and heavenly fire of another mode, one preserved through the conveying of the unquenched fire which You have come to throw it on earth (Lk. 12: 49), as a borderless ocean, through Your love for people. Your servant ghosts are imparted with that too (Ps. 104: 4[697]), which the demons are chassed away through. It is the fire seen by Moses into pyre (Exod. 3: 2) and which Elijah was kidnapped from earth by (4[698] Kings 2: 11). It is the fire seen by the group of Your apostles too, a fire that starts out of Your Ghost, and by which Paul was engulfed in light and so the persecutor was transformed in disciple (Acts 9: 3 and the followings). This fire is the power of the resurrection and the work of the immortality, the enlightening of the holy souls and the upholding of all rational powers[699].

But, in order to prove what we said, let's mention here also the manifested signs shown through senses, which have been let aside, for a while. And we are going to do this in order to convince also them who are totally callous in their opinions. This is for he was imparted with life, the servant of the chief of the synagogue (Mt. 9: 25; Mk. 5: 411 Lk. 8: 54-55) and the son or of a dexterity of exercising the administrative power, or of conveying a juridical power. Of course, in the conveyance of this power that irradiates out of God, Himself the Ghost is working. This is for the grace is an ever-actual work of God Himself. Itself the actual work of the Ghost of Christ irradiates through the human person whom God is working within; by this, the Ghost becomes working also in him whom the work of conveyed, for through work if conveyed the Person of the Ghost Who is the Subject of that work. It was said before, that the soul irradiated full life by the fact that the soul is created. But only if the soul is elevated to that life into grace, the soul will irradiate this life into others too. We also have to take in account also the fact that the Ghost is the Subject too of the works from within Church, given the mysterious connections among the persons who compose the Church. The Ghost is conveyed as working, to a new servant, also by the fact that the conveyer does that in the ambience of the Church, as a servant of Christ in the Church and for the Church; the Ghost is conveyed as working into the subjects from the Church.

[697] In KJB we have: Ps. 104: 4: "Who maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire:"; in ROB we have: Ps. 103: 5: "You Who make Your angels ghosts and your servant flame of fire". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[699] One could understand form this expression that the godlike fire upholds the angelic powers, but also that that fire upholds, in the healthy work, themselves the soul's rational powers, by elevating those power from the abnormality of the state of sin, of egotistical functioning. Where this fire and its feeling are, the natural power no longer are separated from one another. The rationality works in accord with the love for the harmony with the others. The human being uses his souly powers healthily, fully responsibly.

of the widow (Lk. 7: 14-15), by the touch and by the voice of our Master; they were imparted, Tabitha of Joppe, and the young Eutyches from Troja, this one through the touch of Paul (Acts 20: 10), and those ones through the touch of Peter (Acts 9: 40). What life were those ones imparted with? Not with that of-life-making received by us too, but which our Master wasn't imparted with? Is still there somebody to say that not with the natural and uncreated work are imparted with, the saints? This is for, these ones depriving themselves, by their own free decision, of the work of their nature, they make themselves known only out of grace, and they will be shown so much as being out of That One as much as That God by Nature imparted Himself, through embodiment, with our weakness, by measuring, as only He knows, with His nakedness (kenosis) the deification by grace of the saved ones[700].

This is for, how could we inherit, otherwise, the Kingdom of God that "is the conveyance through grace of the goods he has by nature?"[701]. By having them gathered, whole, within Himself, He shares them and conveys them His glory and shininess, so that they won't be able to know out of themselves, as an air totally lightened by light, or as an unstained intelligible gold burnt into the immaterial and godlike fire. Thus "they have become gods through deification and they are full of the godlike work due to the overwhelming grace of the Ghost, so that through all of them there is a sole work of God and of those who are worthy of God", according to the godlike saying of Maximos, God "crossing them through with kindness, and whole, the worthy one, and whole"[702].

[700] As much as He made Himself bearer of our weakness, as much he filled up our weakness with His godlike glory and power. He measured the elevation of our nature with His descent to it. As much as He descended, as God, into the human forms of living and expression, as much He has filled up these forms with the godlike content. As much as the sun enters a chamber, as much the sun fills up that chamber with its light. The beauty of the Emperor's face is inside. In its humbleness and gentle kindness, there are both the descent of God and His height of human form and the height of the human itself. It is a mysterious glory and power of interiority, of intensity, of penetration into the ultimate depth of the souls through humbleness and kindness, which exceed endlessly any glory that wants to impose itself from outside. This means that there is a potential conformity between the authentic human and God, a conformity that is being actualized, through God, in endless dimensions.

[701] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Gnostic Heads 2: 90; G.P. 90" 1168 C; The Romanian Philokalia, vol. II, p. 205.

[702] Ambigua; G.P. 91: 1076 C. There is a perichoresis between God and the worthy ones, as there is among the Persons of the Holy Trinity, and between the two natures of Christ. There is also a perichoresis between the persons who love one another. Or, this perichoresis of the 21. As all the imprintings are imparted with the seal, but each of them moves independently, but, by taking one of them as by glue it to the seal, it will not longer able to move independently, but it will have the same movement with the archetype, by becoming one and the same with the archetype, but the matter remaining different, likewise the godlike image from within us, by ascending to archetype (to the prime model)[703], it will be fulfilled that godlike prayer for us: "Give them to be one, as I, Father, into You and You into Me, for they to be one" (Jn. 17: 21) into truth. Thus, he who attaches himself to the Lord, he is ghost" (1 Cor. 6: 17). Thus, the mystery of the union into a body through the touching of the bodies it is truly "great, but into Christ and into Church" (Eph. 5: 32). The seal gives itself to each piece of wax, but each piece of wax is imparted, as much as possible, on the measure of its own power, not only with the traits, but also with the union, in order to be imprinted.

22. Why are you afraid of composition to God, for the fact that also the works are and are called as uncreated? You rather fear not to call God as creature by reckoning His works as natural and created. This is for, Saint John Damascene, when speaking about the two works into Christ, he says that "the created one will show the created nature, and the uncreated one will characterize the uncreated being. This is for, the natural ones must be corresponding to their nature"[704]. And in accord to this, Saint Maximos says: "If there were abolished the natural will and the existential work of the godlike being and of the human being, how could He be both God and man"[705]. And, love is present in all kinds of perichoreses. In Trinity the perichoresis is due to the unity of being among the non-confounded Persons; within Christ, the perichoresis is due to the unity as Person in two non-confounded natures; and between God and the worthy ones, the perichoresis is due to the unity of work amongst non-confounded persons, so that the work of God becomes, through impartation, also work of the saints. God moves Himself with His work within the saints, and the saints moves themselves through the same work - as become their work too - into God. The Subject of Christ dwell actively in the interior of the human person and the human person dwell, actively, into the Person of Christ. Christ has impropriated the work of the man, and He sanctified that work, and the man has impropriated the work of God, and he humanized that work, but it has preserved it in its measures, in its above-nature qualities.

are not uncreated also the hypostatical characters of the All-High Trinity, though they are many? How, then, there aren't several gods, or how isn't The One composed because of those? I am afraid that you introduce to us a totally lacking-of-being God and non-hypostatical. But you say in everything, that these ones are the same with the being of God, and you reckon God as One and undivided in all aspects, because of not understanding that God multiplies Himself while still remaining One and He divides Himself in an undivided manner and He imparts Himself in diverse ways, while He is totally uncut and he remains non-existed from His unity, through an above-being power[706].

23. You tell me: doesn't have, also each hypostasis, several hypostatical characters? For the Father is non-caused and causing, proceeding and birth-giver. But the Father has all of these in an uncreated way. So, do you reckon the hypostatical characters as totally one and the same thing with the hypostasis, as you also do not admit any difference between the natural ones (works) and the nature, and between the essential ones (works) and essence? Will you, therefore, call as hypostasis the hypostatical ones (the characters), as you have called as nature the natural ones (the works), in a synonymic manner, and not in a homonymic manner? But the Church Fathers do not do that way. They call those as en-hypostatical (being into hypostasis), but not hypostasis, as they also do not call these ones as being, but, in a proper sense, into being[707]. Besides, once around each one of the hypostases there are many and diverse hypostatical (characters), how could be the hypostasis and the hypostatical (the hypostatical character) one and the same thing? So, once there are shown many and diverse hypostatical (characters), according to your too twisted and fickle understanding, there would be many gods and each hypostasis, in the godlike ones, it will be composed. Thus, you who have self-ordained as the defender of the above-mind simplicity, you have shown us the road towards a composed God.

[706] "He is multiplied while remaining One" etc. Saint Gregory Palamas is expressing here a supple, dialectical thinking, about God as Person, unlike the alternatives which exclude one another, in a simplistic manner: or One without any difference in His manifestations, or composed. The Person is One but free to manifest Himself, towards other persons, in different ways and on the measure of noticing power of them whom the Person manifests to, but the Person always remains whole and the Person makes Himself known wholly the same, but differently, revealed in His whole unity and hidden in his whole unity. Akindynos affirmed: nothing uncreated can "flow", because of reckoning that any manifestation if a "flowing"; on the opposite, what is created flows also as essence, not only as work (See the quoted study belonging to J. S. Nadal, S. J., in: "Istina Review", p. 367). He didn't know the difference between person and works, as Nadal who defended Akindynos, he didn't know it as well. A person is maintained in her/his indestructible and mysterious unity without being dissolved in her/his irradiations, as it happens to the things (that's why the person is eternally maintained even in hell, far from God). Just because of that, the person's manifestations aren't involuntary flowing, which the person is gradually dissolved through, or which the person is transformed in something else, but they are willing manifestations, which the person at will, while the person still remains the same. The more a person manifests herself/himself, the more that person is enriched in her/his unity, or that person is intensified in her/his unity. This is true even in the case of the human persons who are limited by their created character. Or, just through manifestations, the person proves her/his inexhaustible and unweakened unity. Akindynos condemned God to the impossibility of manifestation because of the fact that God is uncreated. This gives in the essentialist, non-personalistic conception about God. Only such a mentality could affirm that, because of being uncreated, God is so hard in His essence that he cannot manifest Himself, understanding the manifestation as a flowing. The uncreated was equal, to Akindynos, to petrification. The God of Akindynos and Barlaam, or the scholastic God, it is a rigid and dead substance of a philosophy simplistically rationalistic. The God of the Bible of the Fathers, of the believers, as affirmed by Palamas, He is a God Who is a Peron, living, free of manifesting His interest and His love.

24. But if the component works of those which subsist in themselves aren't contemplated in another – this has been a common dogma of the philosophers from outside and since the beginning – nothing of what exists will ever be said that it composes with the own work[708]. This is for, neither the burning

[707] "ενυπόστατα, αλλ ουχ υπόστασιν... ουχ ουσία αλλ ενούσια". The hypostatical characters belong to the hypostasis., they have their basis into hypostasis, but they are not the hypostasis itself. This is for, if we said that the hypostasis if the unborn, in abstract, the mystery of the person would be dissolved into something of impersonal, pantheistic character. It would be likewise, if the features and the works were confounded to the being, the being would be attracted out of its unfathomable mystery, into the order of the realities which are submitted to the rational; categories. That's why the Fathers said that the being of God is beyond the infinity, beyond the eternity, and beyond all the other features of it. "God is for infinite times infinitely above the existing realities, both of the shareable and non-shareable ones… All the immortal realities and itself the immortality, all the living ones and itself the life, all the holy realities and the holiness itself, all the virtuous realities and the virtue itself, all the good realities and the goodness itself, all the existing realities and the existence itself, all of those are things of God… God is above the being of all of them whoa re cogitated and named" (Saint Maximos the Confessor, Gnostic Heads 1: 49-50; The Romanian Philokalia, vol. II, pp. 140-141). Palamas, following to the Eastern Fathers, he sees the indefinite mystery of the Person as beyond all His impartable manifestations. This is for, Palamas reckons, as the Eastern Fathers did, that the being exists only as Person, for the person is the mode of real and eternal existence of the being (τρόπος την υπάρξεως).

power makes composed the source of the warmth, neither the ray makes the light composed. This fantasy belongs to you, because of preaching the total indistinction of The Uncreated One, threefold in hypostasis. This is for, by being many the uncreated realities, they are one, in the same time, and each of them is en-hypostatical (it subsists in hypostasis) and, in this sense, it is self-hypostatical. And the natural works and the hypostatical characters, by being many, they converge in one, for none of them is in hypostasis as self-hypostatical[709], it neither have been before, nor it will be after, neither it is possible to subsist in another certain essence, as belonging to its nature[710].

25. And anything that is composed from diverse essences, either by merging, or by unmixed union, which are contemplated in several hypostatical characters of a hypostasis, but in each of them not as several full hypostases but only one, because of, otherwise, it would no longer be one and because it isn't composed. And this one it differs through the facts that either is from diverse essences, or it is from an essence and from the ones which are contemplated in Him as in a support, and by that there are essential and opposite differences. But not only through this ones, but also by the fact that they are innate to some different essences, and due to them, all the created realities will endure changes by growth and diminution, by assimilation and rejection, by working and by suffering, and so it suffers also the loss of some of them who existed together.

[709] The works do not compose the unit which they belong to, because they do not exist in it as some own hypostases, self-standing, but they exist into the respective hypostasis (ουδεν τούτων εν υποστάσει ως αυθυπόστατο εστιν). The common hypostasis brings to unity the works or the manifestations of a unit. It is the same mystery of the indestructible unity of a person, a unity that keep in non-composed unity all the person's manifestation. The works cannot be detached from the person, but the person is in them as continuous spring and base of them, the works show the unity of the whole in all its manifestations. The work is also called as self-hypostatical for it doesn't irradiates out of another hypostasis.

[710] By saying now that they are not in another essence (ουδε εν έτέρα ουσία), after he said that they are in hypostasis, Saint Gregory shows that the natural works do not come out of being contemplated outside the hypostases. It springs out only from that being that subsists, really, in the three hypostases. Even here, he is saying that "it doesn't subsist in another essence", namely it is in that essence that subsists in hypostasis. But it is not a manifestation that was before or that it will always be the same, as a hypostasis. If it was so, it would mean to be identified to the hypostasis or to the essence. The works come from and they withdraw into hypostasis. They are various. But their unity is provided by the unity of the being or of the hypostasis that is the spring and the basis of all the ones which it can potentially comprise and it actually manifests.

Thus, they prove to be submitted also to a full decomposition. And everything that decomposes itself, it is, necessarily, composed too.

26. But at God, by existing only one undivided essence, there is no diminution, neither is there growth, nor is there adding, neither is there loss; so, there is neither division, which would make obvious the composition from before[711]. And "as many as God has", in order I to use the words of Athanasius the Great, "He has them through Himself, and not as they would have been achieved by Him"[712]. And He has them only as working, and not as He would have suffered through them[713]. That's why God is totally outside opposition, an opposition that would cause Him a transformation. Himself, amongst all realities, is the only One having no essential differences, but He has works, as we showed before. Due to those works, all the realties are submitted to Him, as matter, and even the understanding ones, they are submitted to Him Who bears all realities with His word, batter said with His will, namely to Him Who bears them through His atemporal, untired, and non-suffering work[714]. But neither one could see ever, something of [711] So, Saint Gregory Palamas is rejecting here the idea that was attributed to him and that still is attributed him today by a part of the Catholic scholastics, that, by admitting the uncreated energies, he would admit a diminution of the divine essence into these energies, in s Neoplatonic sense. This would be the case only if God was understood as impersonal substance. In such case, the admission of the diminution couldn't be avoided except by affirming, as in the scholastic theology, the absence of any manifestation of that substance, based on the fact of being uncreated. A substance that irradiates out of itself, it will gradually decompose, in order to recompose itself into another substance, or, might be, to recompose again in itself, as in theosophy and anthroposophy. Actually, this is a vision characteristic to any pantheism. The faith in God as Person, it avoids understanding God as a petrified substance, one lacking any manifestation, as also the decomposition through irradiation. The unity of the Person is of such a nature that, though it doesn't remain closed rigidly in itself, it won't decomposed itself through irradiation, neither it will compose itself with its manifestations.

[713] Here to, we can see that god is considered as consummate Person. This is for the person manifests herself/himself as freely working, and not as suffering unwillingly, a flowing, one that would diminish and it would compose the person, so that the person to suffer essential modifications produces upon that person, from outside, or by an internal law. The created herself/himself person is called to reach the dispassion into God, out of the mix of activity and passivity.

[714] In the working and totally non-passive character of God (here it is justified the expression: Deus is actus purus, but not in the sense that He would be always the same act and He would not be Person, a spring of His totally dispassionate acts) it is shown, by excellence, the free character of God as Person. And in this is shown the fact that God is not submitted to any the ones belonging to God, as belonging, by nature, to someone else from among all the other ones. And this is for, that that belongs to God as to Him Who is the Only One working through them[715]. "This is for, nobody, he says, is good, except God (Mk. 10: 18), "the blessed and the Only Master, the only One Who has immortality, dwelling into the unapproachable light" (1 Tim. 6: 15,16). Where there you bring out from, the suspicion about the composition of God out of different natures, once He always manifests Himself unitarily?[716] And among the Three Hypostases Each One is consummate and different, in that untold and above-all-mind-and-word union. No one could contrive that each Hypostasis stays by Himself, without the others, and so, from that, to follow a composition. "This is for, I do not reach, he says, to understand with my mind, how am I enlightened by One through Three". So, the union and the consummation of the Three Hypostases rejects, here too, the composition.

27. Consequently, you must understand and defend the godlike simplicity, but without abolishing His natural out comings, as they wouldn't exist, and neither you to reckon the without-evening and eternal light, as begun, nor you to affirm two godheads and two godlike origins of the good, namely created and uncreated. This is because, only thus there actually would be two of them. This is because, by being both of them created, both the being and the work, there is no hindrance they both to be one, as there are the ray and the sun a sole light. Neither will you reckon that the godhead and the Kingdom of God would be created. This is for, these ones are works of composition or fatal "flowing" (involuntary irradiations), which would diminish Him and take Him to decomposition. God is so strong and free in His quality as worker, so that He does and upholds all realities, when he wills, with Hisa word, and He has not to make any effort in order to overcome some resistance, or some power which would oppose Him.

[715] The realities which do not have by nature some feature that is characteristic to God, they do not work only through that, as God does. The features of God represent, therefore, the modes of His essential work; they represent God's character as Person, by excellence active, non-passive, and so uncomposed, as exclusively working from Himself, and not helped or pushes from outside or from inside.

[716] Saint Gregory Palamas is affirming here what we have noticed repeatedly: God Who manifests Himself unitarily in all realities, He is not composed, for He is the Person by excellence Who doesn't lose His unity by manifesting Himself, but He reveals His unity by doing so. In all God's works He is felt as the same whole Subject working.

The unitary manifestation means That One and the Same as Person, He is present in all His manifestations. And this absence of the composition at Him, it results out of His quality as consummate Person.

God[717]. Neither will you lower the deifier grace on the level of the creature, so that you won't lower together with the grace Him also Who has the grace by nature and Who provides the grace. Neither will you show as a lie the fact that the Son of God has made Himself as we are. This is because, how would have Him deigned to make Himself as we are, for us, if He hadn't imparted us with the Holy Ghost, but with a creature, or, better said, if he hadn't given us the ghost of the adoption in exchange for the human body, a body that He took it out of the Virgin, so that he has made Himself man?[718] Neither will you make as dwellings of the creatures on them who are churches of God, namely the saints; nor will you make yourself so unblessed, so that you will not only abstaining yourself from the godlike and deifier impartation, but, tragically, you even rejecting the hope in it. Neither will you make God so helpless, so that He couldn't give, as gift, His holy impartation to His cleaned rational creatures. Better said, you won't make God as lacking a being and as lacking hypostases. By saying that He is, in all regards, one and the same with His works, which are, by themselves, non-existential and non-hypostatical, namely neither essences nor hypostases[719]. Neither will you make shareable the essence of God, for that essence is above-essence and it is above-name and it is, in itself, non-shareable and non-manifested, because you would call as essence everything that exists. Neither will you appear like another Eunomius, by doing like he did and calling all of the hypostatical ones (the characters), as [717] Saint Gregory Palamas is naming here, according to the example of Dionysus the Areopagite, also the work of God, namely also His light, as the His Kingdom and His godhead, for within them God shows Himself as Person, but also because himself the being of God is above any name.

[718] Actually, if Christ hadn't given us the uncreated Ghost, He wouldn't have given the Ghost either to His human nature, or to His body. Then the embodiment wouldn't have been committed, except only in a Nestorian sense. The divine nature and the human nature have remained fully separated into Christ. Or, all the wonderful deeds worked through the body they are supra-natural works, but created by Christ as God in His humanity. By and large, the catholic conception about the miraculous phenomena, as phenomena produced by the created supra-natural grace, it tied the miraculous phenomena magically to the nature, and it doesn't reckon them as manifestation of the direct power of God.

[719] One of the consequences resulting out of the theory of Barlaam and Akindynos, it is that too, that if the works of God had been one and the same with His essence and hypostases, because these ones aren't by themselves either essence or hypostases, it would have been annulled both the essence and the hypostases of God. And this means, simply, that God wouldn't have existed. A God Who had been unworking, it would have been a helpless God – and therefore an inexistent God.

uncreated, as the being of God, under the pretext of the godlike simplicity. Neither will you become a Monothelite by making the godlike nature from within Christ as deprived of work. Neither another Sabellius, by reckoning, in another manner, the names of God as empty of realities, as some names which would mean, all of them, the same things, namely only essence. Let yourself not to endure all of these, by calling the works of God as created and, through empty contrivances, you to showing God's simplicity as no longer being anything. And let yourself believe in the same God, divided and undivided, united in division and distinct in union, not gone out from Himself in outgoings, and always moving Himself in motionlessness, dividing Himself undividedly, and sharing Himself whole as the sunray does.

28. But let's get again to the core of the things, he who preaches God as One and simple, let him be clear as Basile the Great was, who said: "How won't be non-composed Him Who is simple according to His being? This is for, not the modes which show what he actually is, not those alter the rationality of His simplicity. This is because, thus, all the things said about God, they will show us God as composed. And from here will follow that, if we want to save the idea of God's simplicity and non-division, we will have either not to say anything about God, except that He is uncreated, and to abstains ourselves from calling God as incorruptible, unchangeable, creator, judge, and all the ones which we are accepting now in theology, or, in the alternative that we accept the names, what will we do? Will we make all of them as being? But then we will no longer show Him only as composed, but we will even say about His that He is composed out of unresembling parts, for the motif that by each name is indicated something else and something else"[720].

29. When you hear us, therefore, saying that something else is the being and something else is the work, you will understand that something else and something else we call what is signified by each of these, again as the Great Basil said. And again: "If we took as part of the being the unbegottenness, then would have some room the word that the composition consists of different parts. But if we understand through the being of God the light, or the life, or the good, the whole that is being the life, and the whole that is being the light, and the whole that is being the good, namely the life or the unbegottenness, how will be non-composed Him Who is simple according to His being?"[721]. And he again says towards the heretics who were saying towards him: so, what you are telling us, it is that God is simple and everything that you count out of Him is a known part of His being: "this is a sophism comprising tens of thousands of insanities. If there are so many counts, are those names of the being and they have no meaning?"[722]. And again: "One must know that we do name the greatness of God and His power and His wisdom, and not His being Itself"[723]. But when you hear us saying that something else is the being and something else is the power or the work of God, you know that that we are saying about this one, for the power and the work of God are somewhat known, but the being of God is known to nobody.

30. But the Lord of the knowledge, and Who teaches the knowledge to the man, and Who gives the wisdom as a gift, and Who straightens the wise one, "into Who there are hidden all the treasures of the wisdom and of the knowledge" (1 Col. 2: 3), "let Him give you the ghost of the wisdom and of the unveiling into His knowledge, by enlightening the eye of your heart, in order you to see which is the hope of His calling and which is the richness of the glory of inheriting Him into saints, and which is the overwhelming greatness of His power towards you who believe according to the work of His power, which He worked it into Christ" (Eph. 1: 17-20), "in The One Who can make, through His power that is working within us, way more than the ones which we ask for, or which we think at" (Eph. 3: 20). Who it is due the glory forever and ever. Amen.

[721] Ibid. Through the introducing sentence of this quote, and through the quote itself, Saint Gregory Palamas wants to say: if we referred each name only to a part of the being, it would be justified the accusation that we make the being of God as composed. But if we refer each name to a work, but we see working in that work the whole hypostatized being, this accusation won't be justified any longer. P. Hristou (in the edition of the work of Palamas, tome I, p. 162, note no. 2), he deduces from here, as being unjust, the accusation formulated by the Catholic theory, referring to the fact that Palamas would consider the being of God as composed, through the difference Palamas makes between being and energy. This is for, according to him, the different names indicate only manifestations of an undivided being. The fact is that Palamas sees in each manifestation the presence of the whole divine being, but Palamas doesn't see, though, the being as exhausted in any manifestation. Each name signifies a work, but the signified work isn't separated from the whole being, but the whole being is present in what is signified, but the being is not exhausted in that. If through each name we indicated the being, because of each name meaning something else, they would indicate part of the being, and, if that had been the case, the being would have been composed.

The Hagiorite Tome

For them who live with holiness in quietude. In order to clarify them who, because of their inexperience, and because of their disobedience to the saints, they reckon the mysterious works of the Ghost, which are worked within them who live according to the Ghost, in an above-word manner, and which are shown through deeds and not only proven in words.

The dogmas uttered today and which are known, by and large, to everyone, they were mysteries of the Law given through Moses, foreseen only by prophets, into Ghost. And the goods promised to the saints for the future age, they are mysteries of the living according to the Gospels, given and shown in advance, them who have been found worthy of seeing into Ghost, and to those ones, with measure, as an earnest. But, as during the Law, if some Jew didn't listen, with thankfulness, to the prophets who were saying that the Word and the Ghost of God are together-eternal and from before ages, and so he covered his ears because of reckoning that he was hearing words forbidden by the right-faith and opposite to the faith as confessed by the right-worshippers, which said: "Your Lord God is One Lord", likewise will happen to somebody nowadays, if he doesn't listen, with piousness, when one speaks about the mysteries of the Ghost, which are known only to them who have been cleaned by virtue.

And again – like the end of those foretellings it showed the mysteries from then as matching the mysteries discovered later on, and now we believe into the Father, into the Son, and into the Holy Ghost, a Godhead in Three Hypostases, a sole nature, simple, non-composed, uncreated, unseen, and above-cogitation – likewise, when will be unveiled, at the appropriate time, in the future age, at the untold showing of God Who is in Three Hypostases, consummate, the mysteries which are being preached nowadays will be shown, plainly, to everyone.

We must take in account also the fact that, though the threefold hypostatical Trinity of the godhead, unweakened by the rationality of the unity, It later showed Itself to the whole earth, the prophets knew It exactly, even before the fulness of time. And they who listened to the prophets, they accepted that easily. Likewise, they won't remain unknown, either to us, the meanings of the things daringly preached, and which have been shown, in advance, and mysteriously, into Ghost, if we are worthy of that. This is for, some people knew those by their own experience, namely all of them who rejected, for the sake of the living according to the Gospel, the wealth of the goods, the glory form the people, and the lacking of beauty pleasures of the body; and not only that, but they even strengthened that rejection by obeying them who reached the fulness of the age of Christ (Eph. 4: 13). The last one, occupying themselves, through appeasement, in a worriless manner, with themselves and with God, and, through lean prayer, by reaching themselves, and, through the mysterious union - that above-mind union – with God, and by being they elevated into God, they knew the above-mind realities. And they who obeyed such saints, they knew God by trusting and loving the saints whom they obeyed to[724].

Thus, us too, by listening to the Great Dionysus, who speaks about this in his Second Epistle towards Gaius, we believe that "the deifier gift of God is deification, godlike origin and the origin of the good, but God Who gives this gift to the worthy ones, He is above this godhead"[725]. This is because God doesn't experience multiplication, neither one affirms, by that, [724] They who are elevated, after they have been freed of passions, through clean prayer, at God, they live, even from now, the goods of the future age promised through the dogmas of the Church.

[725] Dionysus the Areopagite, Epistle towards Caius. G.P. 3: 936 B. Palamas calls as godhead the deifier grace too, as willed irradiation out of Godhead. But God as Person, though he is in this deifier gift, for Himself whole produces the deification, He still isn't exhausted in this gift as work. As such, God is above that.

two godheads[726]. But the godlike Maximos, when writing about Melchisedec, he says that this deifier grace of God, it is uncreated and always existing out of God Who is always existent[727]. And he calls it, in other places, for many times, as unborn and an-hypostatical light (subsistent into hypostasis), one that is shown to the worthy ones, when they are found worthy, as that is not like a light coming then to existence[728]. This saint calls that light also as the light of the untold glory and the cleanness of the angels. And Makarios the Great calls it as the nourishment of the bodiless ones, the glory of the godlike nature, the beauty of the future age, godlike and heavenly fire, untold and mental light, the earnest of the Holy Ghost (2 Cor. 1: 22), and sanctifier oil of the gladness (Ps. 44: 8[729]).

So, anyone who places among Messalians and who call as Ditheists (worshippers of two gods), on them who reckon this deifier grace of God as uncreated, unborn, and en-hypostatical, let them know that they are opposing the saints of God and they will remove themselves from the group of them who will be saved, if they do not repent; and they will even fall from the One and Only by nature God Who is worshipped by the saints. And anyone who believe and who listen and who speak together with the saints, and who do not contrive reasons out of sins, and who do not reject as non-knower that what is told in an unveiled manner, but without knowing the kind of the mystery, let them not disregard searching for and trying to learn from them who know. This is for, they will find out that nothing is opposite to the godlike words and things, and this in the necessary realities which nothing could exist without, neither will be there any godlike mystery.

Everybody who argues that the consummate union with God is done only by imitation and by natural urge, without the [726] Just because God doesn't experience multiplication, He is whole too in His deifier grace, as Person, and this grace can be called as godhead without affirming, by that, that there would be two godheads.

[727] Ambigua; G.P. 91: 1141 B.

[728] The grace called by Saint Maximos the Confessor as light having its basis into hypostasis, by having its foundation and its starting place in the godlike hypostases, it has, by that, an objective subsistence. So, it is not created out of nothing, neither it is a subjective hallucination, but it has been existing from ever, as the godlike hypostases have been existing too. It is a personal irradiation of God.

[729] In KJB we have: Ps. 45: 8: "All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made thee glad."; in ROB we have: Ps. 44: 10: "The myrrh and the aloe embalm Your vestments; out of ivory palaces lute songs gladden You."

deifier grace of the Ghost, as between them who have the same habits and who love on one another, and they reckon the deifier grace of God as a habit of the rational nature, one that is achieved only by imitation but not through above-nature illumination and through godlike work seen in an unseen manner by them who have been made worthy, and understood in an non-understood manner, let that one know that he has fallen into the straying of the Messalians, without realizing it. This is for, the deified one would have been, necessarily, God by nature, if the deification had been made through a natural power and if it has been comprised amongst the borders of the nature[730].

That's why, let not one like this to try and imprint his crooked cogitation into them who cogitate rightly, and so him to plant the defilement into them who are undefiled into faith, but, by rejecting his thought, let him learn from the experienced ones, or from them who have been taught by the experienced ones, that the gift of the godhead is totally untied (to the created realities), not being in nature any power capable of producing it, because, if that had been the case, it wouldn't have been grace, but a manifestation of a work of a natural power. On the other hand, what had been done, it wouldn't have been a wonderful thing, if the deification had been produced through a power of the nature capable of deification. The deification would have been, in such a case, a result of the nature and not a gift from God. And one who have reached the deification in such circumstances, he could have been called as god by nature, in a proper senses.

But that power according to the nature of each one amongst existences, it is not something else but a non-deviated movement of the nature towards the work. But, if that had been the case, what the godhead would have got out of itself the deified one, if the godhead had been comprised within the limits of the nature – that I cannot understand…

Therefore, the grace of the deification is above-nature, above virtue, and above-knowledge, and all of these are, according to the godlike Maximos, endlessly lower than the grace. This is for the whole virtue and imitation of God by our powers, it makes him who have those, to be worthy of the godlike union. But only the grace does, in a mysterious manner, itself this untold union. This is for, through grace, God Himself enters whole, in the worthy ones who are whole, and the saints enter whole, in God Whole[731], taking God within themselves, and achieving God only, as some kind of rewards for their climbing towards Him. This is for God penetrates in them like the soul into body, as in His limbs, and so God makes them worthy they to be within Him.

[730] The Hagiorite Tome, composed by Saint Gregory Palamas as an abstract of his writings against Barlaam, it accuses Barlaam and them who think as he did, of what Barlaam accused the hesychasts, namely of Messalianism. This is because, the Messalians, by reckoning that they saw the being of God as a natural light, they actually were pantheists, as pantheist is him too, who reckons as Barlaam did, that the godhead is a habit produced through the created power of the human being.

Everybody who argues that are Messalians they who say that the mind is placed within heart, or within brain, let him know that he sinfully wages war to the saints. This is because, Athanasius the Great says that the rational part of the soul is placed within the brain. And Makarios, who doesn't lack anything of the greatness, he places the work of the mind within heart. These two are agreed by almost all the saints. This is for, what the godlike Gregory of Nyssa says, that the mind is neither inside nor outside the body, for the mind is incorporeal, it doesn't oppose to the other saints' affirmations. This is for, those say that the mind is within body, as one that is united with the body. So, by saying this from another perspective, they do not differ at all from that one. This is for, neither him who says that the Word of God dwelled yore within the virginal and undefiled womb , he doesn't oppose another who says that the [731] Δι αυτης γάρ ολοισ ο Θεος περιχορει, ολοι δέ ολω τω Θεω περι χωρουσιν. God Whole makes His "perichoresis" in the worthy ones, and these ones whole make their "perichoresis" in God Whole. Namely, God Whole moves Himself in the wholeness of the worthy ones, and the worthy ones move with the wholeness of their being into God Whole. Nothing remains stranger to them, into God, and nothing form them remains outside God. But this means that neither the movement remain separated, but the movements interpenetrate one another. In the motion of the human nature there it moves the divine nature too, and in the motion of the divine nature it moves the human nature too, so that it is done a sole movement, without confounding the human to the divine, alike the combined movement of the soul and of the body. Saint Gregory Palamas is affirming here too, clearly, the union between God as Person with the worthy ones as persons. Only the persons unite entirely with one another, while, the receiving by a person of something material it is limited to that part received by that person. Without any doubt, the persons, by uniting with one another entirely, they still do not exhaust all their depths in this union, thought all those depths are touched by the union. The persons remain to one another, eternally, as reserves of power and of reciprocal giving. But the person is whole, though, on all levels that person communicates herself/himself to another person. The person gives herself/himself wholly, while remaining whole in herself/himself, as an inexhaustible reserve of giving.

godhead isn't in a place or it is incorporeal. This is for, that one cogitates about the Word that the Word united Himself above-word, with our dough, for His untold love for people[732].

Everybody who says that the light that shined to the disciples on Mount Tabor, it is a fantom and a symbol that is done and undone, and that doesn't really exist[733], and he argues that that light isn't an above-all-understanding work, but it is below-understanding, he surely opposes the witness of the saints. This is because, the saints either in speeches or in writings, they call that light as untold, uncreated, eternal, atemporal, unseen by angels and by people, the archetypal[734] and unchanged beauty, the glory of God, the glory of Christ, the glory of the Ghost, the ray of the godhead, and so on. For the body is glorified, he says, by receiving Him, and the glory of the godhead becomes the glory of the body. But the glory was unshown in the seen body, to them who weren't able to receive the realities which are unseen even to the angels[735]. Therefore, [732] The present tome doesn't take a side, either of those saying that the mind is within heart, not of those saying that the mind is within brain. Even more than that, it doesn't reject either the more spiritual opinion of Saint Gregory of Nyssa, according to whom the mind isn't either inside or outside the body. Palamas admits the mysterious and complex character of the connection between soul and body. And just because of that, he didn't take a simplistic and unilateral position. He doesn't join the opinion that the soul is exclusively outside the body, not he joins the opinion that the soul is within body as any other part of the body. One must admit a certain presence of the soul within body. But this presence is different from a material presence of a body's part. It is a presence within body, but it is an incorporeal presence; it is a presence within body, but this presence is above-understanding.

[733] Here the symbol isn't taken in the meaning of a sensitive permanent reality which something insensitive is shown through, but it is reckoned as a seen image passingly "materialized" (we haven't been able to find another equivalent term for the Romanian înfiripat, but we are queenly aware of the fact that "materialized" is mostly inadequate; neither it would be appropriate the term "concretized" (E. l. t.'s n.)) by God for something unseen. The godlike light shown on Tabor isn't the image of something unseen, for itself is something above-sight in the material sense, for itself has a spiritual character, for it is an unmediated irradiation out of God; it is 'seen" in an unseen manner, it is understood in a non-understood manner. It is a manifested presence of God, a presence perceived by a "feeling" of the understanding, but one that is not fully understood.

[734] "The archetypal beauty", That light, though doesn't have a material form, it is not something amorphous, disorganized, but it is felt within it a superior harmony, a plenitude of goods, and, therefore, it is very beautiful, it is even the model of beauty of all the seen beauties.

[735] It is about the body of Christ, that receives a harmony from its forming through the Hypostasis of the Word full of Holy Ghost. In the harmony of the body of Christ, it can be seen the glory of God. But the harmony, the beauty, and the glory of the body of Christ, they were unseen by those who didn't have spiritual eyes. Of this consisted the humbleness or the descent or the kenosis of the Word, one covering His body too. It wasn't forcedly imposed, Christ transfigured Himself not by receiving what he didn't have, neither by transforming Himself in what He wasn't, but he unveiled to His disciples what he was, by opening their eyes and by making them seers out of blind[736]. This is for, by remaining the Same He made Himself seen to His disciples, by showing Himself unlike He showed Himself before. For He is the true light (Jn. 1: 9), the beauty of the glory. "And he shinned like the sun". This comparison is unworthy of Him, because it is impossible the uncreated to totally be expressed by using created things.

Everybody who says that only the being of God is uncreated, but not His eternal works too, which he exceeds all of them, as One who works on what he works, let his hear Saint Maximos who says: "All the immortal realities and the immortality itself, all the living realities and the life itself, all the saint realities and the holiness itself, all the virtuous realities and the virtue itself, all the good realities and the goodness itself, all the existing realities and the existence itself, they obviously are things of God. But some of them started existing in time (for there was a time when they didn't exist), while others didn't start existing in time. For there wasn't a time when there wasn't virtue, or kindness, or holiness, or immortality"[737]. And again: "The goodness and everything that is comprised in the meaning of the goodness, and simply: the whole life, the immortality, the simplicity, the unchangeability, the limitlessness, and all the realities which are existentially contemplated around God, they are things of God, but which didn't start in time. For, there hasn't ever been something more ancient than the virtue, neither more ancient than any of the mentioned things we have mentioned above, even though the realities which are imparted with them started existing in time. This is for, any virtue existed before time started existing, for the virtue has God from ever, as sole spring of His existence. But God is elevated for infinite times infinite above all but it was unveiled only to them who entered, by faith, the communion with Him. How often are we experiencing the beauty of a good-looking person only when entering the communion with that person!

[736] The seeing of the above-nature light through the humanity of Christ, it meant, to the disciples, also a supreme entering the communion with Him. Who could tell how they entered that communion, by climbing that mountain, in a dialogue of great intimacy with Him, but a dialogue which they felt, intensely, His godhead?

[737] Gnostic Heads 1: 50; The Romanian Philokalia, vol. II, pp. 139-140.

existences, either they imparted themselves, or they let themselves to be imparted"[738]. Therefore, let him learn, out of these, that no all the realities which subsist out of God are under time too. This is for, there are some of them which are without beginning and they are not abolished because of the Trinitarian unity, the Only One without-beginning-by-nature, and because of the Trinity's above-nature-simplicity. As, in the same way, the mind, as a faded icon of that overwhelming non-division, it isn't composed by any means, due to the mind's natural understandings[739].

Everyone who doesn't admit the truth of the spiritual states imprinted into the body - by the gifts from the Ghost which are in the soul of them who have advanced in their life according to God, and he calls as dispassion the killing, through habituation, the passionate side, and not the habituation to the work towards the good ones, of him who has turned himself away from the evil things and who has directed himself towards the good thing, as one who has rejected his evil habits and he has enriched himself in the good habits – he denies, consequently to such opinions, also the living with the body in the incorruptible age, to them who exists (who are created)[740]. This is for, if in the future age the body too is imparted together with the soul, with the mysterious goods, the body will be imparted in the present age too, according to the power, with the grace given, as a gift, by God, in a mysterious and untold manner, to the cleaned mind, and the body too will impropriate the godlike ones according to itself. Thus, the body is transformed and it is sanctified but without being the passionate part killed, by habituation. And the passionate part, [739] The uncreated works of God do not affect the simplicity of His being, for the Person doesn't lose His unity by His works, but He shows Himself whole in every work od His.

[740] The dispassion doesn't mean the death of the passionate power of the soul, but it means getting habituated to directing its work towards the good things. The dispassion isn't motionless, in a Buddhist sense, but it means love for the good things, for God and for people. The dispassion doesn't mean "apathy", but it means full-of-love interest in everything that is good for people. It is not about carelessness, but it is about mercy and positive and painful responsibility, as Jesus felt. Barlaam, as philosopher, he was easily carried away by this contempt of Buddhist fashion, towards everything that wasn't an undisturbed cogitation, towards this unilateral intellectualism, which the Occidental theology tend towards, by and large. He who thinks like that, he will no longer be able to understand what the body is preserved for, in an eternal life. This is because, the body without the passionate power directed towards good, it won't be more than an empty shell, a totally meaningless apparition.

by being common to the body and to the soul, the body's tendencies and works are sanctified too[741]. This is for, by being detached from the goods of the life from here, due to the hope for the future goods, and by moving in a healthy manner through the lack of worries, the mind will feel, according to saint Diadochus, the godlike untold goodness, so that the mind will convey to the body too, as it advances, its kindness[742]. And this joy, one occurring within soul and within body, it is a non-liar proof of the incorruptible life.

The mind perceives (catches) a light, the feeling catches another light. The feeling perceives (catches) that light submitted to the senses, which shows the things submitted to the sense as submitted to the senses. And the light of the mind it is the knowledge being into meanings. Consequently, the sight and the mind do not perceive (catch) the same light; but only as long as each of them works according to its nature and into the realities according to nature. But when they are imparted with an above-nature grace or power, they who have been found worthy they will see both with their sight and mind the realities which are above all feeling and mind[743], we to say

[741] One must not kill the passionate part, but one must sanctify the passionate part. And by being the passionate part sanctified, the body will be sanctified too, given the fact that the passionate part is common both to body and soul. This is for the passionate power is activated through body. The body participates to the soul's life through the passionate power of it. The soul and the body are intertwined in the passionate side.

[742] But the rational power isn't separated form the mind. But it is the power which the mind works through, upon the body, and it sanctifies the body. In the passional power, the mind still meets the body. The mind, by rejoicing more of the immaterial realities, it attracts the body too, through the passional part, to love those immaterial realities.

[743] Saint Gregory Palamas often stresses upon the mysterious union that is between soul and body. In the perceiving of the senses the soul meets the body. The body won't be body without the life of the soul from within body. The soul's life is the body's life too. Still, on the plan of the natural life, in the work of the senses the body is dominant, while in the work of the mind the soul is dominant. But the union between the two works, or between soul and body, it will become full when the Holy Ghost dwells within the believer, or when the believer has become spiritualized and he has been elevated to a work that exceeds both the natural work of the senses and the mind's work. In that superior and unifier work, the work of the sense receives a character or even more accentuated spirituality, and the work of the mind becomes even more sensitive. The possibility of this spiritualization of the sensitiveness, or of sensitizing the spirituality, it is given by the fact that the whole seen reality is actually a dynamic plasticized rationality (the science says today that that is the mass of energy, or vice versa); and all the more the human body, as crossed and moved by the rational soul. Diadochus of Photice says: "The eye of will no longer be deceived, when its cover has become - namely the body - through restraint, a very thin fabric". (One Hundred Heads 71;

150 Heads about the Natural Knowledge, about the Knowledge about God, about the Moral Life, and about Doing

21. About the fact that the world started, we are taught by the nature, we are entrusted by history, and we a limpidly shown that by the inventions of the craftsmanships, by the provisions of the laws, and by the orders of the states. This is for we know the inventors of almost all craftsmanships, and the giver of the laws, and the initial founders of the states. And we know also them who wrote, for the first time, about something. But we do not see any of them living before the creation of the world and of the time, told us by Moses. And Moses himself, who described the beginning of the creation of the world, we gave us, by so many wonderful things and words, undeniable proofs about the truth he presented, so that almost the whole mankind reckoned him as worthy to be believed, while reckoning as laughing matter them who thought the opposite ones. But the nature too of this world, by always needing a new beginning for each thing within it, and the world not being able to live without it at all, it shows us just through things, its first beginning that it wasn't out of another beginning[744].

[744] If the world hadn't had a beginning, we wouldn't have known the founders of the states, the inventors of the craftsmanships, or the giver of the laws. All of those would have been

22. The fact that the world hadn't only started, but had followed to have an end too, it is shown to us by its nature, as one that is amongst the random ones. This is because it always ends into its part[745]. But the sure and unshakeable entrustment for that, it is given to us by the prophecy of all of them who were instilled by God and the prophecy of Christ Who is God. Believing to these ones, as them who told the truth, it is ought not only by the pious, once they see that those told the truth also regarding all the other things they foretold. One can find out from those not the fact that this whole world advances towards inexistence but, as our bodied will be detached, likewise the world will be detached and it will be recomposed too, out of the power of the godlike Ghost, in a more godlike form, in order the world to be on our measure.

23. The wisemen of the Hellenes say that the sky turns through the nature of the soul of the world, and that even the right-reckoning and the rationality teach us that. What right-reckoning? What rationality? This is because, if the sky had turned by that power of the world which they call it soul, and that souls belongs to the whole world, how wouldn't have turned also the earth and the water and the air, especially for, according to them, the soul is always in movement? But we see that the earth stands by its nature, likewise does the water keeping the lowest place. Thus, also the sky always moves by its nature and it moves in a circle, always keeping the highest place. And then, how could have been this soul of the world, whose nature the sky had been moved through? It is, I wonder, a rational soul? But then it would have had a free will and it wouldn't have moved the sky with the same movements. This is because the realities which have a free will they move one time in a way, and another time in another way. And then, what trace of rational soul can we see in the lowest sphere of the world, namely into the earth, or in those close to earth, in water, in air, and even in fire? This is because the soul of the from ever. All the things have a beginning in the frame of the world. But the world itself must have a beginning that hadn't begun out of something else, out of which there had appeared another beginning.

[745] The world doesn't appear to be unconditionally necessary, as necessarily existing. The world is contingent. It could also not to exist. Still, the world doesn't exist haphazardly. The world exists for God wanted that. The fact that the world isn't unconditionally necessary it is proven by the fact that the world always ends in its constitutive parts. This shows the fact that the world will have, as whole, and end too.

world must belong to these ones too. And then, how could be some of them animated and others unanimated? This is admitted by them too. And the last ones are not like that only partially, but the stone if whole stone, the metal is whole metal, the dust is whole dust, the water, the air, and the fire, all are likewise. And about fire, they too say that it moves by its nature and not by soul. So, if the soul had been common, what it could have moved like, only the sky, by the nature of the soul – and not by its own nature? But they might say that the soul, that, according to them, it moves the heavenly body, it isn't a rational soul. But what could that be like, if that sol was the spring of our souls? If it is not rational, it will have to be at least sensitive or natura (vegetal). But we cannot see any of these qualities as moving a body without limbs. And some organic limb we do not see being had either the sky, or the earth, or by any of the natural elements. This is because any organ is composed of diverse substances. But each of the natural elements has a simple substance, especially does so the sky[746].

The soul is the entelechy of the organic body that has the life in potentiality[747]. But the sky, thought, by not having any limb or organic part, it won't be able to survive either. How could have had soul, everywhere, what cannot survive? But they who have made themselves vain in their cogitations, they contrived with an unwise heart, a soul that neither is nor it will be, and they made this soul as the builder, the ruler, and the caretaker of the whole seen world. They also describe that soul as some sort of root and spring of our souls, that soul having its own birth form the mind. And they say that this mind it is something else, according to its being, unlike what they say that God, God being above all realities. So are dogmatized these ones, the most important personalities in what regards the wisdom and in the theology of the Hellenes, and so they are no better at all, than those who deify the animals and the stones and, even on the opposite, they are worse regarding the faith.

[746] In this chapter and in the next one, it is combated the theory of a soul of the cosmos, the cosmos-zoism, or the cosmos-psychism, or the hylozoism, that is one of the forms of the Hellene pantheism.

[747] The Aristotelian theory of the soul as entelechy or as form of the organic body, which the body is taken through towards a target of it, it has been accepted also by some Church Fathers. The body has the live in potentiality, in the sense that the life is developed, or it is actualized. And because the soul is tied to the growing organic life, one can also say that, most part of the soul is, at the beginning, a potentiality that develops.

This is for, the beasts, the gold, the stone, the brass, they are something, despite they are amongst the last ones of the creatures. But a soul of the world, one bearing stars, it doesn't exist, and it isn't at all something amongst the existing realities, except it is a contrivance of the devilish cogitation.

24. Those ones also say: because the heavenly body must move, but there farther isn't any place which the sky could advance towards, the sky turns back to itself, and its advancing is but a spinning. Very well. So, if there had been a place, the sky would have been carried upwards as in case of the fire, or even more than the fire, for it is lighter than the nature of the fire. And this movement isn't of the nature of the soul, but it is of the lightness of the nature. If, therefore, the advancing of the sky means spinning around, and this is had, by its nature and not by the nature of the soul, then the heavenly body will spin not by the nature of the soul, but by its own nature. So, it has not soul, neither there is some heavenly soul, or of the entire world. The sole rational soul is the human soul, that is not heavenly and that cannot be comprised in a place, but, by its nature, the human soul is understanding essence[748].

25. And the heavenly body has not the power to advance or to stretch itself upwards. And this is not because of no longer being there any space, but because of being wrapped by the sky also the sphere of the ether from beyond it. That's why it doesn't advance upwards, not because there is no place which to advance towards, for the width of the sky is covered by the sphere of the ether. It doesn't stretch above that sphere because of being that thinner, so that it is above the sky by its nature. So, not because of not having space above itself, the sky won't go higher, but because there is no other body thinner and lighter that itself is.

26. There is not body higher than the heavenly body. But this isn't the cause because of not being the heavenly body able to go higher, but it is because the sky comprises any body and there is and there was no body to go beyond the sky in order to cross through the sky. But we the right-worshippers and believers, we are not forbidden to reach above the sky, this is for, God Who fills all the realities up, He stretches beyond the sky too, endlessly, and He existed before the world was created, He filling up, as He fills up not too, the whole space from within world, and nothing has been added to Him in order to occur a certain body within Him. Consequently, neither outside the sky is some impediment, in order there not to be space, as there is the space around the world, or as there is the space that occurred within the world, so that there to be bodies in Him.

27. How then, once there is not impediment, the heavenly body doesn't direct itself upwards, but it moves in a circle, turning back to itself? This is for, by staying on top, the thinnest of all, it is above all bodies, and it is also the nimblest one in movement. As what is comprised but it, it is as heavy and as low as one can get, likewise the heavenly body is the lightest, and the highest, and the nimblest in movement. But if it moves by nature, remaining up to the surface, and what remains to the surface it cannot be separated by nature from those whose surface it stays to, and those to whose surface the heavenly body stay, they are spheric, necessarily, the heavenly body moves around those; and not by a souly nature, but by an own corporeal nature, for it is changes a place for another, in turns. And the movement is characteristic to the bodies, as the opposite state is opposed to the bodies[749].

28. Somebody can see also near to us, the winds which smooth out the surfaces, not separating themselves from these ones when moving, and not going higher, not because there is no space, but because the things from above them are lighter. So, the winds remain at the surface of the thins which they touch, because they are, by nature, lighter that those things. And they move around those things not by a souly nature, but y their own nature. I reckon that this partial resemblance was intended to be shown by the wise Solomon, when he called the heavenly body with the name of the winds, writing about it: "The wind goes around and it turns back to its circles" (Eccl. 1: 60. But the nature of the wind from around us it is so far from the nature of the higher things and from their as quick as possible motion, as far their lightness is too.

[749] Heads no. 4-7 present a vision about the sky that is outdated by the astronomical knowledge that had been achieved in the following centuries. But there is a truth in what Saint Gregory Palamas says: the nature's movement isn't carried by a soul, but by the law of physics.

29. According to the Hellenes' wisemen, there are two zones of the earth temperate and inhabited. Each of these is divided in two inhabited worlds, so that they give the world four of these. That's why I argue that there are four kinds of people, which cannot cross one to another. This is because, according to them, some people inhabit our area, together with us, being they separated from us by the burning area of the earth. Opposed to them, are those who, according to the Hellenes' wiseman point of view, they live beneath this area, as are opposed to us them who have the same tropic with us. Amongst those ones, some of them are opposed, other are at the antipodes and turned towards us. They didn't know the fact that, except the tenth part of the Earth's sphere, all the other parts are covered by water.

30. Anybody can know that except the world inhabited by us, no other part of the world is inhabited, because of being covered by seas. Let's take heed also at the fact that the four natural elements which the world consists of, are equal parts[750]. And due to the rarefied state of the air, and to the sphere of each of them, it has a volume multiplied in comparison to others, as it seems to Aristotle too. He says that there are five natural elements, spherically placed in five layers, the smaller layer always being comprised by the larger layer, the land by water, the water by air, the air by fire, and the fire by ether. And this is the world.

31. The ether is way more limpid than the fire is, and it is also called as burning matter. The fire has the multiplied volume of the air's sphere, the air of the water, the water of the earth which, due to the fact that is has the biggest thickness, it has the smallest volume of the four natural elements from [750] Then was admitted the idea that the natural world would be composed by four natural elements: earth, water, air, and fire, and above the world there would be the fifth element: the ether. This simplistic idea about the five natural elements, and about their unchanged proportions, about their positioning in ever wider circles which comprise one another, for instance, it is inferior to the biblical intuition about the great complexity of the world, intuition reiterated by the Holy Fathers. It was characteristic to the science and to a part of the Hellene and Byzantine philosophy, which the modern science rendered as obsolete. Saint Gregory Palamas has been using that "science" in the previous chapters, and he is going to use it in other following few chapters, by pursuing his goal to show that the soul cannot be present as a motion force all through this cosmos, because the soul is only within the human organisms living on earth, and the livable earth forms only the tenth part of the Earth's surface, and neither the entire land is lived, but only some areas of it which have a temperate climate, because, for instance, the areas which are too hot, they are uninhabited.

under the sky. So, the sphere of the water having the multiplied sphere of the earth, both spheres would move around the same center, both of the earth and of the water. The water wouldn't allow the beasts form on earth to use any part of the earth, because of covering the whole dry land and because of extending all over the earth's surface. But because the water doesn't comprise the whole earth's surface, for the dry land we inhabit is uncovered by water, the water's sphere is necessarily not tied to the earth's center. Consequently, one must research how much the water is outside the earth's center. Is the water higher or lower than we are? It cannot be higher, for we see that, partially, the surface of the water is below us. Therefore, the center of the water's sphere is lower than us, and even lower than the earth's center. It remains to be researched how far is the water from this center of the earth.

32. One could know how far, namely how low, from our point of view, it is the center of the water, from the center of the earth, by taking heed at the fact that to the surface of the earthly sphere, which is inhabited by us, it corresponds the surface of the water seen by us and which is below us, under the earth we step on. The part of the earth inhabited by us is a tenth of the earth surface. This is for, the earth has five areas, and we are inhabiting a half of one of these five areas. So, if one wants to apply to this tenth of surface a sphere around the earth, he will find out the sphere that it matches it. That will have the double of the sphere's diameter which is applied to, from outside, and which it comprises, and it size of eight times bigger and its center at the edge of the earth, which it seems to us the lowest. This thing is made clear by the drawing.

33. Let's say that the sphere of the earth is a circle inside which it is written A, B, C, and D, as around it is drawn instead of the sphere of the water, another circle, which is tangent to the surface of that tenth from above, of the circle from it. In this circle it is written E, F, G, and H. The edge of the inside circle, which, form out point of view, it is the lowest, that will be the center of the exterior circle. This one, by having a double diameter, one can show through geometrical demonstrations that the sphere of whose diameter the double of the diameter of the sphere that has its diameter as a half, it will be eight times bigger. This liquid sphere, that is eight times bigger it is mixed with the earth. That's why many spring gush out of earth, and the rich and unmixed water of the rivers occur and they flow into the not few seas; multitude of lacks are scattered and there almost isn't place on earth where, by digging, somebody won't find water flowing underneath.

34. This is because, except the part inhabited by us, there is no other inhabited part, it is shown also by both the drawing and the rationality. This is because, if the center of the water and of the earth had been identical, then the earth would have been totally uninhabited, likewise, and even much more so, if the water had as its center the lowest part of the earth, form out point of view, except the part inhabited by us, which is tangent to the upper part of the water's sphere, all the others would be covered by much water, so that they couldn't be inhabited. And because it was said before, that only in the inhabited part of the earth there is incorporated rational soul, and this one is the only one, it would turn out that only in this part dwell also the speechless beasts.

35. The sight is born out of combined colors and figures, on many ways; the smell is born out of steams, the taste out of wet, the hearing out of noises, the touch out of harsh or smooth surfaces by touching them. And the contents which are formed into senses are from bodies, but they aren't bodies, though they are corporeal. They neither are the shapes of the bodies as such, but they are their imprintings, some kind of images separated in an unseparated manner from the shapes of the bodies. These ones can be ascertained especially through sight and, especially so, those which cannot be seen in a mirror.

36. This imprinting from senses, by being they impropriated by the imagination power (imagining) of the soul, the soul will fully separate not the senses themselves, but, as I said before, the images from within them, from the bodies and from their shapes. And by having them gathered like a treasury, it brings to use, from inside, one at a time, even when the body is not present, and so makes all of them to itself, as seen, and heard, and tasted, and smelled, and touched[751].

37. This imagination power (imagining) of the soul it can be found in the rational creature, in the middle, between mind and senses. The mind, by looking and by turning into itself the images it received form senses, as separated from bodies and incorporeal images, it commits the diverse meanings, by discerning amongst them, by comparing them and by judging them in diverse modes, passionately, dispassionately, in an unmediated manner, wrongly, or unmistakingly. Out of these ones are born most of the virtues and of the sins, good and bad opinions. This is because, not the whole meaning of the mind comes out of these ones and it is about these ones, but there are some which cannot be found by somebody as coming from the senses, but they are given by the mind, and that's why I have said that not all the truth and the deceit, the virtue and the evilness from within thoughts have their beginning from imagination (imagining).

38. It is worthy to wonder about it and to be searched, how from the temporary and submitted to senses things, there can be born within soul a steadfast beauty or ugliness, a richness or a poorness, a glory or a lack of glory, and, simply speaking, a mental (intelligible) light producing eternal life, or a mental (intelligible) darkness causing torments.

39. The mind, when carried away by the soul's imagination, and by that intertwines with the senses, it gives birth to a combined knowledge. For instance, if somebody looks at the sundown with his senses, but he looks, in the same time, to the close moon that stays with its bulged part towards the sun, until, slowly, the moon get far during the next days and it becomes increasingly lightened, until the moon reaches on the other side of the sun, and then slowly comes closer with the other side diminishing its light increasingly more, until it loses it, and it reaches again on the other side of the sun. These views being memorized by the mind, as one that keeps the said things in its imagination, and the one that is always present into senses, it realizes, by common sense, and out of imagination and out of understanding, that the moon has its light from the sun and that the axis of the moon is closer to earth and the moon is way lover than the sun is[752].

[751] There is a distinction between the shapes which objectively depend on the bodies, and their images which these shapes imprint in senses and which, until they remain within senses, on one hand, they differ from the objective shapes of the bodies, but on the other hand, they are not separated from the bodies. Then, the imagination, by taking these images, it fully separates them from the shapes of the bodies, but without separating the senses themselves. This makes possible that, into imagination, the images of the things can take shapes somewhat different form the shapes of the things. Thus, the imagination has a creator function, and not simply a reproductive function, as the senses have. The imagination stores them within itself, and then it projects them when it wills, even in the absence of the bodies and of their shapes.

40. But, not only the data concerning the moon, but also those regarding the sun, the sun's eclipses, and the conjunctions at their time, the changes and the distances of the other planets on the sky, the diverse formations they compose together, and, in short, all the things we know about the sky, and then the rationalities of the nature, all the arts, the craftsmanships and, simply speaking, the whole knowledge gathered form partial observations, regarding all the things, we have gained them out of senses and out of imagination, through our mind. None of these can be called as spiritual, but rather natural, because of not comprising those ones of the Ghost.

41. Where we have found out from, something sure and non-liar about God, and about the entire world, and about ourselves? Not out of the teaching from the Ghost?[753] This is for the Ghost taught us that only God is The One Who really exists, and Who is always and Who is unchanged, and He doesn't receive His existence from the non-existing realities, and Who doesn't go towards inexistence; that He is in Three Hypostases and Almighty; that He brought, in six days, with His Word, to existence, the existing realities out of the inexistent realities[754], [752] He explains the judgments done by the mind, by using an association between the sensitive images we receive from the senses and which are recorded by imagination, and the images present within senses.

[753] We have the partial knowledge out of senses, out of imagination (memory) and out of mind, namely out of their common work. So, they compose the natural knowledge. But the sure and non-liar knowledge about the world as a whole, namely about the origin and the purpose of the world, about ourselves as unitary persons, and about God, it is no longer out of the three powers of our nature, but it is out of the teaching given us by the Holy Ghost and faithfully received by us.

[754] Following the advice from Saint Maximos the Confessor, he calls God as "He Who exists in existent or true way" (ο οντως ων), and the creatures are only the existing realities (τα οντα). The true existence or the existent existence it that coming from nobody, but from Himself, that one that doesn't change and it doesn't go towards decomposition (corruption). The simply existing realities, are those which have no existence within themselves, but they are brought to existence, from nothing, by God.

better said He gave existence concomitantly to all of them, as Moses says. This is for, we hear Moses saying: "In the beginning, God made the heavens and the earth" (Gen. 1: 4), not as a void, of course, neither without the realities from between them. This is because, the earth was mixed with water and each of them were bearing within them, as a pregnancy, the air and the animals and the plants according to their kinds[755]. And the sky comprised the diverse light and illuminators, which everything subsisted in[756]. Thus, God made at the beginning the heaven and the earth as a substance that comprised everything, and that bore everything in potentiality, disapproving from far, as is should, them who reckon that the matter preexisted from itself.

42. After that, beautifying somewhat and adorning the world, He Who has brought all realities to existence our of inexistence, He shared to each one, its own and due order according to its features, and He completed the world in six days, differentiating each reality only with His command, and bringing out like from some hidden treasuries, to they seen shapes, the realities placed within the world[757], by placing and by combining in the most harmonious and appropriate manner, one thing with another and each of them with all the other, and all of them with each one. And the steadfast earth, He surrounded it like some center, with a very high circle, and He tied it up, all-wisely, through the realities from within middle, with the always in motion sky[758], so that the same world is both steadfast and moving.

43. By giving such an order to each of the edges of the whole, the Great Craftsman fixed into motionlessness and He set – in the same time – this whole in motion, and so He made it a well composed world. And to the ones which are between these edges, He shared, again, to each one what was due. He placed some of them up and He commands them to swirls at [755] Κυοφορουν – pregnant. The earth and the water were pregnant with the plant and with the animals they were to give birth. They have within them, virtually, the plants and the animals. It is hinted here a conception resemblant to the conception of the today's science. It seems that there would be also about ether, as a pregnancy of the earth and of the water. So, the natural elements weren't, though, separated, especially at the beginning.

[756] Saint Gregory Palamas hinted here that in the light, or in its energy, had its subsistence the whole created world.

[757] The plants and the animals, but also all the shapes in movement were potentially given in the original substance of the world, as in some hidden treasuries.

height and to move together with the highest border of the whole, in good planning and order, for the whole time. He placed those which are light and fruitful and easy to process, in the use of the people. He placed those which get warm above the middle temperature, to raise, on a good purpose, above the others, in order they to appease the too big cold, and their too bid warmth to be appeased by cold. The lack of measure in starting the highest edges, it is restraint by the inverse movement of some of them. By these, He has given us the very useful differences of the years, or the hours, and the measures of the distances and of the time, and to them who understand, He has given them the knowledge about God Who built, ordered, and adorned everything. So, he let the ones from above and from height to swirl in this diverse and twofold manner, for the sake of the world's beauty and for the sake of many benefits. And He placed others below, and in the middle, namely those which are heavier and passive by nature and which endure the transformations more easily, towards a good use. He organized all realities as an adornment and according to the connection of their rationalities, in order Him to name, rightly so, the whole, as adornment (cosmos).

44. Thus, at Genesis, it was built, in the first place, a thing form amongst buildings, and then another thing, and after all of them, the human being. The human being was found worthy of so much honor from God, so that the whole this seen world was made, before the human being and for the human being. And the Kingdom of Heavens was prepared immediately after the foundation of the world, also for the human being (Mt. 245: 34), and before the human being[759]. But there was also a counsel previously to the creation of the human being, and the human being was created by the hand of God, and in the image and likeness of God, and the human being didn't receive everything from this matter of this world submitted to senses, but only the body, as the other living creatures, but he received the soul out of the realities form above-world, better said from God Himself, through untold breath. And this, for the human being is something great and wonderful and she/he exceeds everything and she/he looks at everything and she/he rules everything; and, on the other hand, the human being can know God and can receive God and the human being proves to be, more than anything, the result of the above-everything glory of the Craftsman. And not only that the human being can receive God through her/his ascetic toil and by grace, but she/he can be also united with Him in a sole hypostasis[760].

[759] Not only this world is prepared like a palace, for the human being – the emperor that was to appear after that – but also the Kingdom of Heavens was prepared in advance for the human being, for the human being had to look towards the Kingdom of Heavens ever since the beginning of his existence.

45. In these ones and in those alike these ones, there is the true wisdom and the savior knowledge, which produce the happiness from above. But which Euclid, which Marin, which Ptolemais could see these? Which Empedocles, which Socrates, Aristotle, and Plato, could know these ones through the methods of the logics and of the other natural sciences? Better said, which sense perceived ones like these? Could de mind approach them? And if those who were philosophizing through nature, and them who were alike, the wisdom out of these seemed to them as humiliated, nonetheless it is proved today its overwhelming greatness. This is because, they almost stand like some speechless living-creatures facing the wisdom out of these (and if you want, as some slaves, reckoned as inferior to them who make the imperial diadem). So are these compared to the [760] It is specified here, concentratedly, everything that differs the human being from all the other sensitive creatures. On one hand, the human being looks, consciously, at everything, and she/he rules everything, for being an image of God. The human being is the conscience mastering and transforming the world. In the human being one unveils the purpose of the world. Without the human being, the world would have been purposeless, meaningless, light-less, and the world's existence would have been deprived of an essential side of its, or of the most essential one. Without the human being, there wouldn't have been created within world anything bearer of meaning. Without the human being the world wouldn't have known about itself. On the other hand, by proving that the world in on a purpose, the existence of the human being proves the fact that the world needs the full meaning which the human being can discover it and give it to the world. Only in connection with the total light, we can see a meaning within world, and we can search for and achieve a final meaning. But this can be done, also, only in connection with the conscience that has within itself the whole light, it will be able the human conscience to discover the full meaning of his own existence and of the existence of the world, desired by both the human being and the world. That's why, the human conscience is created in order to be able to united itself with the fully enlightened conscience of God. Only the human being is able to receive in his conscience the conscience of God that equals to the total light. Only that proves that the world is the masterpiece of an all-enlightened Craftsman, and great in His unlimited light and power. The glory of the human being, as image of the glory of the supreme conscience, it is shown especially in the fact that it becomes the conscience of the hypostasis of the supreme conscience, that through the human being's light, the Subject of the supreme will and of the consummate light of the consummate conscience, He can communicate His light and He can express His conscience and will.

true and above-all wisdom and compared to the teaching of the Ghost.

46. Not only knowing the true God, as much as possible, it overwhelmingly exceeds the Hellenes' philosophy, but even the knowing of what place the human being has before God, it surpasses all their wisdom. This is for, the human being alone - from among all the earthly and heavenly realities – was created in the image of the Builder, in order the human being to look towards Him and to love Him and to be the only knower of Him, and through the faith, through the tendency, and through the love for Him, the human being to preserve her/his beauty; and all the other borne by this earth and by this sky, the human being to see them as below herself/himself and totally non-partakers to the mind[761]. By not being able at all to see this, the wisemen of the Hellenes disregarded our nature, and they didn't serve God, but they worshipped the creature instead of Maker (Rom. 1: 25), enwrapping their mind with sensitive and insensitive spheres, and reckoning that each one of these spheres has power and importance on the measure of the size of their bodies. By honoring those in worthless manner, by calling those gods, smaller or bigger, they gave to creatures the mastery upon all realities. Out of those submitted to the senses, and out of the philosophy about those, they gathered to themselves abomination, dishonor, and the ultimate poverty within their souls, as also much intelligible and tormenting darkness[762].

47. The fact that we know that we are made in the image of our Maker, it doesn't' allow us to deify the intelligible world. This is for, not in the composition of the body it consists this image of, but it consists in the nature of our mind, and nothing is, according to the nature, better than the mind. This is because, if there had been anything better, it would have been [761] Not only the knowledge about God remained unknown to the Hellene philosophy, but also the recognition of the unique greatness of the human being. This is because, though any human being who does not philosophize, she/he realizes that she/he is above all the other creatures, by her/his conscience and will, the Hellene philosophy didn't admit that. As the mythology too, likewise the philosophy lowered the human being, from her/his level superior to creatures, and deemed the human being to worship the creatures. But only in communion with the Person Bearer of supreme conscience and freedom, the human being can be filled up too with light and freedom.

[762] Saint Gregory Palamas often uses the expression "intelligible and tormenting darkness" (ητον σκότος), as one that stays before the mind and torments the mind through nescience, as there stays the darkness in front of the senses and it torments them.

in that "in the image". But for what is best within us it is our mind, and our mind is in the godlike image and it was built up by God, what the difficulty is us to see, or better said, how it isn't obvious, through that, the fact that the Maker of our understanding side is also the Maker of everything that is understanding[763]? So, the entire understanding nature is together serving with us and in the image of the Builder[764], even if the angels are more honored than we are, as being outside the bodies, and closer to that nature that is totally incorporeal and uncreated. Better said, on some of them, who kept their level and who tend towards what they have been made, even though they are servants as we are, we honor them and they are much more honored than we are, through their level. And others, by not keeping their level and by rebelling and disregarding the target they have been created for, by getting as far as possible from them who are close to God, those ones have fallen off the honor. And because they attempt to attract us too, to falling, not only they are worthless and dishonored, but they even are enemies of God, and to our human kind they cause defilement, and they wage war to us as much as they can.

48. But they who are taught in the nature's science and the researchers of the stars, who boast themselves as knowing everything, because of not being able to know, through their philosophy, nothing about what we said above, they not only that elevated also the master of the intelligible darkness and all the rebelled powers from underneath that darkness, above themselves, but they even called those as gods (deities), and they honored them in temples, and they brought them sacrifices, and they obeyed the so-corruptible rules of those ones, and they let themselves to be mocked, for so long, by priests without holiness, by cleanings which defile and increase their wicked self-appreciation, and by prophets and prophetesses who slipped so far from truth.

49. I said that, for the man to know God and to know himself and his level (which are had now also by the Christians who are reckoned as simple people), it exceeds the power of the knowledge of the nature and of the astronomy and of all the philosophy related to them. We are adding now that even the knowing by the mind of its own helplessness and the striving to surpass that, it is something incomparable higher than knowing and researching the sizes of the stars, the rationalities of the things, the birth of the lower realities and the periods of the higher realities, the deviations and the periods, the constants and the swirls, the separations and the meetings and – in a word – all the various relations of the multitude of the motions. This is for, the mind that has known its own helplessness, it has found out where it can enter the salvation through, and to get close to the light of the knowledge and to receive the true wisdom, which doesn't disappear with the present age.

[763] The fact itself that our understanding mind is only in the image of God and it is not God Himself, it shows us that we must not identify God to a certain reality, or to some mental or understanding realities, or realities known with the mind. God is even above that level. God is above the order of the angels who are mental or understanding beings.

[764] So, the angels too, they are in the image of God, though differently from how the people are in the image of God because of not having a body which to master with, over the world and to spiritualize the matter.

50. Every rational and understanding nature, either called by somebody as angelic, or human being, she/he has life, due to which it remains, through existence, immortal and not receiving corruption. But the understanding and rational nature from within us, it doesn't have only the life through being, but it also has the doing. This is for it makes alive the body united with it, and due to that it is called as the body's life. But it is also called life for another too. But this is its work. This is because, what is for another, it won't even be the being in itself. But the understand nature of the angels it doesn't have the life like such a work too. This is because, it hasn't received form God a body united with it, in order it to receive, towards that, a life-maker power too. This nature too, it is able to do the opposite deeds, namely of evilness and of kindness. This is shown by the evil angels who suffered falling because of their pride. Therefore, the angels too are somewhat composed, having their being and one of the opposite features, namely virtue or evilness. From here is shown that the angels too, they don't have the kindness as being[765].

51. The soul of each of the speaking beasts it is the life of the body animated by that soul. They have the life not as being, but as work, by not being in itself, but for another. This is because, this life isn't seen as having nothing else, except the ones works by it into the body. That's' why, by detaching from [765] Not the being can be opposite to itself, because of ending, if that was the case, in inexistence, but the works of the being can be opposite. Even the angels have a work that can be opposite, for they can be good or evil. So, the angels do not have the kindness as being.

the body, it will necessarily be detached itself too. This is because, it is not less mortal than the body. This is because, everything that it is, it is and it is said towards death. That's why it dies together with the person who dies.

52. The soul of each one among people, that soul is also the life of the body animated through that soul, and that soul has a life-maker work for another, namely a work shown into the body animated by that soul. But that soul has the life not only as work, but also as being, and this is for the soul is alive through himself and for himself. This is for, the soul shows himself as having the rational and understanding life, as a life that is obviously different from the life of the body and of the ones which are within body. That's why, even though the body is gets detached, the soul won't scatter. And in addition to the fact that the souls won't scatter, the soul also remains immortal, for the soul isn't shown as being for another, but the soul has the life by himself as being[766].

53. The rational and understanding soul has the life as being, but it can also receive the opposite ones, namely the evilness and the kindness. From here it is shown the fact that the soul doesn't have the kindness as being[767], as it doesn't have the evilness too as being, but it has some feature able to chose a side or another, when allowed. These ones aren't present in a space, but the understanding soul, by receiving from the Builder the power of deciding freely, it can lean towards one or another and so to live according to what he has chosen. That's why the rational and understanding soul is somehow composed, due to the mentioned work. This one is for another, it doesn't cause by itself the composition, but out of its being and out of a certain work from among the mentioned features which can be opposite to one another, namely out of virtues or of evilness.

[766] The life of the body isn't the body's being, but it is a work irradiating out of the soul. That's why the body dies when the soul withdraws from within body. But the life of the animalic body doesn't come out of a soul of the animal, but it is an irradiation out of the life of that species, or out of the common life of the animals. That's why their soul doesn't last after their death. But the human soul belongs to the man's being. The human soul is individual or personal, and that gives a personal character to each of us. So, the human soul will exist in himself and for himself, even after our body dies.

[767] We have been trying all the way to preserve the style of the original text. But here, though we have translated philologically, we think that as being could rather be by nature or existentially. (E. l. t.'s n.)

54. The highest mind, the highest good, that above-life and supra-godlike nature, because of not being able, by any means, to receive the opposite ones, it will be obvious that it has the kindness not as feature, but it has the kindness as being. That's why the whole good which somebody would be able to think at, it is in that Mind; better said, that Mind is above-good. And the life is in that Mind, better said that Mind Itself is the life. In that Mind is the wisdom too, better said that Mind Itself is the wisdom. This is for the wisdom is a good, and the wisdom in itself is the kindness. Likewise, the eternity, the happiness and, simply, all the good one could cogitate at. And it is not there a difference between life, and wisdom, and kindness, and the ones alike. This is for all of those are comprised within that kindness, concentratedly and unitarily and as simply as possible gathered, all of them; and out of all goods it is understood and it is named. The whole good one could cogitate and say about it, it is one and simple[768]. But it is not only what is truly cogitated by them who understand with their mind made wise by God and who speak with their tongue moved by the Ghost. But it is even above those ones too, as untold and non-understood; and nothing lacks to its above-nature unity and simplicity, by being a unique all-good and supra-good unity. Only that much is understood and it is called – and that only out of His works descending to the creation – that the Maker and the Master of the creation it is the all-king and supra-kind goodness, having the kindness as being. That's why it cannot receive, by any means, what is opposite to kindness. This is for, it neither is opposite to any being.

55. This all-king and supra-kind goodness (above-goodness) is the spring of the kindness. And this is a good and the highest good, one that cannot lack to the consummate kindness. And for the consummate and above-consummation kindness is Mind, what else could have been what comes out of that Mind as from a spring, except Word, and a Word which is unlike out uttered word? This is because, our word doesn't belong to our mind, but it belongs to our body as moved by our mind. Neither that Word is like our inwards word. This is because our inwards word too, it becomes a sound, and it gets organized as through some images[769]. But it isn't either like the word form our cogitation, even if our word is soundless, being accomplished through incorporeal movements. This is because, this too is, according to us, and it needs pauses, namely not a few temporary pauses, by being unveiled widely, from a non-consummate beginning towards a consummate conclusion. This is for, it is like the word that has been planted in our nature and placed into our mind, ever since we have bene created by The One Who has built us up in His image, namely like to the knowledge which always exists together with our mind[770]. This is for, this knowledge is there too, in the highest Mind of the consummate and above-consummation kindness, to which nothing is non-consummate, except the fact that that knowledge comes from that Mind, that knowledge is, without [769] The uttered words have also the meaning as "images" of the inwards word, but also as fixed, steadfast "types", used by the inwards word which combines them according to the meaning it wants to express and which is each time differently nuanced. The word used here by Saint Gregory Palamas it has both those meanings.

[770] The Word Who is born out of the Father as Mind, it is not like the uttered word that it belongs to the body as moved by the mind, neither is like our inward word which tends towards expression, but it cannot do that except by using "images" which are, in the same time, "types" established by the human community, which each individual combines them each time differently, and which, as such, it crosses through a development when being expressed by a certain individual, and that needs interruptions, and it is not either like the word that is produced within mind and it is not allowed to be expressed, because this last word too, it is produced by us, and so it starts existing "after us". But the Word is like that "work" plated within our nature and, especially, within our mind, on the moment we were created, as a knowledge which the mind cannot be cogitated without; as a virtual knowledge continuously being actualized, of course that in connection with God and with the world, but without which the mind cannot be cogitated. In this quality, this word comprised in itself all the words, or the mind is endlessly speaking, for the mind is endlessly knowing, given the infiniteness of the reality and of the reality's possible combinations. The mind receives and produces, in the same time, the words. The mind, by being in connection with God and with the world, including its fellow humans, or by taking notice of those, the mind always expressed the knowledge that is always given. But our springing-of-words mind, it answers, in the same time, the appeals made to it, or it answers the words given to it in order to be known, in the first place to God Who is the ultimate and supremely challenging light out of Who the whole knowledge or all the answering words come from. The human word is dialogical, for we are dialogical beings, for we are created in order to understand the word of God gives us as reality, and in order to answer that word, so that we are created as partners of the dialogue with God, about and into God, with our fellow humans, about all the realities created by God, as unveilings of God's will which require us to become aware of them, as being His words which require us an answer, for we have been found worthy, by God, of the importance of an answered being waited for, from us, for our formation. The word in this sense, it is the ultimate basis of the uttered and thought words. There cannot be a mind or understanding subject, without word. In this meaning, the human subject, as understanding subject is, right through this a speaking subject.

diminution, everything that that Mind is too. That's why the higher Word is and He is called by us also as Son, in order us to recognize Him as consummate, in consummate and own hypostasis, as One Who is out of the Father and Who doesn't lack anything from the being of the Father, but He is, without diminution, One with That One, though not according to hypostasis. This shows the Word as being out of That One through a birth on a godlike way.

56. For the kindness that comes, through birth, out of the understanding kindness, as out of a spring that is the Word, and Word without Ghost cannot be imagine by anybody who has mind, that's why God-the Word Who is out of God, and He has proceeding out of the Father the Holy Ghost too. And this Ghost isn't like our ghost accompanying our word uttered with out lips, neither this Ghost is like that ghost that accompanies, even incorporeally, our inner word or our thought word. This is because, that one too, it still is a certain impulse of the mind, stretching over time and needing the same interruptions, and starting from what is non-consummate, towards consummation. That Ghost of the highest Word, it is like an untold love of the Birth-Giver towards the Word born in an untold manner. This One is used towards the Borth-Giver and the Word and the all-beloved Son, but like One Who has Him as together-come-out of the Father and resting within Him, through the unity of the being. From this Word Who also spoke to us through His body too, we learnt also the name of that Hypostasis different from the Father, namely of the Ghost, as also the fact that the Ghost doesn't belong only to the Father, but it belongs to the Word too. For he says: "The Ghost of the truth Who proceeds from the Father" (Jn. 15: 25). This is for, us to learn that not only the Word but the Ghost too is from the Father, not born, but proceeded, but also the Ghost belong to the Son too, for the Son has the Ghost from the Father, as Ghost of the truth, of the Wisdom, and of the Word. This is for, the Truth and the Wisdom are the appropriate Word of the Birth-Giver, a Word that rejoiced Himself together with the Father, according to what he said through Solomon: "I was that one who rejoiced together with Him". He doesn't say: I have rejoiced myself, but he says: we rejoiced together. This joy from before ages, of the Father and of the Son it is the Holy Ghost, as One Who is common to both of Them regarding the uses (that's why both of them send the Ghost to the worthy ones), but the Ghost belongs only to the Father regarding the existence; and due to that the Ghost proceeds, as existence, only form the Father[771].

57. The image of this supreme love towards the knowledge that exists at it and in it, our mind created in the image of God it has it too. This is for, this love has been, since the beginning, form the mind and into the mind and together-going-out from the mind with the inwards word. The most limpid sign of this love, even to the who cannot see the inner realities of their own, it is the insatiable desire of the people for knowing[772]. But in that archetype, in that consummate and above-consummation kindness, there nothing is consummate, because, beside the fact that is like the knowledge from within itself, the godlike love is without diminution, everything which that kindness is. That's why, this love is and it is called by us as Holy and Comforting Ghost, as one that accompanies the [771] In this chapter it is comprised the famous teaching of Saint Gregory Palamas about the relation of the Holy Ghost with the Son. Saint Gregory undertook a step-forwards in explaining that relation. The Holy Ghost is tied to the Word or to the Son born out of the Father, for, by and large, the word isn't without love. The one who speaks, that one speaks in order to express her/his love for her/him whom her/he speaks to. The love means joy. The Father expresses His joy in the presence of the Son, by proceeding the Ghost towards the Son. The Father rejoices of the Son together with the Ghost, for, a, rejoicing of someone it will be full when that joy is shared by another too. But also, the Son rejoices of the Father together with the Ghost, and the Son's joy isn't a joy stranger to the joy of the Father. That's why neither the Person through Who and with Whom the Son rejoices of the Father, it isn't a Person differing from that Person Who and through Whom the Father rejoices of the Son. Still, in this rejoicing of One of Another, the initiative belongs to the Father. Then the Ghost as Person cannot proceed from Both the Father and the Son, because, if that had been the case, there would have been a distinct rejoicing of the Father of the Son, and of the Son of the Father. The Father rejoices of the Son in His quality as Father, and the Son rejoices of His Father in His quality as Son. In the Holy Ghost as joy, the Son never manifests Himself as Father, but only as Son. Therefore, the Ghost doesn't proceed from the Son. Saint Gregory Palamas remains to the strict personalistic conception about God, and in this teaching about the place with the Ghost proceeds from, also in this teaching about the place the Holy Ghost has between the Father and the Son, about the special relation the Ghost has with Each of Them.

[772] Out mind is, as well, in the image of the Father. This is for, together with its inward word that comes out of our mind, it comes also the mind's love for that word. Just in the desire of the mind for knowing, it is shown also the mind's knowledge or the mind's word, but also the mind's love for more knowledge. The desire for knowing has an infinite dimension, and so also the knowledge or the love for knowledge too, and that shows that to these ones it corresponds a reality infinite in its content (as Word) and in its eternity (as Ghost), infinite and always new, as only within persons it can be found, and not in the monotonous nature which can easily be reduced to some laws.

Word[773]. By this we know that He is consummate in own consummate hypostasis, and he doesn't lack nothing of the being of the Father, but He is, without any diminution, One with the Son and with the Father, though not according to hypostasis, for the hypostasis shows us the Ghost as proceeding from the Father in a godlike manner. Let's take heed, therefore, that there is only One God true and consummate in three true and consummate hypostases, and there isn't a threefold God – let that not be – but a simple God. This is for, the kindness isn't threefold, neither there is a trinity of goods, but the highest kindness if a Holy trinity, all-honored and all-worshipped, overflowing out of Himself towards Himself and without flowing out of Himself, being based on Himself from before ages in a godlike manner[774]; and by being borderless and by limiting alone on Himself and bordering all realities and extending Himself over all realities, and not letting any existence outside Himself.

58. The understanding and rational nature of the angels has a mind as well, a word out of mind, and the love of the mind for that word. This love, by being out of mind as well, and by always being with the word and with the mind, it could be called also a ghost, as one that accompanied, by nature, the word. But this ghost is not of-life-maker. This is because the angel hasn't received his body from God as created out of earth united with Himself, so that to receive for the body also a life-maker and upholding power[775]. But the understanding and rational nature of the soul, being built together with the earthly body, it has received from God the life-maker ghost which it keeps together through, and which it makes alive through, the body that is united with the soul[776]. Through this he is shown to them who understand that the man's ghost that makes the body alive, it is an understanding love, and that the ghost is [773] The true word is always accompanied by comforting, for it comforts the one whom it is addressed to, through the love tied to the word. Out of the mind starts both the word and the love tied to the word.

[774] The godlike love flows out of itself towards itself and it has its foundation into itself.

[775] Here Saint Gregory signals a difference between the human ghost and the angelic ghost. The angelic ghost is not of-life-giver and upholder of the angel, because of not having to give and to uphold a life into body. From here comes that there is a special connection between the ghost of the man and his bodily life.

[776] We are noticing the great importance granted here to the matter. The matter is destined to be made alive through the ghost.

form the mind and it is of the word and the ghost is into word[777] and into mind; and that the man has his word and his mind into ghost. This is for, the soul has, in a natural manner, through the ghost, such a great loving connection with his body, so that the ghost would never want to forsake his body, if there didn't come, forcedly, some sort of grave illness, or some hit from outside[778].

59. The understanding and speaking nature of the soul, because is the only one having mind, word, and of-life-maker ghost, only the soul's nature has been built, more than that of the bodiless angels, in the image of God, by God. And the soul will be maintained untransformed, eve if the soul doesn't know his worthiness and even if the soul doesn't cogitate and doesn't behave according to the image of the Builder. This one it has been preserved, even after the Adam's falling off Paradise through that tree, when we suffered before the bodily death, the death of the soul that is the soul's separation from God. Then we rejected the godlike likeness, but we didn't lose the image. So, the soul, by detaching himself from the tendency towards evilness, and by attaching himself, through love, to the Good One and by obeying Him through virtuous deeds and behaviors, the soul will be enlightened and beautified by Him, so that the soul becomes kind and obeying His advices and urges, and so the soul will receive from Him, again, the truly eternal life. By this, the body that is united with Him it will be made immortal too, and it will be imparted, at the appointed time, with the promised resurrection and with the eternal glory. But, if the soul doesn't reject the tendency towards evilness and the obedience to evilness, that brings the image of God to abomination that causes dishonor, the soul will estrange from God, and the soul will get far from God and from the true happiness and life. After the soul previously forsook God, the soul rightly is forsaken by The Good One too.

[777] The ghost is into word. It is not a word without a of-life-maker ghost.

[778] The ghost of the man is into mind and into word, or the mind and the word of the man are ghost. The ghost is the connection between mind and word. The ghost is itself the connection of love between mind and word. But the love represented by the ghost, it doesn't unite only the mind and the word, but it is extended upon the body too, and it united also the body with the mind and with the word. The body becomes alive and it is upheld into life through the ghost of the mind, or through the mind's love for the body. This love, one that united the Father with the Son, a love than can be also called as Their Ghost, it composes and it give life to the body of the Word, at the fulfilling of the time.

60. The trinitarian nature from after the supreme Trinity, by being made by the Trinity in His image, namely more mental (understanding) than others, and speaking and spiritual (and so it is the human soul), it must guard its level, namely to be only for God, to attach itself only to God and to obey only to God and to listen only to God; and to look only at Him and to get adorned with the memory and the uninterrupted contemplation and with the warmest and fieriest love for God. But this it attracts to itself, or, better said, it was attracting yore, the mysterious and untold shininess of that nature. If it does so, it will truly have the image and the likeness of God, by becoming full of grace, wise, and godlike, through that shininess. This is for, it learns through that, either if present in shown manner, or it is near in a hidden manner, as is rather now, to love God more than it loves itself, and to love its neighbor as it loves itself; and, consequently, it learns to know and to guard its worthiness and its level and to truly love on itself. This is for "he who loves the injustice, that will hate his soul" (Ps. 10: 5[779]). That one, by tearing apart and by breaking the image of God, he burdens himself with a passion resembling to those who pitifully tear apart their own bodies, and with an insanity that makes them insensitive. This is because, he destroys, without feeling it, and he pitifully tears apart his natural beauty, by insanely tearing apart the trinitarian and above-world adornment of his soul, adornment made whole through the inwards love. This is for what is more unjust, what is more destroying than not remembering somebody and not looking, uninterruptedly, at Him Who built him and Who adorned him in His image, at Him Who, by that, He gave him, as a gift, the power of the knowledge and of the love, and He abundantly overpoured the untold gifts and the eternal life, to them who use the knowledge and the love rightly[780].

61. One of the biggest evils suffered by our soul, or, better said, the biggest evil amongst all evils, it is the union with the

[779] In KJB we have: Ps. 11: 5: "The Lord trieth the righteous: but the wicked and him that loveth violence his soul hateth."; in ROB we have: Ps. 10: 5: "The Lord tries the righteous and the unbeliever; and on him who loves the injustice, His soul hates him." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[780] The trinity of the soul, as image of the supreme Trinity, it is maintained and it is deepened into likeness, by remaining in a connection of love with its trinitarian archetype, through the love that is within it (through the ghost). He who doesn't do this, he will tear apart his trinitarian soul, by detaching the love from the word and the word from understanding (mind) and, by and large, by weakening and crooking the love from within his soul.

intelligible and causing-all-evils snake which has become a heralder (an angel) of the evilness and, through his evil urge that it gave to the people. He is all the more low and worse than everything, for he lusted, because of his pride, to resemble himself in power to the Builder. He was forsaken by the Builder, and rightly so, as much as he forsaken That One. And he forsook Him insomuch, so that he reached to be opposant and enemy of That One. If, therefore, That One is living kindness and of-life-maker of the living ones kindness, without any doubt that this one is the death evilness[781] and of-death-maker evilness. That One, by having the kindness as being and for He is, by nature, non-receiver of what is contrary to kindness, namely of evilness, and therefore nothing that shares some evilness can come closer to Him, how much more won't he reject him who is the chieftain and the cause of the evilness inn himself and in others? But the evil one, he doesn't have the evilness but the life as being. That's why he remains immortal by that. But by having this one able to receive the evilness too, and by being honored with having a free will, he was able to obey and to attach by himself to the eternal spring of the kindness and to be partaker to the true life. But because he willingly rolled himself down to evilness, he has deprived himself of the true life[782], not through being (because there is not a being of the death), but by rejecting the true life. But because of getting fed with the impulse towards evilness, and by increasing his evilness with great wickedness, he makes himself as of-death-maker ghost, striving to attracts the human being to his sharing with death.

62. Sneaking in behaviors and strong in cunningness, the mediator and the cause of the death, he dressed himself up into the cunning snake (because of not being able otherwise, at all, except through hallucination, because of fearing to be discovered). Because of not daring to start a direct dialogue, he [781] The devil is called as the "death evilness" because of not being capable of moving himself towards anything good, so that he is petrified in his helplessness and unhappiness. He is incapable of anything new, and he poisons himself in monotony. He cannot see, at all, any new horizon.

[782] Though he has the live as being, so that he cannot lose his life, though, because of having in his life the possibility of the evilness, or of weakening his life, by putting the evilness into work, he has lost the true or full life. But he kept the life as such. By having the possibility of two sorts of life, of that life that is good or true, and of that life that is evil or weakened, and crooked and "dead", he has remained immortal in the second sort of life.

chose a cunning way, namely that way that he was able to hide himself better. And this was for, by showing himself as a friend, to unnoticeably sneak in the most shameful urges also through the foreign conversation (neither was the snake speaking, nor it showed before that it speaks), to get out of her mind, her who listen to the snake and to attract her to himself and to make her an easy-to-handle slave, for his plots. By disarming her thus, he made her obey the evil ones and to serve those over which she rightly received before the imperial power, for she alone was honored by the hand and boy the word of God amongst all the creatures living in the world submitted to the senses and for she was made in the image of the Builder[783]. And God allows this, in order the man to see the advice he was urged to, by the evil one (for all the more is the snake evil than the man is!), and the man to limpidly understand that that advice isn't useful and the man to resist against obeying himself to what is obviously evil, and the man to keep his faith towards Builder, fulfilling the Builder's commandment. And so, the man to easily become defeater of that one that fell from the true life, and the man to rightly receive the happy immortality and the man to remain living according to God, forever.

63. Nothing is more superior within man that to think and to reckon, and by that him to know and to do what is useful; him to keep his level, to know on himself and to know the Only One Who is superior to him. Also, him to observe everything he has learnt from That One, and regarding the things he hasn't learnt from That One, him to want to take only That One as adviser. This is because the angels too, though they are above us, according to their worthiness, they serve the wills of That One for us, they being sent for them who will have inherited the salvation (Hebr. 1: 14); better said, not all of them, [783] He is speaking here about Eva, but also about the man as the sole creature made by God and placed as emperor over the world. The man was honored by the hand and by the word of God, for the man was made by the hand of God and after the godlike Persons spoke about the man, for the hand of God to be reflected in the man's body, and the speaking of the godlike Persons to be reflected into the speaking of the man with his fellow humans and with God. The hand is the expression of the rational and rational-transforming work. This work is reflected into the being of the man. Created as a person mastering upon things, the man is tempted by satan to become below things, obeying the things, and, through things obeying to satan. The deed of satan consisted of lowering us as persons on the level of objects obeying objects, and taken towards the lack of freedom, as the objects are; towards the lack of freedom and towards the corruptibility of the body, as the objects are corruptible, but also towards a living evilness like that of satan.

but only the best angels who kept their level. This is for, the angels too, they have mind, and word, and ghost, from God, all those three being together-grown. That's why, they owe to listen both to the creator Mind and to the Word and the Ghost, as we do. This is because, though the angels surpass us in many concerns, but related to others they are behind us, as we said and as we are going to say, for we are in the image of the Builder. In these regards, we were created more than the angels were, in the image of God.

64. The angels were ordered to strongly serve the Builder, and they received the purpose of being mastered. But they weren't appointed to master upon them who are below to angels, except they are sent by Him Who upholds everything. But satan lusted to master, with pride, against the decision of the Builder. That's why, by leaving his level accompanied by the angels who rebelled together with him, he was rightly forsaken by the spring of the true life and light, and he sunk into death and into the eternal darkness. And for the man was appointed not only to be mastered, but also in order to master over all the realities from on earth, the beginner of the evil, because of envying the man, he uses the whole his plotting to topple the man over form mastery. But because of not having the power to force the man, because satan is impeded to do that by the Master of all, Who built our speaking, free, and of-self-mastering nature, satan invites the people with cunningness, to listen to his advise and so to remove the man from mastery[784]. Thus, satan deceives – better said, he persuades – the people not to take in account and not to value, or even to disregard [784] The devil desiring tyranny, through his evilness, but because of being incapable of mastery dur to his evilness, he wants to topple the man over form the man's level as master over the things, and over the world, namely form the man's level as subject. But God, as The One Who created the man free and only-master upon himself, He doesn't want that. God wants the man to be free, sole-master upon himself, and master upon things, but not a tyrant upon persons. This is for God wants that all persons to be free and sole-masters upon themselves. And being this freedom sown within us by the will of God, we can maintain it only in personal communion with our fellow humans and with God as supreme spring of the love in free communion. The man defends, at his turn, this freedom of his. One cannot take this freedom from us except by deceiving us to commit deed which seemingly affirm our freedom, but those deeds actually take our freedom away from us. The evil uses an equivocal, a mask. The evil doesn't have the power to deceive us in an unveiled manner. This cunningness is used by the evil, when he deceitfully whispers to us that, by disobeying the commandments of God to not make ourselves slaves to the non-spiritual sweetness of the nature, we will become freer than we are, free like God Himself is.

and to resist and to do what is contrary to the commandment and to the advice of the All-Kind One. Thus, by sharing ourselves the rebellion of satan, we will also share the darkness and the eternal death.

65. The fact that the speaking soul is sometimes killed too, despite having the existence as life[785], we have been taught so by the great Paul, who write: "The widow that spends her time in delectations, though she is alive, she is dead" (1 Tim. 5: 6). For Paul said that about the present theme too, namely about the speaking soul, it is not wrong us to affirm that. This is because, that soul that is deprived of the spiritual Bridegroom, if that soul doesn't get sad and doesn't cry and doesn't choose that narrow and difficult life of the repentance, though that soul is alive (for, according to the being, the soul is immortal), that souls will have died. This is because that soul is able both to die the bad death and to live the good life. Despite the Apostle said his teaching about that widow missing the bodily bridegroom, that she parties and that she lives according to her body, he surely understood that her died according to her soul. But, in the same place, the same one says: "This is because, by being us dead through sins, God has made us alive together with Christ" (Eph. 2: 5). What else says he who tells us: "It is sin towards death" (1 Jn. 5: 16). But, also our Lord, by commanding somebody to "let the dead to bury their dead" (Mt. 9: 22), He showed us the undertakers who live according to their body, while they are dead according to their soul.

66. The proto-parents of the mankind, by willingly getting out from the remembrance of God and from seeing God, and by disregarding God's commandment, and on the other hand, by uniting themselves in their thinking, with the dead ghost of satan, and by eating form the forbidden tree, and so they doing the opposite to the will of the Builder, they were disrobed of their luminous and of-life-maker vestments of the shininess from above, and they became, woe to them, like satan, dead with their ghost. And because satan not only he is dead, but he is also ghost that kills them who get close to him[786], and they who shared his dead they had a body too, which the death-maker advice was committed through, with the deed, these ones pass, woe to them, within their bodies too, those dead ghosts and or-death-maker ghosts of the killing[787]. Consequently, the human body would have been detached immediately, and it would have turned back into the earth which the body was takes from, if they hadn't been retained, through a greater care and power, by Him Who can do everything with His word only, by that power that nothing is committed without, amongst all the committed ones. But that decision still is being fulfilled, rightly, and continuously. This is for "right is the Lord, as the godlike psalmist says, and he loves the righteousness" (Ps. 10: 7[788]).

[785] The existence of the soul isn't a simple existence, but it is life. Or, the man's life is one with the man's existence of with the man's being. Still, the soul's life can be killed too, and so to become a dead life. But the soul won't cease to exist, or even to live, with a weakened and deluded conscience, once the life is the soul's existence or the soul's being.

67. God didn't make the death (Prov. 1: 8), and He even impeded death to appear, insomuch it was necessary and insomuch as it was right to impede death to them who were created by Him, as they were endowed with a free will, by Him. This is for, He gave them in advance, an advice causing immortality, and a commandment which He ensured with, in advance, His of-life-giver advice. Tis is for, He announced in advance, plainly and menacingly, by declaring that disregarding that commandment that was life-giving, it meant death. This, in order they to be guarded against experiencing the death, either by love, or by knowledge, either by fear. This is for God loves, He knows, and He can accomplish everything that is useful to each one amongst creatures. If He only had known but He hadn't loved, He might have not fulfilled but He would have left non-as consummate what He had know as good. And if He had not known while loving, of if He hadn't been able to accomplish, it might have been even without Him willing it, that what He had love and what He has known, that would have remained unaccomplished. But because He loves and He knows and He can accomplish what is useful to us, what comes from Him even without our will, it will be beneficial to us. Regarding that what we willingly hurry ourselves up towards, for we have been imparted with a free will, let's pay much attention to that lest it be useless to us. And especially so, when by the care of God, a certain thing is forbitten to us, as it was, for instance, in Paradise, or in the Gospel of our Lord by Himself, or amongst the descendants of Israel by prophets, it is proven that that thing is towards everything that can be more useless and more corruptive. And if somebody invites us to that evilness and urges us to hurry up towards that, by persuading us with words, or by attracting us through a loving countenance, it will be clear to us that one who does that, he is opposite and enemy to our life.

[786] Out of him who is dead with his soul, it irradiated the death, out of him who is weakened, disgusted, envious, desperate, all of these irradiate too. All the more out of satan, whom all of these are within, in a culminant thought.

[787] Out of the discouraged, envious, disgusted, full of hatred, there passes into the body as well, a state of sadness, of burden, of weakness, of unhealable drowsiness, all of these bringing and maintaining death.

[788] In KJB we have: Ps. 11: 7: "For the righteous Lord loveth righteousness; his countenance doth behold the upright."; in ROB we have: Ps. 10: 7: "For right is the Lord and He loved the righteousness and His face looks at the righteous one." (E. l. t.'s n.)

68. We should have not let ourselves deceived back then - either through the longing to life Planted within us by Him (for why He had made us alive, if He would have not loved that in a special manner?), or by knowing that That One knows better what is beneficial to us (for how wouldn't the Lord of the knowledge have known that, incomparably more, for He shared us the knowledge?), or by fearing His almighty mastery -, neither bewitched, nor persuaded, so that we wouldn't have disregarded His commandment and advice, as we shouldn't disregard nowadays too, His savior commandments and advices He has given us after that first commandment. This is because, as today, they who do not decide to valiantly resist the sin, and so they disregard the godlike commandment, they go towards what is opposite, namely towards the inward and eternal death, if they do not gain back their soul through repentance, they will do alike to our proto-parents, who didn't resist them who were urging them to disobey, and so they disregarded the commandment and, consequently, they actualize that decision that was announced, in advance, by Him Who judges everything righteously. And according to that decision, they who ate from that tree, they died immediately. Thus, they knew as a real fact, what the commandment they forgot consisted of, of the truth, of the love, of the wisdom, and of the power, and, because they were ashamed, they hid themselves, because they were disrobed of that glory that makes alive, in a higher mode, even the immortal ghosts, a glory without the life of the ghost is and it is reckoned without, as much worse than several deaths[789].

69. The fact that was not the time to be benefit out of eating out of that tree, it is shown by him who says: "This is because, that tree was only a vision, as I reckon. And only they who are consummate in habituation, only they can get close to such vision, without endangering themselves. It is not goo to them who still are simple and greedy in their lust, to get close to that vision; as the full food isn't beneficial to them who still are tender and who need milk". Even if somebody doesn't want to move that tree and the food from that tree on a higher meaning, it won't be too difficult, as I reckon, us to see that it still wasn't useful, that food, to our proto-parents, because they weren't consummate. This is because, it seems to me that they looked at that tree with their senses, and they ate out of that tree, for it was the sweetest three amongst the trees from Paradise. And that food that is the sweetest to our senses, it isn't really good, neither is always good, nor is good to everyone. But it is good only to them who can used that food without letting themselves overwhelmed; and they to eat that food only when they should and on a needed measure and towards the glory of the ones who made that food. And that food won't be good to them who cannot used it thus. That's why I reckon too, that that tree was called as the tree of knowing the good and the evil, for it is characteristic to them who are consummate, and to the virtue, to look at the things which are pleasant to the senses, while still not removing their mind from contemplating God and from the praises and from the prayers towards That One, but they make out of those things a matter and a starting point of their stretching towards God, while they master their pleasure according to the senses all the way up to the end, by moving their mind towards the higher realities[790]. These ones, even if they have that unusual, great, and surprising – because they are not used to it – pleasure, they do not empty their soul's thought towards that evilness, unlike they who reckon them who reckon that pleasure as good and they totally allow themselves to be conquered by it.

[789] The full life is one with the glory, for it has power of irradiation.

[790] Those which are tempting to them who are not strengthened into virtue, those are tempting for these ones aren't accustomed to the virtue. They who are strengthened into virtue, they see the pleasant realities too, as images of the glory of God.

70. It would have been useful to our proto-parents, therefore, who ought to live in that holy place, to not ever forget about God at all, and to occupy themselves at length and to get themselves accustomed more with the simple and truly good things and to get consummate in their habituation to the souly sight. By still being non-consummate and by still being in the middle and by being easily tempted by their power - given to them in order they to use it - here towards good and there towards evil, they shouldn't have passes to trying the things which can be attractive by nature and which can lay mastery over senses and which can gain the whole mind and which can lead to evil deeds and to present them as worthy of trust the chieftain and the cause of such passions having their beginning, according to him, in the passionate feeding with sweet foods. This is because, if by only seeing that tree, according to the story, it made the snake as worthy to be accepted and believed as adviser, how much more will do that the eating until satiation? Is it clear, now, that it wasn't useful to our proto-parents to eat out of that tree through their senses? Ought they not, therefore, to be removed from the Paradise of God, as ones who ate out of that tree before the right time, so that they not to make that place a place for advice towards evil and towards accomplishing the evil? Shouldn't have had they to immediately receive the death because of transgressing the commandment? But our Master had great patience.

71. The decision regarding the death of the soul, that came to fulfillment by transgressing the commandment, according to the justice of the Builder (because, us by forsaking Him, without Him making us to do that, He too left us, as ones who had free will), it was heralded in advance, by God, with love for people, for the reasons I mentioned. To it He added and placed in addition, that decision regarding the death of the body. But by uttering this one, for the deep of His wisdom and for the abundance of His love for people, He delayed reinforcing it, for the future. He didn't say to Adam: "you turn back where you were taken from", but: "dust you are, into dust you will turn back". They who listen with understanding, they can see into these words too, that God didn't make the death of the soul, neither made He the death of the body. For God didn't' say before, by commanding: "you will die on that day that you eat", neither He said: "go back to dust!", but God said: "you will go back", foretelling and allowing what was to happen and not impeding that, because of the righteousness.

72. So, our proto-parents were to reach to death, as death waits for us too, us who are still living. Our body has become mortal. This is like a prolonged death, or, better said, like a chain of countless successive deaths, one after another, until all of us will reach that one and ultimate and lasting death. This is because we are born towards corruption; and, by appearing into life, we are getting disintegrated until we will cease to exist[791]. We won't ever be truly the same, even if we seem so to them who do not notice our constant changing. Like de fire, by grabbing the thing reed by an end, and constantly being different, as measure of its existence the fire has the length of the reed, likewise are we who change, we have as measure the portion of life we are given with.

73. And in order us not to be totally nescient regarding His overwhelming love for people, and regarding His deep of wisdom, namely regarding the reason why God added the end by death, God given the man, as a gift, to keep living for a while. So, He showed us that He educated us mercifully, better said He planned out education through justice, in order us not to totally despair. By that, he has given us time for repentance, and for making ourselves well-pleasant to Him, by living a life which He allows us existing for[792]. He then comforted the sadness of the death with the ceaseless births. He multiplied the generation through descendants, so that the multitude of the born ones to largely exceed the multitude of the dead. Instead of Adam who ended to be burdened and miserable through the beauty of a sensitive tree, God showed many happily enriched out of the things submitted to the senses with the knowledge about God, by virtue and by godlike benevolence. Witnesses are: Seth, Enos, Enoch, Noah, Melchisedec, and [791] "Εν τω φθείρεσθα γινόμεθα". The German philosopher Heidegger said that we exist towards death – "Sein zum Tode", and that's the same thing. Only that Heidegger doesn't go all the way up to the last explanation for that. Our existence is towards death, because it occurs in a state of corruption that advances to death. We are continuously dying with our body, once we are born, until the full and durable death of our body. And this happened because we no longer exist in communion with the existence existent by itself, namely imperishable. But we are not only "existence towards death", but also existence towards a spiritual growth.

[792] Even in the death that comes after a long process, God placed an educative power, and in this educative signification it is shown to the man a motif for hoping for the care of God for us.

Abraham, and all the people from between those, and from before them, and from after them, or nigh to them. But, because regardless how big or how many were those, none of them survived consummately without sin, in order to be able to overcome that defeat of our proto-parents, and t heal the wound of the root of the mankind, and to be towards holiness to all the people from later on, towards blessing and towards regaining the life, and He saw that in advance, He chose during time those nations and tribes which Him to erect the all-praised stem from (Num. 17: 23), which that flower to spring out, that flower which the savior oikonomia was to be fulfilled by, for the whole mankind[793].

74. Oh, the deep of the richness (Rom. 11: 33) and of the love for people, of God! If that death (of Christ) hadn't existed, and fi before that death there hadn't been mortal our mankind who came out of such a root, we actually haven't been enriched with the first fruit of the immortality; and we wouldn't have been called to heavens; and our nature wouldn't have been enthroned on the right hand of the heaven's glory, above all mastery and power (Hebr. 8: 1). So knew God to change, with His love for people, our transgression caused by our willing deviation, and to transform them towards good, by His wisdom and power[794].

75. Maybe many people blame Adam because, by letting himself easily persuaded by the evil adviser, Adam transgressed the godlike commandment and, by that transgression, Adam caused us the death. But it is not the same thing, somebody wanting to taste before actually trying it, a deadly weed, and somebody wanting to eat that weed even after knowing it as [793] Itself the history with its multitude of people and of nations, it shows that the man isn't a passing and despised by God creation. Out of the history's whole contribution, it was prepared and it was born the Son of God as man (Rut, as representative of other nations) and with the whole history's contribution it is actualized what Christ gave and is giving as embodied God to the mankind. Through all the people, each man is enriched, especially into Christ.

[794] Saint Gregory Palamas proved himself to be the follower of the opinion that, if we hadn't fallen, the Son of God wouldn't have embodied Himself and our nature wouldn't have ever been elevated, through Him, on the heavenly throne so that we to be made partakers to His glory. Nicodemus the Hagiorite, during the XVIII Century, he expressed his opinion that our nature still would have been elevated if we hadn't fallen, to a glory like that achieved by Christ. But it seems that this isn't the last word belonging to Saint Gregory Palamas on this matter; or, we must not understand this word in a too simplistic manner, given the coat of glory which Palamas sees the human nature dressed up in the beginning.

deadly. It is more reproachable him who takes poison knowingly, than him who does that unknowingly. That's why, each of us is more reproachable and more condemnable than Adam. But one could say that that tree isn't in front of us, neither is given to us the commandment of God forbidding us to taste out of that tree. It may be that that tree isn't in front of us, but the commandment of God is still being in front of us now, and they who obey that commandment and who want to live according to it, they are untied of the guilt of all their sins and of the curse and of the ancestral condemnation; but they who disregard the commandment and who choose instead of the commandment, the bait and the advice of the evil one, they cannot but fall off that life and from living into Paradise, and they will reach the Gehenna of the eternal fire, which we have been menaced with.

76. So, which is the commandment of God that stays in front of us? It is the repentance, which requires us, in the first place, not to touch the forbidden ones any longer. This is because, we have been cast off the place of the godlike delectation and cast out, rightly so, from the Paradise of God, and because we have fallen into this precipice and we have been condemned to dwell and to live together with the speechless beasts, and we have lost the hope for turning back into Paradise by our power, so Himself Who brought upon us the condemnation, back then, or, better said, He allowed it, rightly, to come upon us, He has descended now to us, due to the overwhelming abundance of His love for people and of His kindness, and due to the lenience of His mercy; and by deigning to make Himself man as we are, but in sinless mode, in order to teach and to save the same one through the same one[795], He [795] The Son of God communicates us His savior power through our human nature assumed by Him. He has impropriated to Himself, as man, His godlike power, and then He conveyed that power to His brothers into humanity, by entering, as man, the communion with us, and bringing into this communion the whole godlike plenitude. No one can be healed of an illness by using a medicine that is not made endurable to him, namely by using a medicine that his organism cannot assimilate and use. Into Christ the humanity endures the savior godlike power (and also the cross), for the Son of God fits on Himself to this human nature, by becoming its Subject. And thus, Christ saves the human nature not forcedly, but for the human nature itself becomes a constitutive part of His Subject, a Subject that works upon the human nature with the godlike power made endurable to the man through the human form which the man is offered that power into. And through the Son of God become man, we are not submitted, forcedly, to a superior Subject, or better said to a Supreme Subject, but the godlike Subject makes Himself partner to us, into a relation of maximum communication.

brought us the savior advice and commandment of the repentance, by saying: "Repent, for the Kingdom of Heavens is nigh" (Mk. 1: 15). This is because, before the embodiment of the Word of God, the Kingdom of Heavens was as far from us as the sky is from earth. But, by coming to us the Emperor of the Heavens, and by deigning to receive the union with us, the Kingdom of Heavens has come nigh to all of us[796].

77. Once the Kingdom of Heavens has come close to us, by the descent of God-the Word to us, let's no longer get ourselves far from it, by living without repentance. Let's rather run away from the unhappiness of them who sit into darkness and into the shadow of the death (Isa. 9: 2); let's gather the deeds of the repentance, humble cogitation, humiliation and spiritual crying, gentle and full of mercy heart, a loving of righteousness heart, a loving of cleanness heart, a peaceful heart, a peace-maker heart, a hearts that is patient in toils, a heart that is joyful in persecutions, in losses, in reproaches, in gossips, and in sufferings for truth and righteousness. This is for, the Kingdom of Heavens, better said the Emperor of the Heavens, oh, untold and great generosity, He is inside us (Lk. 17: 21). We owe to always attach ourselves, as much as possible, to Him, through the deed of our repentance, for He loved us so much.

78. The love for God is upheld by our lack of passions and by our richness in virtues. This is for, our hatred on the evil ones, from which it comes the lack of passions, it brings, in exchange, the longing for and the richness of virtues. And he who loves and gains the virtues (the goods), how could he not love especially the Master Who is good through Himself, and Who is the Only One giving and guarding the whole good, that He is into, in a special manner[797]. This is for, Christ Himself

[796] Here we have a meaning of the imperial dignity of Christ, one not developed in Dogmatics. Christ becomes, also as man, the Emperor of the Heavens, and so He makes us too as emperors. The Kingdom of Heavens is into Christ Himself. This is for, all the goods we are going to have in an unfolded manner, those goods are within Him in a folded manner. The happiness of the Kingdom of Heavens cannot but have its spring only into God as Person Who has come in communion with us. In loving relation with God as full of endless love Person, it is the whole our happiness and the whole power of our loving relation with the others. By making Himself man, He has made Himself accessible to us with His endless love, in an unmediated relation.

[797] The spiritual goods are one with the virtues, namely to the habits of doing the diverse kinds of good. That's why, when one speaks about goods, one can understand the virtues, and vice versa. This is for, the spiritual goods become truly ours when we assimilate them as said: "He who remains into love, he remains into God and God remains into him" (1 Jn. 4: 18). But not only the love for God is born out of virtues, but also the virtues are born out of the love for God[798]. That's why, also out Lord says once in the Gospel: "He who has My commandments and keeps them, that one loves Me" (Jn. 14: 21); and at some other time: "He who loves Me, he will keep My commandments" (Jn. 14: 23). That's why, neither the deeds of the virtues are worthy of being praised, nor useful, to them who do them without love, nor it is worthy the love without deeds[799]. Amongst these, the first thing is shown in details by Paul, when he writes to the Corinthians: "If I do these and these, but I do not have love, I won't benefit anything" (1 Cor. 13: 3). And the other thing is shown by the especially loved disciple, saying: "Let's love not only with the word, neither with the tongue, but with the deed and with the truth" (1 Jn. 3: 18).

79. The supreme and all-worshipped Father is the Father of the Truth through Himself, namely of the Only Begotten Son. And as Ghost of the Truth, He has the Holy Ghost, as the Word of the Truth showed before. Consequently, they who honor the Father into These Ones and who believe so, staying under the work of These Ones (for "The Ghost is – says the apostle – The One Whom we worship and pray through" (1 Cor. 12: 3); and "No one comes to the Father except through Me" (Jn. 12: 6), says The Only Begotten Son of God)), namely them who honor steadfast habits, through our toils. But in them is Christ Himself. This is for, He has all of them assimilated into Him, in a culminant manner, and so, out of Him it irradiated within us their power, or our power for them, and this power is spiritual sweetness too, and happiness too, for us and for others. That person who is steadfastly kind and strengthened into virtue, that person manifests her/his kindness through the irradiation of her/his kindness towards others. The virtue is the mode of the generous existence, of that existence that is open for others, unlike the passions that is the mode of the egotistic existence. Through the good that irradiated out of somebody towards somebody else, himself penetrates the another. Through His virtues, which become spring of power to our virtues, Christ Himself crosses into us and dwells within us.

[798] The virtues culminate into love, as the culminant stage of the generosity. But the virtues themselves, as forms of the generosity, couldn't have been able to occurs within us, if the virtues hadn't been upheld by the impulse towards generosity.

[799] The love without steadfast deeds strengthened into virtues, it won't be a true love, neither the deeds without love will be deeds capable of transforming us, but they will remain appearances and sporadic gestures, without an internal substance, without the consistent and durable warmth, without the attachment to the one whom they are addressed to. They let him who commits them, still isolated and cold.

thus, into Ghost and Truth, the All-High Father, these ones are the true worshippers (Jn. 4: 24)[800].

80. God is Ghost and they who worship Him, they ought to worship Him into Ghost and Truth (Jn. 4: 23), namely incorporeally understanding Him Who is incorporeal. This is for thus they truly see That One Who is everywhere, into His Ghost and Truth[801]. This is for, God exists as Ghost, so that He is incorporeal; and what is incorporeal it is not in space, neither it is restrained by spatial borders. So, he who says that we must worship God in a certain place amongst all the places on earth and in the sky, he doesn't speak the truth, neither he worships into truth. As incorporeal, God is nowhere, but as God, He is everywhere. This is because, if that had been a border or a place, or a creature, where hadn't been God there, then God would have been fenced Himself into a certain place. So, God is everywhere, for He is borderless. How is He everywhere? As The One Who isn't comprised by a part, but as being Him comprised by the whole? No, for, if that had been the case, God would have also been body. Therefore, He Who keeps and comprises everything, he is in Himself, everywhere and above-everything, worshipped by the true worshippers into His Ghost and Truth.

81. The angels and the soul, by being incorporeal, they aren't in a certain place, but neither they are everywhere. This is because, they do not uphold everything, but they need Him Who upholds them. Consequently, they too are within Him Who upholds and comprises everything, they being bordered by Him

[800] The Son is the Truth, for He is the expressed, or revealed, knowledge. But He is Person in the same time. The Person is truer than any other reality, through the own consistency. This is for the person knows the things, the person finds out and multiplies the things' meanings, and the person gathers the things' meaning and the knowledge related to them and the persons communicates those endlessly. The person as such is an abyssal, inexhaustible reality. That's why the Supreme Truth is the Supreme Person. But the Person, like Supreme Truth expressed or revealed, it born out of the Person Who is the supreme Principle-Person, the supreme-source-Person. But the Person Who endlessly communicated the truth revealed by Himself, He has within Himself also the Ghost as life. And this Life is Person too, for the true and inexhaustible life cannot be but a Person. In the supreme Truth and in the supreme Life, as Persons, Whom He communicated us and Who communicate Themselves to us, we know the Person Who revealed Them to us and Who is revealing Them to us. In these ones we must worship the source-Person, namely the Father.

[801] It is being affirmed here, again, the fact that wherever we are, we are in connection with The Truth as Person and with The Life as Person, namely with the Son and with the Holy Ghost, and we worship Their Father, namely we bring to God the true worshipping.

in a corresponding manner[802]. The soul, by upholding the body which the soul has been built into, it is everywhere within that body, but not as in space, neither as being comprised, but like something that upholds that body it comprised that body, and it make that body alive, by being in this regard too, in the image of God[803].

82. The man was made in the image of God more than the angels were, not only because the man has in himself an upholding and of-life-maker power, but also for the mastery. This is for, in the nature of our soul there is, on one hand, the mastering and leading side, and on the hand, there is the serving and obeying side[804], namely: the will, the lust, the feeling and, simply: all the one which were together-built by God with the mind according to the Mind, even though us, through a sinful reckoning, we oppose ourselves not only to God-All-Keeper, but also to the Ruler sown into our nature. God, for the mastery power from within us, He gave us the mastery upon the whole earth too. But the angels do not have a yoked body, in order to have that body yoked to their mind. The will of the mind (understanding) reached to be, in the fallen angels, as ceaselessly evil; and within the good angels it is ceaselessly good, nod needing at all a driver to hold the reins. The evil one hadn't had an earthly mastery but he stole it. From here it is obvious that the evil one was not made as master of the earth. And the good angels have been appointed by the All-Keeper to supervise the things from on earth after our falling from that mastery and because of that mastery, though our mastery hasn't been taken away totally from us, due to the love for people of God. This is for, the borders of the angels, as Moses says in his song, were set up by God after He divided the nations (Deut. 32: 8). And this kingdom was made after Cain and Seth, the descendants of Cain being called humans, and [802] God can be contemplated everywhere and in anything, but by surpassing every created reality. This is for everything is upheld within Him. One cannot say the same thing regarding the angel. The angel can be reckoned as being within God, as the man is too; or God being within him.

[803] The fact that we have a body, it might also be a help in interrupting the evil we commit. This is because, the wallowing into the bodily pleasures may cause a disgust too, to that man who feels himself superior through spirit. Also, the rebellion of the body can cause also a will of the spirit (of the mind) for controlling the body.

[804] Likewise, the soul can be contemplated all over within the body, but by surpassing what is material into the body. The soul is contemplated as ruler, through some powers, and like obedient through some other powers.

the descendants of Seth being called as son of God (Gen. 6: 2). And it seems to me that the name was chosen back then, and it was heralded the nation out of which the Only Begotten Son was to take His body.

83. Somebody could say that, in addition to many others, the threefold kind of our knowledge too, it shows us more than the angels are, in the image of God, not only for it is threefold, but also for it comprises all kinds of knowledge. This is for only us, amongst all the creature, we have, in addition to the mental (understanding) and rational knowledge, also that knowledge out of senses. Proper to rationality it was to contrive the craftsmanships, the sciences, and the knowledge, to work the field, to build up and to bring in sight new things out of the existing things, but not out of the realities which do not exist at all. This is because, bringing realities to existence, out of nothing, it belongs only to God[805]. Only this work God gave it, as a gift, to the people and only to the people. This is for the man doesn't create anything totally anew, and neither is broken anything of what God created. But, by mixing something with another thing from those which are around us, the mind brings to sight another shape. Also, God gave only to the people, as a gift, that the unseen word of the mind not only to be left by hearing as the combination with the air, but also to be written and to be seen as body through body. By that, God gave a durable assurance about the coming and the showing of the Highest Word, through body[806]. None of these was given to the angels.

84. But despite we have been having until today, within us, the image of God, more than the angels have it, we haven't remained in the likeness of God, especially we aren't now in the image of God way lower than the angels are. Letting the other aspects aside, the consummation into the likeness of God, it is done through the godlike illumination from God, which the evil

[805] Tye work of the rationality has, according to Saint Gregory Palamas, a practical character, or, at least related to the seen world. That's why, even the artistical creations which bring in sight new shapes, they are related, according to him, to rationality. The characters created in literature, the new melodies, the new images in painting, the new shapes in sculpture etc. are produced out of non-existing realities, but not in an absolute mode. This is for, there are used in "creating those", the elements given into the seen world.

[806] Saint Gregory sees in the word of the mind that always takes a heard and seen image through the body, also a permanent example for the possibility of the Word of the Father to embody Himself.

angels are deprived of, and because of that they reached under darkness (Jude 1: 6), but the godlike minds (the good angels) are full of likeness of God, and that's why they are called too, as the second light and as the irradiation out of the first light. I reckon this is a known fact to all of them who read consciously and skillfully the instilled Scriptures of God. Consequently, the good angels have also the knowledge of the realities submitted to the senses, but they do not perceive those realities through a power of the senses and natural, but through a godlike power, which nothing of the sensitive realities can be hid out of, regardless in what manner, present, past, and future[807].

85. They whoa re imparted with this illumination and who have this illumination to some extent, they have the knowledge of the creatures according to that extent too[808]. The fact that the angels too are imparted with that light, and that is uncreated, and also that that light isn't the godlike being, it is a known fact to all of them who zealously read the apostles and the speakers about God, the wisemen of God. But they who cogitate the contrary things, they blaspheme this godlike illumination, by saying about it either that it is creature, or that is being of God. When they say that that light is creature, they do not admit that that light is the light of the angels[809]. Let be present the speaker of God from Areopagus, for he briefly clarifies these three aspects: "By moving in a circle, the godlike minds are united with the without-beginning illuminations of the beautiful and of the good". The fact that "godlike minds" he called the good angels, it is obvious to everyone. But speaking at plural about illuminations, he differentiated them from the being of God, for the being of God is one and totally undifferentiated. Finally, by calling them "without beginning and without end", what did he show else than they are uncreated?

[807] Full of godlike illumination, the angels see the sensitive realities too. Also, the angels received from God also a mastery upon the earthly realities, after that mastery was partially lost by people.

[808] The godlike illumination gives not only the knowledge about the heavenly realities, but also about the creatures, by making transparent their godlike foundation, their endless meanings which have been from ever within God.

[809] If the sole godlike light is the created knowledge of the creatures, that light won't be able to be a light of the angels too. This is because we have this light directly, more than the angels have it. If that had been the case, the angels would have been living into darkness.

86. The Word of God, by having mercy on our naked nature that was disrobed of this godlike illumination and shininess, through the ugliness of the falling, and by taking out nature upon Himself, for His deep mercy, he showed it to the chiefs of the disciples on Mount Tabor, again and more beautifully dressed up a nature. He showed then what were yore and what we will be in the future age through Him, if we decide to live here, as much as possible, as He lived, that John with the golden tongue says[810].

87. To this illumination and shininess being Adam partaker before falling, he was not naked, for he was dressed up into a vestment of true glory. And one couldn't say in words how much more was Adam more adorned by that glory in comparison to them who cover their heads with diadems adorned with much gold and with precious stones[811]. This illumination and this godlike grace are called by the great Paul as our heavenly abode, saying: "That's why by sighing, we desire to be us dressed up in our heavenly abode, so that we will be found dressed up and not naked" (2 Cor. 5: 203). The earnest of this godlike illumination and of its vestment, it was received by Paul himself from God, when Paul went from Jerusalem to Damascus, I to say that together with Gregory the Theologian, on that moment when, before being cleaned up of persecutions, he spoke to the persecuted One. Better said, Paul received the small candle of the great light.

88. The godlike supra-being is never called at plural; but the grace and the godlike work of God, by being shared undividedly, it is in the image of the solar ray that illuminated, it warms up, it gives life and growth, it sends its shininess to them who are illuminates by it, and it shows itself to the eyes which look at it. According to this unsatisfactory example, the godlike work too, it is called by the speakers-about-God, not as being one but many. So says the Great Basil: "And the works of the Ghost, which are they? They are untold for their greatness and countless for their multitude. This is because, how could we understand the realities which are beyond ages? Which were His works from before the creation known with the mind, and [810] In order to understand this chapter, one has to take in account also the affirmation from the chapter no. 54 of Saint Gregory Palamas, that, without the falling of Adam, our nature wouldn't have been fille up with the whole godlike glory.

[811] Here is involved the idea that the man would have reached the full glory even if the man had not fallen.

beyond ages (this is for the ages too, they are creatures known with the mind"[812], nobody has ever said of thought that it was created". So, the powers and the works of the godlike Ghost are uncreated, being undividedly different from that One and totally undivided Being of the Ghost.

89. The uncreated work of God, undividedly divided, it is shown at plural by the speakers-about-God, as the Great Basil showed it too. So, because neither the illumination and the godlike grace are being, but they are work of God, that's why is communicated not only in time but also at plural, being given, as gift, on the measure of them who are imparted with it, and bringing with it, according to eth worthiness of them who receive it, more or less, the deifying shininess.

90. Isaias called these works as seven, for at Jews seven means many. "It will be raised, he says, a staff form the root of Jesse and a flower will bud up out of it; and seven ghosts will rest upon Him: the ghost of the wisdom, the ghost of the understanding, the ghost of the knowledge, the ghost of the right-faithfulness, the ghost of the advice, the ghost of the strength, and the ghost of the fear" (Isa. 11: 2-3). They who cogitate as the heretics do, they will insanely affirm that these sevens ghosts are created. I have enough combated these ones in the Antirrhetics composed, in detail, against them[813]. But, also Gregory the Theologian, by mentioning these godlike works of the Ghost, he says that Isaias liked to call the works of the Ghost as ghosts[814]. Besides, himself being the greatest voice amongst prophets, he limpidly showed not only the difference between these godlike works and the godlike being, by using the number, but he also showed them as uncreated, by saying that they are resting themselves. This is for, resting is characteristic to a higher dignity. So, what could be they creatures like, they whoa re resting upon the Lord's body which He has taken it from us?

91. Our Lord Jesus Christ, according to Luke, He was casting the devils out with the finger of God (Lk. 11: 20), and, [812] Namely before the creation of the angels, whoa re "pure minds", beings who are unknown with the senses, but who can be known only with the mind or with the understanding. Saint Basil the Great, About the Holy Ghost 13: 49; G.P. 32: 156 D – 157 A. The ages are "intelligible creatures", for they cannot be perceived with the senses.

[813] From here we can see that these heads were written by Saint Gregory Palamas after his Antirrhetics which he wrote against Akindynos, namely staring around the year 1345.

according to Matthew, into the Ghost of God (Mt. 12: 28). And Basil the Great says that the finger of God is one of the works of the Ghost. So, if one of them is the Holy Ghost, without any doubt, the others too are alike, as the same one taught us. But that doesn't mean that there are many gods, or many Ghosts. This is for, these ones are going-outs, are showings, and are natural works of One and the Sane Ghost. Through each of them, it is One Him Who works. Therefore, the strayed ones, by calling those ones as creatures, they lower the godlike Ghost, in a sevenfold manner, to the level of creature. Let them be ashamed for seven times. This is for, another prophet speaking about these ones, he says that they are eyes of the Lord, which look all over the earth (Zah. 4: 18). And he who writes in the Apocalypse, he says: "Grace and peace from God and from seven ghosts, which are before the throne of God and from Christ" (Apoc. 5: 4-5). He clearly presents here, to the believers, that those ones are the Holy Ghost.

92. God the Father, by heralding in advance, to Micah the Prophet, the birth according to the body of That One Who is the Only Begotten Son, and by wanting to show the lack-of-beginning of His godhead, he says that His going-outs are from the beginning of the days of the time (5: 1). These going-outs were interpreted by the godlike fathers as works and power of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, unlike those who strive themselves to cogitate and to argue the opinions of them who are strayed in their faith and who say about those that they are created. But let them finally take heed and tell us who is "The One from the beginning"? Who is Him Whom said says to: "From ever and forever You are" (Ps. 89: 2[815])? And let them wisely understand, if they want to, that God, by saying through the prophet that those going-outs have been since the beginning, He didn't say, by any means, that those have been created. Basil, the speaker-about-God, he didn't say either that those have been created, but he said that they were the works of God from before building the intelligible world, and from before ages[816]. This is for, only God has been worker and

[815] In KJB we have: Ps. 90: 2: "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God."; in ROB we have: Ps. 89: 2: "Before the mountains were made and the earth and the world were was built, from ever and for ever You are." (E. l. t.'s n.)

almighty from ever, as One having power and works, from before eternity.

93. But the chiefs of the opposite opinion, by obviously opposing themselves to the saints, they say that there is only one uncreated reality: the godlike nature, and everything that differs from the godlike nature, in any way, it is a created reality. By saying that, they affirm that the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost are creatures too. This is for, one is too the work of the Three Ones. And That One Whose work is created, That One also cannot be uncreated. That's why, not the work of God, but what the work of God makes and its result is creature. That's why, the godlike Damascene taught us that that work that differs from the godlike nature it is the existential motion, namely natural. Once it is characteristic to the godlike work to made something, says the godlike Cyril, that work cannot be creature, except it was made by another work, and that one again by another work and so on endlessly; and the uncreated work will be searched for at the end.

94. The godlike being and work, by being present everywhere in an undivided manner, the work of God fits also within us who are created, for it is also divided in an unseparated manner, as the speakers-about God say, while the godlike nature remains, also according to them as totally undivided[817]. That's why Saint John Chrysostom too, after he says about the droplet of the grace that it has filled up everything with knowledge, that through that droplet of the grace were done the wonders and were untied the sins, also the fact that this droplet is uncreated, and he hurries himself up to say that that droplet of the grace is work and it is not being. Later on, he also shows the difference between the godlike work and the godlike being and the Hypostasis of the Ghost, by writing: "I say that that is a part of the work, for the Comforter does not divide Himself. So, the godlike grace and the work they match within each of us, for it is divided undividedly. But the being of God, by being in itself totally undivided, how could it match within anything amongst the created realities?"[818].

[817] The godlike work is divided undividedly, as the voice of him who speaks is in them who listen to him, for he remains undivided while he is present in everyone who listen to him, through his voice, or through his power. He doesn't divide himself, but those ones, by being many, they receive him in their quality as many.

[818] Saint John Chrysostom, Homily no. 14 at John; G.P. 59: 91-92. The Comforter as Person, He is even in the smallest droplet of the grace. And it is about a small droplet, because only

95. There are three things into God: the being, the work, and the godlike Hypostases of the Trinity. They whoa re found worthy to be united with God, by becoming a Ghost with Him (as the Great Paul says: "He who attached himself to the Lord, he will be a Ghost with Him" (1 Cor. 6: 17)), as it was shown before, they are not united according to the being. This is because, all the speakers-about God confess that God cannot be shared according to His being. And the union according to Hypostasis is characteristic only to the Word God-the Man. The conclusion is, therefore, that they who are found worthy to be united with God, they are united according to the work. So, the Ghost Whom one who attached himself to God he will be one with God through, it is and it is called as the uncreated work of the Ghost, but not as Being of God, even if this is disliked by them who oppose us. This is for, also through the prophet God foretold not that "I will pour My Ghost", but that "out of My Ghost" over the believers (Joel 3: 1)[819].

96. By the benevolence of God, he says, were moving Moses and David and all of them whom the godlike work was dwelling within, through the rejection of the bodily features, and they became living images of Christ and rather one with Him according to the grace than being only alike to Him. This is for, one is that one cleanness from Christ and from within saints, and the glory of the Lord shined over us (Ps. 89: 17[820]), says the all-godlike singer. This is for, the ghost-bearer souls, as the Great Basil says, by being those souls illuminated by the Ghost, they become themselves spiritual, and the spread the grace within others. From here come: the knowing of the future that much can be received by him whom the grace comes within. Saint John Chrysostom, by speaking about the Ghost as Person and about His being, he says that the Ghost as Person fits within each human being through his droplet of grace, but His being remains non-comprised.

[819] If the Ghost had been united with us according to His Being, we would have had a common being with Him. If He had been united with us according to His Hypostasis, our person would have been one with His Person. Or, His Person would have become our person, as within Christ the Person of the Word had become the Person of the human nature. So, the Ghost unites Himself with us by work. But Himself as Person is not less united with our person through His work. We impropriate His work and He impropriates ours. We meet one another in the common but non-confounded divine-human (theandric) work.

[820] In KJB we have: Ps. 90: 17: "And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us: and establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it."; in ROB we have: Ps. 89: 17: "And may the light of the Lord our God be over us and straighten the things of our hands." (E. l. t.'s n.)

things, the understanding of the mysteries, the penetration into the hidden realities, the sharing of the gifts, the heavenly living, the singing with the angels, the ceaseless gladness, the dwelling of God within us, the likeness to God and, the highest amongst all the desired things: the transformation into god[821].

97. The angels surpass the people through this grace and shininess and through their union with God. That's why the understanding powers and the serving ghosts are second type lights, servants of the light from above and, as second type lights, they are reflections of the first light. The angel is the first luminous nature second to the first light, and the angels reflects that first light. The angel is the second light, an irradiation or an impartation with the first lights[822]. And by moving in a circle, the deified minds are united with the without-beginning and without-end rays of the beautiful and of the good[823]. This is for, God Himself is light to the worthy ones, and He is not something else to them[824]. And what the sun is to the sensitive realities, like that is God to the intelligible realities[825]. He is the first and culminant light, which [821] The Holy Ghost, by becoming a Subject within our subject, and His works by becoming our works, we will know the hidden and future mysteries and we will become gods by grace.

[822] "The first luminous nature after the first one". This means that God is the luminous nature by excellence. "God is light and there is no darkness in Him" (1 Jn. 1: 5). God can be fully known in His endless richness and He knows all the things He made and are made. The angels are the second luminous nature. The man is luminous nature too, but the man can become fully luminous only through the dwelling of God within him. The man is the conscience about himself and about all realities, but only partially. The angel reflects God in his light. The man, at his turn, he too reflects God. The angel is an "irradiation", a "flowing" out of God, and the man is likewise, to a smaller degree. And the man reached his accomplishment only into the light he receives from God, after, by creation, the man was imparted with his natural light from God. This isn't though, Neoplatonist, but it is an interpersonal relation. The angel is created as purely-mental subject, purely-understanding, and the man too, he is understanding, but the man has also a sensitive side in himself. But both the angel and the man are created as subjects, in order they to be imparted in relation with the godlike Subject with the whole His light and life. The irradiation is the way God enters the interpersonal relation with His creatures.

[823] The "deified minds", or the angels, they are moving in a circle around the prime light in order they to be shared with That Light increasingly more. This is for, by moving themselves in a circle, the get closer to God from all directions, in all regards.

[824] Out of God there irradiates only light, only the conscience about themselves, to those subjects who are destined to last forever and to ceaselessly advance into light, into the knowledge about themselves, about God, and about all the other subjects and objects.

[825] But, while the sun belongs to the sensitive realities, God is beyond not only to the sensitive realities but even to the intelligible realities. God is transcendent to the intelligible realities as well. God cannot be known either through the work of the mind, or through the natural illuminates the whole rational nature. But if, says Saint John Chrysostom, you hear the prophet saying: "I saw the Lord sitting on the throne" (Isa. 6: 1), do not reckon that he saw the being of the Lord, but he saw His descent, and he saw that in a more overshadowed manner than the powers from above see it.

98. The whole nature is as far and as strange as possible to the godlike being. This is because, if God is nature, the others won't be nature, as if each one among the others is nature, God won't be nature. Likewise, God won't be existence, if the others are existence: but if He is existent, the others aren't existent[826]. You cogitate alike also about wisdom, about kindness, about all the realities form around God, and about God, and you will theologize well and in accordance with the saints. But God is and He is said as the nature of all existing realities, for all of them are imparted with Him and they subsist through the impartation with Him; but this doesn't mean that through the impartation with His nature, God forbid that, but through the impartation with his work. In this sense God is also the existence of the existing realities, and He is the shape in shapes, as origin of the shapes[827], and the wisdom of the wise understanding, but He can be known only through His work, namely through His light, that becomes characteristic to angels and people.

[826] God is so unlike everything else that, if those ones are called as nature, He must not be called as nature. God exceeds the nature, or only God is true nature. Likewise in the case of the existence. God cannot be called as existence, if those ones are reckoned as existence, or, vice versa, if God is reckoned as existent, those ones must not be reckoned as existent. God exceeds the existence, or, He alone is the true existence. How precarious is our existence and the existence of anything else, even in our experience! Sometimes it seems to us like a dream. We often ask if our existence really exist. But surely, God will be the ultimate basis of their existence, even if He is inaccessible to our experience.

[827] "The shape in shapes, as origin of the shapes" (ειδος εν ειδεσις ως ειδεάρχης). In God are given, in a virtual manner, all the shapes, in their ultimate beauty which all our shapes tend towards. They are given as principle or a in their virtual origin and as in the final target of all the shapes. In God are prefigured all the shapes. That's why in God is prefigured the whole beauty. All the shapes, all the beauties are unfoldings of the shapes and of the beauties comprised within Him in a virtual manner, following to be concentrated in Him, according to their effort, and helped by Him, in a supreme harmony. That beauty that concentrates within itself all the beauties, the "shape" that concentrates within itself all the shapes, it is the richest, and the deepest, and the most expressive, and it is more comprising than all the shapes and beauties unfolded out of it. In Him there is the beauty of maximum discretion and grace, beyond any exhibitionism and theatricality. (the Romanian "formosus" it comes from "forma" (shape)).

ones[828] and, simply, all to everyone. In the same time, He is not nature because of being Him above all nature, and He doesn't' exist, because of being Him above all existing realities; and He doesn't exist and He is shapeless, because of being Him above shape. Therefore, how will us reach close to God? BY getting close to His being? But none among the created realities has, and none of them will ever have any impartation with or any closeness to the supreme nature. So, if one has reached close to God, that one surely will have come close to God's work. But how? As one who is imparted with that work in a natural manner? But this work is natural to all creatures. Consequently, through the natural powers, one reaches close to or far from God. And only the rational beings have a free will. Therefore, only the rational being from among all the other beings, they reach close to or far from God, by getting close or far through their virtue or evilness. So, only these ones are and are able to happiness or unhappiness[829]. But let's believe that we will achieve the happiness.

99. By comparing a creature to another, we say that one is near to God by nature, while another is stranger. Near to God are born the intelligible beings, which are known only with the mind. And totally strangers are those who fall under the senses. And among the last ones, even are farer those which are totally inanimate and motionless. So, by being compared to one another, the creatures are reckoned either close to God by nature or stranger[830]. But they, through them, according to the nature, all of them are stranger to God. Even more than that, one cannot even tell how far from God is the intelligible nature and how far are the works of the senses and the realities from under the senses, from the intelligible realities[831]. So, because [828] If God's wisdom is spring within the wise ones, any deviation from the harmonious wisdom it means our falling off God as center, as means, even if that means slipping from Him even with a part of our being.

[829] Through our free will, we get close to and we get far from God, for He is too having a free will and being a Person. The persons achieve the closeness with one another through a free bilateral openness. We are having here another dimension of the existence. And on that it depends the happiness or the unhappiness of the created persons, limited in themselves, but aspiring to infinity.

[830] There are diverse dimensions of the existence. The highest one is that of the godlike nature. Those existences which receive the light of the godlike nature, they increase in conscience so that reach near to the godlike existence.

[831] Only when compared to one another, some natures are reckoned as closer to God, while others are farer. Looked in themselves, all of them are far from God. Even more than that, one of being, by nature, so far from God, woe to us, if we do not make ourselves as close to Him by our good deeds and by our good behaviors, which spring out of a good decision[832].

100. The common and deified voice of the godlike speeches about God, namely the bearer-of-God Damascene, he says in the second one of his theological heads: "He who wants to speak or to hear something about God, he must limpidly know that neither all the aspects are unspeakable, nor all of them are to be spoken, either belonging to theology or to oikonomia; neither all of them are to be known, nor all of them are to be unknown. We know that they are above-word also those which we want to speak about from among the godlike realities, given the fact that they belong to a Word Who exceeds all realities. This is for, they aren't outside the word by some diminution of them, but they are outside our word which we have within us and which we utter to others' hearing. This is because, neither the uttered word could explain those realities, nor the inside word could reach them, no matter how hard it tries. So, we must not allow ourselves to speak about God form ourselves, but let's turn ourselves towards them who speak into Ghost about those of the Ghost; and we will speak if our opposants ask us for a word"[833].

101. They say that on the doors of Plato's school was written that no one must enter there if that one didn't know cannot tell how far the intelligible natures are from God and how far are the works of the senses and the sensitive realities from the intelligible realities. There is an infinite distance between the existence of the intelligible realities - but created realities - and God, and there might be also an infinite distance between the existence of the sensitive realities and their feeling and the intelligible realities. The distance between them remains an impenetrable mystery to us. One cannot say anything about it. What could we say, for instance, about the distance between us and the animals? But, from another point of view, the intelligible realities are near to the sensitive realities by conscience, and the sensitive realities, without they realizing it, are near to the understanding realities, through the necessity they represent to those ones, in order those to enrich themselves in knowledge. Likewise, God is near to all the realities created by His as Creator and Upholder of theirs, and the created realities – especially the conscious ones – are near to God, by the need their feel or they have for Him.

[832] Our good deeds produce our closest to God dimension; by our will our good deeds place us in accord with His will.

[833] "Belong to the word in sense of surpassing (χαθ υπερέχοντα λόγον)". The unspoken do not belongs to a sphere where the word is missing, for those realities aren't bellow word. But they belong to a sphere which is matches by a word that is above our words. Those ones aren't irrational, but they belong to a rationality that includes our rationality and it exceeds it too. In a way, we can combine the words in such a manner, when we want to express those realities, so that to accomplish an expression that is above-expression.

geometry. But he doesn't know geometry at all, he who is unable to cogitate and speak about the undivided and about the divided realities. This is because, there cannot be an edge without something being limited; it is impossible. And the geometry speaks almost only about edges, which are determined and which are shown without the realities bordered by them, sometimes even as standing by themselves. The mind divides the undivided realities. And who he hasn't learnt yet to divide with his mind, the body form the surrounding realities, how could he want to hear about a nature as such, a nature that not only is separated from its natural aspects, while being into them, but it neither can be without those? How it could that want to hear about wholes as wholes, which are in parts, because only by mind and by word those ones are separated, and they are cogitated before the many, because of not being able to exist, to the true rationality, without the many? How it could want to hear about the intelligible and understandable realities?[834] How it could want to hear them who say that each of us has mind and understanding and that each of our cogitations is mind? Won't that laugh at us and won't that shout out blaming us because of saying that each man has two and several minds? And he who is unable to stand such affirmation that there are realities which are unseparated but still different, how could him speak or hear something like that about God? This is for, at God, there are and they are said many unions and differences, according to the speakers-about-God. By hearing us speaking in agreement with the saints, about a union in a difference, and that something belonging to God is non-comprisable, but something else can match in, but God is One, the Same One being non-comprised according to His being, but matched in by creatures according to His godlike works, namely according to His will from before ages, regarding us, according to His Providence from before ages, for us, according to His wisdom before ages, regarding us, and, so we say like the godlike Maximos said, according to His limitless wisdom and kindness; when hearing these from us, our opposants, as we are forced to tell these, they and the people like them, they blame us that we speak about several gods and about several uncreated things, and so we make God as composed. They do not know that God divides Himself undividedly, and that God is united in difference; and this doesn't bring into God either multiplication or composition.

102. The great Paul, the mouth of Christ, the vessel of the choice (Acts 9: 15), the all-enlightened bearer of the godlike name, he says that "the unseen realities of God from the foundation of the worlds, by being understood out of creatures, are seen His eternal power and godhood" (Rom. 1: 20). It is the being of God that is seen, by being understood out of creatures? Not at all. Only the insanity of the strayed ones – and before them the madness of Eunomius – write that out of creatures one doesn't understand anything else but the being of God. But the godlike apostle is far from affirming such things. This is for, by teaching before that what is known about God it is shown (Rom. 1: 19) and by showing that there is something else that is above what we know about God Whom he unveiled to all of them who have mind, he later added: "For the unsee realties of God from the foundation of the world, they are seen by being understood out of creatures". And what we can know about God, you can find out from the bearer-of-God fathers, who present the things like this: something belonging to God is unknown; that is His being; and something else is know; these ones are all the realities from around His being, or His kindness, and His wisdom, and His power, and His godhood, and His glory. These ones are called by Paul also as unseen, but being understood out of creatures. And if these which can be understood out of creatures, are around the being of God, how could they be creatures too?[835] Consequently, the work of God understood out of creatures it is, on one hand uncreated, and on the other hand it is not being, because of not being presented only at singular, but at plural too.

103. The creatures show the wisdom, the skillfulness, and the power, but they do not show the being, says Basil the Great, speaking against Eunomius who was saying that out of creatures it is shown the being of God[836]. Consequently, the work of God that can be understood out of creatures, it is, on one side uncreated, and on the other side it isn't a being. And [835] This chapter is taken by Palamas from his work About the Godlike Union and Difference (Ed. Hristou, vol. II, pp. 74-75).

[836] Saint Basil the Great, Against Eunomius, 2; G.P. 29: 748 B.

they who say that the godlike work doesn't differ at all from the godlike being, they obviously are Eunomians.

104. Rightly it is said, therefore, in the Antirrhetics written by that brother[837], who cogitates at the brotherly things, that by understanding the beauty and the greatness of the wonders from the creation, and by achieving other and other meanings regarding God, and by interpreting each of these meanings that are born within us, we can use diverse names[838]. This is for, out of the greatness and the beauty of the creatures, it is contemplated, by resemblance, the Creator, and, from them we call as Maker their Builder (this is for, it is possible to Him who has the power, to materialize His will) and righteous judge and impartial. But, also the word "God" we have learnt to respect it from His seer work. So, neither through this word, by teaching about a certain partial work of the godlike nature, we do not cogitate at the godlike being[839].

105. Dionysus the Areopagite, the highest among the speakers-about-God, second only to the godlike apostles, after he clarified the difference regarding the Hypostases of God, he said: "The benefactor going-out is a godlike distinction, the godlike unity multiplying on itself in an above-unity manner, through kindness"[840]. And a little further: "The benefactor going-outs of the godlike spring, we say about them that they are godlike distinction. This is for, by giving to all existing realities, as a gift, and by overpouring the impartations of all goods, it distinguishes itself as being united and it multiplies itself unitarily without exiting The One"[841]. And a lither further: "These common and united distinctions of the entire godhead, or the benefactor going-outs, we are going to try to extoll them as much as possible". He limpidly shows that there is at God another difference too, and not only that regarding the Hypostases. This difference other than hypostatical, he calls it as the difference of the godhead. This is for, the difference regarding the hypostases it isn't the difference of the godhead. He says that God is multiplying Himself also through the [839] Θεος comes from θεάομαι – I look. The name God is, therefore, also the name of a work of God. We have no name for the godlike being.

godlike going-outs and works. And now he is calling that as going-outs, while, on another occasion, he says: "The godhead doesn't multiply itself, God forbid that" and "God doesn't multiply Himself, for God is in Trinity, but He is not tripled". He also shows the uncreated character of these going-outs and works. This is for, he called them as godlike, and he said that they are differences of the entire godhead. He also said that itself the godlike spring is being multiplied by these going-outs and works, by not receiving anything from outside. And he even promised to extoll these features, adding: "as much as possible". By this, the highest among the extollers of God presented those, to us, as above all-glorification.

106. The same speaker-about-God, saying that the benefactor going-out is a godlike distinction, he adds: "This is for, the last impartations are united in the godlike distinction". He has called here as impartation, all together the going-outs and the works of God. But he added that those cannot be framed within world, in order somebody not to reckon that those ones are the results of the work, as, for instance, the being of each existence, or the sensitive life within the living ones, or the rationality and the mind into the rational and understanding ones. This is because, how could be these ones into God and not-framed into creation, once they are created? Or, how could be creatures the going-outs and the impartations of this kind, of God, which are non-framed into world, once the non-framed impartation is, in a natural manner, in Him Who imparts, as the light shows that to us?[842]

107. A little further, this great (Dionysus) extolls the going-outs and the works of this kind, of God, with other names appropriate to God, by calling them as impartations and Self-impartations. And he even shows them, in several parts of his writings, as being above-the-existing realities (above-creatures) and as being prime models (paradigms) of the existing realities, as existing from before into God, in an above-being unity. So, how could these be creatures? In the following he adds to teach us also what these paradigms are: "We say that are paradigms the existence-making rationalities of the things, which preexisted into God unitarily, and which are called by theology as predefinitions and godlike and good wills, definitory and makers of the things. According to them, He predefined and brought to existence all the things"[843]. How could therefore be created, the godlike predefinitions and wills which are maker-of-the-things? How could that not be obvious as lowering the being of God on the level of creature, because of being these going-outs and works reckoned as created? This is for the godlike will, and these godlike impartations and gifts of the kindness that is the cause of all realities, they are not but the of-being-maker work, of-wisdom-maker work, and simply the maker and upholder work of all created realities.

108. The impartation of the self-existence is no longer imparted, at its turn, by anything, as the great Dionysus says too. And the other impartations, for they are impartation which the creatures are being produce through, and which the creatures take their beginning from, those impartations aren't either imparted with anything; this is because neither the Providence is imparted with Providence, neither the life is imparted with life. But because they have the existence, we can say that they are imparted with the existence itself, given the fact that without existence they could not exist, neither they could be imparted, as it is the case too, of the prescience without science. That's why, as self-impartation, they are not at all created. And also due to that, according to Saint Maximos the Confessor, they have never started to exist; and they are contemplated as existentially being around God; and there was no moment they didn't existed on[844]. But the opposants, by [843] The "predefinitions" (προορισμοί) of the existences into God it is a term belonging to Dionysus the Areopagite. That term doesn't mean the predestination of the modes which the existences will behave into, but only the pre-contours, or the pre-limitations by which they distinguish from one another, or the virtual forms of their existence into God. Even their evolution is prefigured into God, but it is not predetermined. This is because, the rational beings can move themselves freely in the frame of their rationalities of predefinitions. This is for, the changes in good or in bad produced or caused by themselves, those do not change their rationalities themselves, but they change only their modes, as Says Saint Maximos the Confessor. The devil remains, according to its rationality, an angel, and it only has become, according to its mode, freely, a demon. These "pre-definitions", as also the "pre-forms" from the head no. 78, they do not have the meaning of some ready-made definitions, which are existing from before into God, but they are the meaning of some definitions or contours of the creatures, given in a virtual manner, in the creator thinking and power of God. One can say that in each work which God works through, in somebody or in something, there is a dynamic form helping that humanin being to define herself/himself. The quote is from Dionysus the Areopagite, About the Godlike Names 5: 8; G.P. 3: 824 C.

reckoning, without piousness, the life itself, the kindness itself, and the realities alike, because of being imparted with the common name of the existing realities, the opposers cannot see that, though they are called as existences, they are above-existences, as the Great Dionysus says. The opposants, by placing the self-impartations on the same level with the creatures, they could easily reckon the Holy Ghost as created too, once the Great Basil says that the Holy Ghost too is imparted with the worthy of God names.

109. And if somebody said that only the self-existence is impartation, because of being the only one not receiving anything through impartation but it lets itself to be imparted, for the other realities receive, through impartation, from it, let that someone know that he wouldn't cogitate wisely at all, about the other impartations. This is because, the living creatures, of the holy ones, or the good ones, we do not say that they live and they are sanctified and improved for the fact that they are and that they are imparted with the self-existence, but for the fact that they are imparted with the self-life, with the self-holiness, and with the self-kindness. And the self-kindness, and the others alike, it doesn't become self-life by being imparted with another self-life. That's why, at its turn, for it is self-life, it is from among those which are given through impartation, and not from among those which received through impartation. And what is not receives through impartation but it is given through impartation, but it makes alive the living ones, how could that be a creature? And the situation is the same regarding the other impartations.

110. Arguments for our words are provided also by Saint Maximos the Confessor, who reckons these going-outs of God as the Providence that produces all realities. He writes in his scholia: "The creator providences and goods, namely those of being, of life, and of maker wisdom, they are common to the Oneness in Three Hypostasis"[845]. So, by saying that they are many and diverse, he showed that they aren't beings of God, for the being of God is One and totally unimparted. And by saying that they are common to the Oneness differentiated in Three Hypostasis, he showed us that those aren't either the Son or the Holy Ghost. This is because, none of These Ones is the work common to the Tree Ones. Finally, by saying about those that they are providences and goods, but they are creator too, he showed them as uncreated; consequently, they would have existed through another creator power and that one would have been created too, by another power, and so on. He who did that, he would throw himself towards the ultimate insanity, without advancing towards infinite[846]. Therefore, the going-outs and the works of God are uncreated, but none of them is either being or hypostasis.

111. The creator and the organizer of the entire world, by giving the world a much-diverse countenance, through the unmatched overwhelming of His kindness, He wanted some of them only to exist, and other to also have life in addition to their existence; and from among these He wanted some of them to be imparted with the understanding life. And He wanted some of them to have their life combined of both these two. Those ones which have taken rational and understanding life from Him, He wanted them that, through their willing tendency towards Him, they to reach the union with Him, and thus to live in a godlike and above-nature manner, in order they to be found worthy of the deifying grace and work. This is for, His will is creator for them who are (creatures), either they have been brought out of inexistence, or they are also improved. And this is, in a diverse manner. This is for, this diversity of the godlike will regarding the things, the one providence and kindness, namely the God's turning, by Hid kindness, towards the lower realities, it is reckoned by the wise-speakers-about-God as being several providences and types of kindness, which are divided and become diverse, in an undivided manner, in the divided realities. Thus, one of them is called as the fore-knower power of God; another is called as the creator and upholder power of God. From among these ones, again, according to the Great Dionysus, some of them are of-being-creator powers, other of life, and other of-wisdom-makers. But each of those is common to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost. And through each of them, that good and godlike will of God, regarding us, of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, it is work and power of being and of-wisdom-maker[847]. He also called these as unframed and undiminished [846] This head is taken from the mentioned work written by Palamas (Ed. Hristou, quoted tome, pp. 78-79).

[847] So, the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost They are as Persons in each work of Theirs.

impartations, thus elevating them above all realities and, in the same time, teaching us that they dwell, in a natural manner, in Him Who gives those, as a gift.

112. Like the sun by giving without diminishing itself[848], warmth and light, to them who are imparted with it, the sun has these wonderful natural and existential works in itself, likewise, the godlike gifts, by being, without diminution, into Him Who spreads them out, they are natural and existential works of His, consequently they are uncreated too. There doesn't remain any trace of sunlight while the sun is under the earth and when the sun leaves the things from on earth, and it is impossible to somebody to enjoy the sunray without joining himself with that ray and without uniting himself, through that ray, with the sun itself, which the light starts from. And the warmth coming from the sun and all the other things coming from the sun and which help to the birth and to the growth of the sensitive realities and to the diverse multiplication of their juices and features, they will be missed by these ones if they do not have, through ray, the union with the sun. Likewise, as this obscure icon of the sensitive realities shows us, only those who encounter that above-nature-and-all-godlike-light, only them are imparted with the deifier grace and through the grace they are united with God. All the others are the results (the effects) of the creator work. These ones are brought to existence out of the inexistence, namely as a gift, but they aren't illuminated by grace, which is another name of the shininess of God[849].

113. This godlike shininess and work of God, which those imparted with it are deified through, it is a certain godlike grace, but it is not the nature of God. Not because that is absent in them who are given as a gift, with grace, according to the insane gossip of the opposants, for the nature of God is present everywhere. But as one that isn't impartable, not existing anything that could be imparted with it, as it has been demonstrated before. Besides, also the godlike work and the grace of the Ghost being present everywhere, and not being separated form That One, them who due to their uncleanness [848] So, Palamas rejects, anticipatedly, the accusation brought him nowadays (quoted from Istina Review) of Neoplatonism, by stressing out that God doesn't diminish Himself by irradiating out of Himself, the work of the grace, or the godlike light.

[849] They who are united with the grace as work irradiating out of God, they are united with God Himself as Person. But some of them are like those who no longer see the sun and who no longer receive the warmth from the sun, and so they remain simply created and preserved.

are incapable to be imparted with, those are unimpartable to them, like they would be absent. This is because somebody says that "like the imprinting of the images aren't done on all substances, but only on those having a certain tenderness and transparency, likewise, the work of the Ghost doesn't show itself in all the souls, but only within those souls who have nothing cunning (winding) and twisted within themselves". And again: "The Holy Ghost is present to everyone. But them who have cleaned themselves of passions, it is shown His power, while them who have their mastery part disturbed by the stains of the sin, He is not shown them yet".

114. The sunlight is unseparated from the ray and the warmth given by it, as a gift. But the light isn't imparted to them who have not eyes, despite they are touched by that ray, those ones receive only that warmth from the ray. This is because, it is impossible to them who lack their eyes, to reach the knowledge of the light. Likewise, and even much stronger so, no one amongst them who enjoy the godlike shininess can be imparted with the being of our Creator. This is because there is no creature able to receive the being of our Creator.

115. Together-witness that the work give as impartation isn't either created or the being of God, it is to us John, the Baptizer of our Lord, together with Jon, the most beloved disciple of our Lord, as also John Chrysostom. One of them by telling us the story and writing; the forerunner and Baptizer of Christ saying that to Christ the Ghost wasn't given with measure (Jn. 3: 34); and the Golden Speaker explaining and writing that the Ghost means here the work: "This is for, all of us take the work of the Ghost with measure, but That One had the whole work unmeasured and whole. And if the work of That One is unmeasured, all the more will be His being". So, by calling the work as Ghost, better said Himself the Ghost of God, as the Baptizer did, and by saying that this work is unmeasured, he showed it as uncreated. And by saying that we receive it with measure, he showed the difference between the uncreated work and the uncreated being. This is because, no one ever received the godlike being. But you cannot either tell that all of them together, because that will mean that each of them receives it in a divided manner, according to his cleanness. This is because, by going further on, father John Chrysostom whose also another difference between the uncreated being and the uncreated work, by saying that: "And if the work of the Ghost is unmeasured, all the more will be so His being"[850].

116. If, according to the insanities of our opposants and of them who think alike to them, the work, and the doing that belong to the work, they do not differ at all from the godlike being, they won't differ, at all, either the giving-of-birth from the proceeding, which belong to the being. And if making doesn't differ from giving birth or from proceeding, neither the creatures will differ, at all, from the Born One and from the Proceeded One. And if is had been so, according to our opposants, The Son of God and the Holy Ghost wouldn't have been different, in anything, from creatures. And all the creatures born and proceeded by God-and-the Father, and every creature, they will be dame gods; and so, God would have been placed on the creatures' level. That's why the godlike Cyril, by showing the difference between the being and the work of God, he says: "giving birth is proper to the godlike nature; and doing is proper to the godlike work". And later on, he adds, saying clearly: "The nature and the work aren't one and the same thing"[851].

117. If the godlike being hadn't been different, at all, from the godlike work, neither would have been different, at all, the doing from the proceeding. But God-and-the Father creates through the Son into the Holy Ghost. Consequently, he gives birth and he proceeds, according to the opinion of our opposants and of them who are alike, through the Son into the Ghost.

118. If the godlike being hadn't differed, at all, from the godlike work, it wouldn't have differed either from will. Consequently, the Only Begotten One out of the being of the Father, He would have been created by the will of God.

119. If the being of God hadn't been different, at all, from the godlike work, and the bearers-of-God confess that God has many works, as God ahs also many providences and creator goods, as it has been demonstrated above, then God would have had several beings too, and that hasn't been ever thought or said by them who belong to the Christian nation.

120. If the work of God hadn't differed, at all, from the godlike being, then they wouldn't had differed either from one another. Consequently, the will of God wouldn't have been different, at all, from His prescience. And then, either God wouldn't have known everything in advance, once He doesn't want all the realities which are being made, or he also would have wanted the evil ones, for He knows everything in advance. Consequently, the godlike prescience is different form the godlike will, and, therefore, each of those differs from the godlike being.

[850] Saint John Chrysostom, Homily no. 30: 2; G.P. LIX: 174.
[851] Thesauruses; G.P. LXXV: 3120.

121. But if the godlike works hadn't been different from one another, then neither the creator work would have been different from the fore-knower work. So, for God started once to created, He also started to fore-know. And how still be God as non-fore-knowing everything from before ages?

122. If the creator work of God hadn't differed at all from the godlike prescience, then the creatures would have been in the same time with the prescience of God. They are without-beginning creatures, for God would have created them without beginning, once God also fore-knows without beginning and the fore-known realities are fore-known without beginning. But then, how could have been Him God, if His creature hadn't been brought to existence later than Him.

123. If the creator work hadn't been different at all, from the prescience of God, this work wouldn't have been submitted to God's will; neither would God have created by what He wanted, but He would have created by the fact that He had existed. But how could have been God Him who had created unwillingly?

124. God is Himself into Himself, for the Three godlike Hypostases are one into another, consubstantially and eternally, comprising one another in an unmixed manner. But God is also into the entire world and the entire world is into God, God as the One Who upholds the world, and the world as the one upheld by God. And all the realities are imparted with the work of upholding, but they aren't imparted with the being of God. That's why, the speakers-about-God say that the fact that God is present everywhere, it is a work of God.

125. They who were pleasant to God and who reached the target which they were made for, namely the deification (this is for, the father say that God made us for becoming partakers to His godhead, 2 Pt. 1: 4), they are into God, as The One Who deifies them. Therefore, they too are imparted with the godlike work, and the speakers-about-God say that the deification is a name of the godlike work.

126. That above-being and above-life nature, above God (as work) and above-good, if it had been above-good and above God[852], and so on, it is unspeakable and unthinkable, and totally impossible to contemplate, for the fact that it is above all realities and it is supra-unknown[853] and it is placed above those above-heavens minds, through a non-comprisable power, being always totally non-comprised and unspeakable[854]. This is because, there is no name called in this age and in the future age that could belong to it; there is not word into the soul or uttered in speaking, that to be appropriate to it; there is no touch or sensitive or intelligible impartation with it, neither is there any imagination able to ascend to it. That's why, the speakers-about-God reckon as closest to it, the most total nescience, by negations, which negate, through exceeding, all the existing or spoken realities[855]. Consequently, it is not allowed him who knows that truth that is above any truth, to call it either being, or nature, in a proper meaning. On the other hand, though, because that is the cause of all realities and all realities are around that and all realities are for that and that has all realities, un a borderless manner, within itself, from before, that must be called out of all realities, and not in a proper meaning, but in an improper meaning. So, that can be called as being and as nature. But in a proper meaning, it is called like that of-life-maker going-out and work of God. This is, according to the Great Dionysus, the theological meaning of the name being, as given to Him Who truly exists.

127. Somebody could find out the name as nature given also to the natural features, either regarding the created existences, or regarding God. Thus, he who was all-theologian among the two Gregorys, says somewhere in his poems: "This nature of my Master brings me happiness. This is because the giving is not necessarily one with the nature, but it is a feature of the Benefactor". One could say also about fire, that the fire

[852] Above God in sense of exceeding. For that is God, but it is above what we think and what we experience as being God. Likewise, it is above what we think and experience as good.

[853] It is above our knowledge by negation, namely it is about what we think that we think, by renouncing to knowledge.

[854] From the quoted work of Palamas (Hristou, p. 93). Dionysus the Areopagite, About the Godlike Names II: 27; G.P. III: 645 B.

[855] All the existing or spoken realities, they must be negated through exceeding, when we think at God. Namely, they must be denied, by reckoning God not below them, but above them.

has the natural tendency to go upwards and to enter the viewer. But – as it seems to me – that isn't the nature of the fire, as neither is that the crossing through. The fire's nature is the spring of the motion. Consequently, the natural realities are called as nature too. Also, the Great Dionysus says so, in another place, by writing that the nature of the good is to bring to existence and to save, meaning by that, that this is a naturel feature of the good. Consequently, when you hear the fathers calling the being of God an unimpartable, you will understand that being that doesn't go out of itself and it doesn't unveil itself. But when you hear again that the fathers call the being of God and impartable, you will understand that that is about the going-out and the showing and the work that belong to God in a natural manner. And so, by honoring both affirmations, you will confess in accordance with the fathers.

128. Even the smallest part of the being, it has all the being's powers, like the spark too is bright and luminous and it differentiate and it burns them who come close to it, and it moves itself by nature, it ascends upwards, and it has, simply saying, all the features had by fire whose particle that spark is. Also, the droplet has all the features had by the water whose droplet is. Likewise, the shard of metal has all the features had by the metal which that shard has been taken out of. Consequently, if we had been imparted with the non-unveiled being of God, we either would have been imparted with the whole Hid being, or we would have been imparted with a little bit of God's being, we would have been almighty; and each among existences would have been almighty. But this is not had either by all of us together, nor it that had by the entire creation. This being abundantly shown by Paul, he confesses that even they who are partakers to the deifying gifts of the Ghost, they won't receive all the Ghost's gifts together. "But to one is given, he says, word of wisdom, to another word of knowledge, to another, again, something else, into the same Ghost" (1 Cor. 12: 8). And the father with a Golden Mouth, by rejecting in advance the straying of the opposants from now, he says: "Somebody has not everything, so that you won't reckon that the grace is nature". But let nobody reckon, if he has mind, the grace like created, despite the grace being different from the godlike nature. But again, let nobody fear that, by not understanding through grace the nature of God, he would reckon the grace as creature. The grace of the Ghost isn't separated from the godlike nature, but the grace rather attracts them who are found worthy, to the union with the godlike Ghost[856].

129. The being has as many hypostases as the being is imparted with. This is for, as many candlesticks somebody light up from one candlestick, so many hypostases of the fire he will compose. So, if, according to our opposants, the being of God had let itself to be imparted, and even by everyone, it would mean that the being of God wouldn't have any longer been in Three Hypostases but in countless hypostases. But who doesn't know, amongst them who are nourished with the godlike dogmas, that this is the Messalians nonsense? This is because, according to Messalians, they who have reached the peak of the virtue, they are imparted with the being of God. Our opposants, by aspiring to surpass the blasphemy of the Messalians, they even argue that not only them who shine through virtues among people, but everyone is imparted with the godlike being. They argue that on the ground that the godlike nature is present everywhere. But Gregory the Great in theology, by toppling over the insane opinion of both those ones and these ones, he says: "Christ is called as such due to His godhead. This is for the godhead is the anointing of the humanity, and the godhead doesn't sanctify the humanity into Christ only through work, as into other anointed, but through the godhead entire presence of The One Who anoints". And the of-God-wise fathers, matching in thoughts to one another, they declared that Christ's godhead dwell within them who have been cleaned appropriately, but not according to the godhead's nature. Consequently, no one becomes partaker to God according to the being or according to some hypostasis. This is because, none of these is given towards impartation in any way, neither is any of them imparted, regardless how little, to anyone. That's why, through these, God isn't comprised into anybody and into anything, though He is, through them, present everywhere. But the common work and power of that nature in Three Hypostases, they are imparted in diverse manner and appropriately to them who are imparted with it. That's why it matches in, into them who are gifted with grace. This is for, the Holy Ghost – us to say alike to what Great Basil said – He doesn't impart Himself to the worthy one, in one measure, but He divides His work on the measure of eth faith. This is for, the Holy Ghost is simple in being but He is diverse in powers[857].

130. Being somebody imparted with something, it means being partaker to that which he is imparted with. And if he is not imparted with a part but with the whole, one can say, properly, that that one has that which he is imparted with; and not that that one is imparted with that. Therefore, the one who gives himself towards impartation, he will impart himself, if he who receives the impartation is imparted only with a part of the one who imparts himself. But the being of God is totally undividable, and therefore it is unimpartable. This is for the impartation is characteristic to the godlike work, it was said in many places, in his writings, by our father with a Golden Mouth. Consequently, the work is that which is given, towards impartation, to them who have been found worthy of the deifier grace. Listen, in this sense, again to the one who had a Golden Mouth, who teaches, as limpidly as possible, both aspects: that, on one hand, the work id that which is imparted undividedly, but not the unimpartable being, which the godlike works spring out of. This is for, by adding the evangelical word that "out of His fullness we all have taken" (Jn. 1: 16), he says: "if in the case of fire, where the one who is imparted, it is being and body, we both divide and do not divide the fire, all the more in the case of the work and even a work that comes out of the incorporeal being[858].

131. Being imparted with something according to the being, it necessarily means having in common the being of the one who gives himself to be imparted, and, in some regard, it means having the same being. But who has ever heard that our being and God's being are one, in a certain regard? This is especially for, Basile the Great says: "The works of God descend to us, but His being remains unapproachable"[859]. Therefore, it is impossible even to them who have been deified and even through the godlike grace, to be them imparted with the godlike being. But it is possible they to be imparted with the godlike work. And Gregory the speaker-about God, he says: "Tho this I am being led here, by the without-evening light of the truth, to see and to experience the shininess of God. And the shininess of our God is over us", according to the psalmist Prophet (Ps. 89: 17[860])[861]. "And one if the work of God and of the saints" as limpidly writes Maximos, who is counted among the saints[862]. And he even says that they are living images of Christ and they are rather one with Christ, by grace, than being only likenesses of His.

132. God is Himself into Himself, the Three godlike Hypostases having on Themselves and surrounding on Themselves and to One Another, in a natural manner, entirely, eternally, without going-out, but also in an unmixed and well-organized manner, so that They have also a sole work, and that cannot be found at any creature. This is because, at the creatures belonging to the same species, their work is of the same sort, but because each hypostasis works by himself, he also has his own work. But at the Three godlike and all-worshipped Hypostases it is not likewise. Truly, at Them, there is only one and the same work. This is for, one is the movement of the godlike will, starting from the beginner cause, that is the Father, and advancing through the Son, and being shown into the Holy Ghost. This can be seen in the results of that work. This is for, from here one can know the whole natural work of God. This is because, we do not see each Hypostasis, namely the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost, to have each one an own result of His work, like each swallow make its own nest, of the same kind, or like each page is written by another writer, though using the same letters. And the whole creation is a sole thing of the Three Ones[863]. And we have been taught by the [860] In KJB we have: Ps. 90: 17: "And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us: and establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it."; in ROB we have: Ps. 89: 19: "And may the light of our Lord God be upon us and straighten the things of our hands." [863] The work spring out of being, but the being is hypostatized in The Three Persons. So, These Persons work through the work of the same being, through Their common work. In each work that comes within us, the Three Persons some within us too. They elevate us, Thei better us up, and They gladden us up through that joy that They have in common. That's why Their work is always a work of the love, a work having in its this communion of the love. That's why, they who have a spiritual sensitiveness, they feel in these works, the Three Person, both as distinct and united. It is thus also in the case of the works of the individuals, work which are directed towards others. Even when they work in common, they still won't form a pluri-personal whole, but they will add their works together.

Holy Fathers, to understand from this creation, the fact that the work of the Three All-Worshipped Persons it is one and the same work, and not divided among the Three Persons.

133. The Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost are One into Another in a well-organized and unmixed manner, and from here we know that Their motion and work is one too. That's why, we know that the life or the power being had by the Father within Himself it isn't another from that of the Son Who is of the same life and power as That One too. Likewise, Both the Son and the Holy Ghost. And they who reckon that the godlike work isn't different, at all, from the godlike being, because our life is not Another but One and the Same God, and The Same is the life from before ages, and not for another, by within Himself, those ones are strayed in their faith and untaught. They are untaught, because of not having found out, yet, that the Supreme Trinity is not else but God Himself, but this isn't an impediment for the unity to differ from Trinity. And they are stray in their faith, because of abolishing one through another, both the work and the being. This is because, what it is for another, that won't be being. So, if those ones hadn't differed, at all, from another, then they would have been abolished one through another. Better said, I erase from the book of the worshippers of God, them who say that these ones do not differ at all.

134. But we confess that the Son of God is our life too, according to the cause and to the work, and we also say that He is the life through itself and in itself, not held by any connection and detached from all realities. And we say that He has both of these in an uncreated manner. Likewise, we say about the Father and about the Holy Ghost. So, let's say also that our life, which we are made alive through, and through a cause of the living realities, it is nothing else but the Father and the Son and the holy Ghost. This is for, our God in Three Hypostases, He is called as our life, according to the cause. And when the godlike life is thought not form the point of view of the cause, neither as being a live for another, but as outside some mandatory connection, and through itself, this one isn't but the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost[864]. So, these ones aren't an [864] The adversaries of Palamas didn't' discern between the godlike work and the godlike being, on the ground that God Himself is our life. So, there isn't at Him a life for Himself and a life for us. Palamas answers that the fact that God is the life for Himself, it isn't an impediment to them who believe, in their way of understanding that God is uncreated not only according to His being and according to His Hypostases, but also according to the godlike work of the Three Ones. This is for, we confess a sole God in Three Hypostases, having a sole being and a sole power and a sole work and all the others which are contemplated around the being. And Those Ones are called, according to the Scripture, also the totalness and the fulness of the godhead (Col. 2: 9), being them contemplated and cogitated alike, in Each One of the Three Holy Hypostases.

135. This is because, they who disregard this work, and here they say that it is created, and there they say that it doesn't differ at all from the godlike being, and then they contrive another straying by dogmatizing the Only Begotten Son as the only uncreated work of the Father. And by wanting to found this opinion, they bring as witness the words of the all-honored Cyril: "The life which the Father has in Himself it is not other than the Son, and the life from within the Son it isn't else but the Father. And this is proven true by Him Who says: "I am into the Father and the Father into Me" (Jn. 14: 11). But we are going to show, briefly, according to out power, the meaning of these words belonging to the saint and we are going to prove the straying of them who resist us out of a darkness which nothing can be distinguished within. The godlike Cyril opposes them who wrongly say that the Son isn't only alike the Father, but He is also according to the Father, because the Son has the life not according to the nature, but the Son gains the life through participation and as being added, as One Who has received His life form the Father, according to the written word: "As the Father has life into Himself, likewise he has given to the Son to have life in Himself" (Jn. 5: 16). Cyril opposes them who understand in a stray manner this place from the Gospel. This is for, God is called as life also according to His work, as One impediment Him to be the life to us too, and therefore there to be at Him a difference between His being and work, like the unity of God isn't an impediment there to be in Him a difference between unity and Trinity. Confounding the life of God for us and the life of God for Himself, it will mean that we are indispensable to Him. That would have meant that He isn't from ever, because we aren't from ever as well, or we would have been from ever as well, for He is from ever. The conclusion here, it would be the pantheism. So, there is a difference between God as life for Himself and as life for us. This is for, God is life for us by His quality as our cause. But to Himself, God is not a cause, as he is a cause to us. But the same God is the life to Himself and the life to us too.

Who gives life to the living realities (for He is the life of them who live according to the nature, as Builder of the nature, but also of them who live in a godlike manner, as Giver of the grace), but it is also called as life regarded in itself not for another, but in a totally undetached and untired mode, so, the godlike Cyril wants to show that the Son doesn't differ from the Father by any of these two, and if the Son received something from the Father, that won't mean that the Son is after the Father, neither that the Son is second to the Father, intime, according to the being. That's why, in addition to many other things, he also says that: "Therefore, the fact that he received something from the Father, it doesn't force the Son to be the second in time, according to the being". Cyril doesn't mean here the being, when speaking about the life which the Father has and which the Son receives.

136. The godlike Cyril then shows that, though the son of God is called as life relatedly to the living creatures, according to the work He makes those creatures alive, so that He is called as their life, but He is not alike to the Father neither by that, but He has, according to the nature, the fact of being their life and of making them alive as the Father too. That's why he writes further on: "If the Son hadn't been life according to the being, how could have been told the truth He Who says: "He who believes in Me, he has eternal life."? (Jn. 6: 46-47); and again: "My sheep listen to My voice and I will give them eternal life" (Jn. 10: 27-28). And after a little while: "He promises to give life them who believe, for the life in within Him by nature and the life dwells within him existentially". How could one continue thinking, that the Son has received the life from the Father, because of not having the life Himself? Therefore, let them be shamed, they who are stray, when hearing that God has the life by nature, and that this is His being. This is because, the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost, God doesn't give His being, as a gift, to us the believers. It is far from us to cogitate such a straying!

137. In the followings, the great Cyril opposes, nevertheless, them who cogitate the contrary things, by saying: "By coming the Son from the Father, He attracts all the aspects belonging to the Father by nature. And of the feature of the being of the Father, it is the life too". But by calling it as one of the features of the being of the Father, he limpidly showed that the features of That One are many. So, if this life had been the being of God, according to them who cogitate alike, God would have had many beings. But those suffer, in addition to their straying, also of a great nescience, because of saying that the existence and the feature are the same thing. And it is even a greater insanity the fact that the say that the existence and the features are one, and the many do not differ in anything. This is because, it is totally impossible and lacking of rationality, that something to be one and, in the same time, several.

138. So, the godlike Cyril, even only by saying that the life is one of the features of the Father, he showed that, by life, he didn't understand the being of God. But let's present, word by word, his sayings, which he said through, that there are many features of God. This is because, by continuing on this theme, he says that "many features are attributed to the Father, but the Son doesn't lack those either". How could these features of God, be also the godlike being? And wanting to mention some among these features of the Father, he brought Paul who says: "God is incorruptible, unseen, and the only One wise" (1 Tim. 1: 17). From here on can see even more, that none of the feature of God is His being. This is because, how could have been the incorruptibility, and the invisibility, and, simply, all the negative feature together, or each of them individually, to be God's being? None of these is God's being, for God's being isn't this or these. But the theologians, by placing on the same plan with these ones, also the affirmative features of God, they show that none of them shows the being of God, though, when necessary, we use all these names for indicating the God's being, once God's being is totally nameless.

139. Being about features, we necessarily ask ourselves: which one they belong to? If they belong to no one, then won't even be features. And if they had belonged to someone, but that one hadn't been the being, then the being wouldn't have differed from none of the features, but it would have belonged to each of them and to all the features. But the features by being many, that One being would have been many beings. And That One according to the being, would have been many, and so He would have had many beings. And if He had been one and he had had many beings, he would have necessarily been composed. So, the godlike Cyril, by elevating his listeners above these so stray opinions, he says in His Thesauruses: "If everything that God had been His being too, He would have been composed of many beings. This is because, there are many those which belong only to Him according to the nature and to none among creatures. The godlike Scriptures say about God that He is Emperor, Lord, incorruptible and unseen, and in addition to these, still countless others. If each one among His features had had a rank of being, how couldn't have been composed Him Who is simple? But to cogitate this, it is everything that can be more insane".

140. Cyril, who was wise into the godlike knowledge, he shows, in details, that though the Son is life according to work, and he says that the Son has life as One Who makes us alive and that He is the life of the living ones, the Son won't be different from the Father either in this regard, for the Father too He gives life. But Saint Cyril, by wanting to show, in addition to that, that though the Son is and He is said as has life not because of another, but in a totally undetached and untied manner, neither in this regard the Son will differ from the Father. This is for, when we do not call God as life, as One Who makes us alive, but totally undetached and untied, then we will call His being, by starting from the work that belong to Him by nature. Saint Cyril did the same regarding the wisdom, and the kindness, and all the other features. So, by wanting to show this, Cyril says: "This is for, when we say that the Father has life in Himself (Jn. 14: 11), we call the Son as life, and He is other than the Father only by hypostasis, but not also by life. That's why one doesn't cogitate any composition of doubling related to Him. And when we say, again, that the Son has life into Himself, by meaning the untied life, we call by that the Father. This is for, by being life not for another, but in an untied manner, in Himself, the Father and the Son are One into Another. This is for, the Son Himself said: "I am into the Father and the Father into Me" (Jn. 14: 10). By these, the godlike Cyril showed that that life out of the Father, namely the Son, isn't anything else but the Father Himself, and the same in all aspects with Him, not differing at all from Him. But the opposers falsely bring the words of Saint Cyril in their support, because they actually dogmatize the mistakes of Sabellius, by arguing that this life is The Only Begotten Son born out of the Father.

141. But bringing the godlike Cyril as witness against himself, while he actually writes against opposants, how won't bring them the greatest damnation? This is because, telling something now, and then telling something else, and then reckoning both things as true, it is characteristic to any rightly-worshipper theologian. But speaking things which are against himself, no one having a mind does that. Saint Cyril said first, rightly, that the Son has life according to the nature, and that life He gives to them who believe in Him, and Cyril showed by that not only the being of God, that is received by nobody, but also that work according to nature is called as His life, and that was received, according to grace, by them who were made alive by Him. And by that, they are saved also through Him, namely are made immortal according to the Ghost they who haven't been living before according to the Ghost. (This is for, they can be resurrected, they who reached being dead with a limb or with the whole body). If it is so, how will be able, thereafter, he who has presented these aspects so well and limpidly, to abolish this godlike work and to call, as life, the being of God? Only they who force the words of the saint can uphold such a thing, by gossiping him as ones who are mindless.

142. Not only the One Begotten Son of God, but also the Holy Ghost is called by saints as work and as power, but as One Who unchanged has these powers and works as the Father has them. This is for, God is called, according to the Great Dionysus, also as power, as One Who has had the power in Himself, from before, and Who surpasses the whole power. That's why, when One of These Two is called as power or work, he meant that They are in hypostasis. Also, Saint Basil the Great in everything, he says so: "The Holy Ghost is sanctifier power in being, in existence, and in hypostasis". But, by telling in his Treaty about the Holy Ghost that not all the works are in hypostasis, he obviously differentiated these ones from creatures too. This is because, the ones which are from the Holy Ghost as hypostatical, those are creatures. This is for, God created beings with features[865].

143. The negative theology doesn't oppose itself to the affirmative theology, neither it abolished the affirmative theology, but it shows the fact that the things said affirmatively about God are true and are piously said. But God doesn't have these ones as we do. For instance, God has the knowledge of [865] The work of God isn't hypostasis, but it is into hypostasis; it is not being, but it is into being; it is not subsistent by itself, but it is subsistent into being, or into hypostasis (ενούσιος, ενυπόστατος, ανύπαρκτος). But Basil the Great, by showing that not all the movements are into hypostasis, he showed that some of them are created. Or they are, by themselves, as creatures.

the ones who exist (of the creatures). We too have the knowledge of some of the creatures. But we have that knowledge as about existing and made creatures. But God knows them not as existing and made, for He knew them, and not less, also before they were made. Therefore, he who says about God that God doesn't know the existing realities as existing, he doesn't oppose him who says that God knows the existing realities and He knows them for they exist. There is too, in the affirmative theology, a meaning that is characteristic to the negative theology. For instance, when somebody says that the whole knowledge is directed towards a certain object, or towards a content to be known, but the knowledge of God is directed towards no object, he doesn't negate the first affirmation, for God doesn't know the existing things (the creatures) as existing, and God doesn't have the knowledge of the existing realities (of the creatures) as we have it. Thus, one can say about God also that God doesn't exist, but is senses of exceeding. And he who says that, he says it in order him to show that they who say that God is, they say that wrongly, it unveils himself as not using the negative theology in senses of exceeding, but in sense of absence, namely in the sense that God doesn't exist at all. Of this abundance of disbelief suffer also them who attempt, woe to them, through the negative theology, to show that God doesn't' have being and uncreated work[866]. But we receive both of them, with love, as ones which do not abolish one another, strengthening each of them through another, in the rightly-believer meaning.

[866] In the negative theology there is an affirmative meaning. For instance, when one says that God doesn't know the existing realties, that's is an affirmation. This is for, God know those, above what they are, He knows them in their origin and in their depth into Himself. But, also in the affirmative theology there is a negative meaning, or a meaning characteristic to the negative theology. This is for, when we say that God know the realities from within Himself, we say that He doesn't know them as existing realities, as we know them. Thus, His affirmative knowledge, by exceeding our knowledge, it has a meaning characteristic to the negative theology. Thus, one can say both that God doesn't exist and that God does exist, but in sense of exceeding the existence, as it is not proper to us. But he who uses the expression belonging to some fathers that God doesn't exist, in order to simply denying the existing of God, or as an argument against them who say that God exist, he exposes himself as not using the expression "God doesn't exist" in senses of exceeding. Of this disbelief are proven as suffering those too, who use the negation either of the being or of the work of God, or of both of them, not in sense of exceeding, but in order they to deny that God has being and uncreated work.

144. In order to topple over all the elucubrations of our opposants, and in order us to prove the width of their insanity, I reckon that is enough a short word form the fathers: “He is without beginning, he says, and He is beginning”, or: “There is a God together with the beginning and the beginning is not removed by the fact that He is the beginning of the non-beginning”[867]. This is for, it is not nature of This One the beginning, as neither to That One the non-beginning. This is for, these ones are around the nature, and they aren’t the nature itself. So, what’s next? Because the beginning and the non-beginning aren’t the nature itself, but they are around the nature, will somebody say that these ones are cut off? One would say that only if he has gone man. And if these ones are uncreated, by being features of the nature of God, does that mean that God is composed? By no means. But if the natural features of God had been His nature, then, together with other fathers, also the Great Cyril would have taught us that the Godhead is composed. But, you read the writings of Great Basil and those belonging to his brother who cogitated alike him, [867] These affirmation ca be referred to the Father. The Father is without-beginning and He is beginning (of the Son). Or: the Father doesn’t lose His feature as beginning by the fact that He has together with His feature as beginning also that feature as non-beginning. But all of these can refer to the Son too, or the Father and the Son together. The Father is beginning of the non-beginning, but, from another point of view, the Father wis without beginning. And the Son has the Father as His beginning but, despite all these, He is eternal, so that He is without beginning. Or, the Son is One God together with the beginning. But the words beginning and non-beginning are used with different meaning relatedly to the Son than to the Father. These features express relations between the Father and the Son, but these features do not express Their common nature. This is because, if that was the case, they won’t be applied differently to the Father and to the Son. Neither to the Father is His nature the fact of being a beginning to His Son, nor to the So is His nature the fact of being a beginning (into the Father). Their nature is something else than these ones which are hypostatical features. The term “non-beginning” used for the Son, it will express a feature of His being, but when used for the Father, it won’t express only a feature of His being, and that’s why neither the Son is without-beginning only in that sense related to the Father. This is because, if that had been the case, the Father wouldn’t have been different from the Son, So, even when we use the term “non-beginning” of One or for Another of Them, we still express some different nuances. That’s why, neither that term expresses the being, but it expresses a feature of the being, which subsists in two or, respectively, in three different Hypostases. But, in the creator and the providential relation with the world, the Father and the Son are only One God and Lord, only one beginning to the world, but without-beginning in Himself, a beginning in time and not outside the time, as the Father is of the Son, but in Himself without-beginning, through feature of their common being. But neither in this relation of Theirs with the world, there are not erased their features as Persons, or the reciprocal relation between the Father and the Son, without being confounded the two kinds of relation to one another. This shows again the fact that the relations and the features are multiple, and therefore they aren’t one with the being.

against Eunomius. This is for, by reading those writings, you will find out what they of one thought with Eunomius are like, our opposants, and there you will clearly see the proves against them.

145. The Eunomians reckon that the being of the Father and of the Son, it is not the same. This is because, by reckoning that everything one says about God he says that about God's being, they argue that, because between giving birth and being nor there is a difference, Their beings would be different too. And the opposants from nowadays, they argue that is not the Same God Who had both godlike being and godlike work. This is because, by reckoning that everything one says about God is about God's being, and by denying any difference between the godlike being and the godlike work, by that they reckon that there are many and diverse gods. But we have demonstrated to all of those, that not everything that one says about God it will be about God's being too, but is could be also about God's report with something else, namely with something that isn't about Himself. This is for the Son is not Father. And the Son is Lord relatedly to the serving creation. This is for God masters upon the realities from time and from ever and upon the ages themselves. And to master is an uncreated work of God, that differs from God's being, as one names in relation with something else, and that is not Himself[868].

146. The Eunomians say that everything one says about God is about God's being, intending to dogmatize that the fact of the non-birth is said about the being, and so, in their opinion, to lower the embodied Son – Who differs from the Father – on the level as creature. And they say that the reason for such a deed it is that not to be two gods, the first one unborn, while the second one born. By following to those ones, also the opposants from nowadays, they say that everything one says about God is about God's being, so that they lower, unfaithfully, the unseparated work on the level as creature, but differing from God's being, as one which is out of that one, but that is given to the creature towards impartation. (This is for all realities are imparted with the Providence that springs out of all-causing-godhead). And the reason for this deed, they say that is not to be there two godheads: the threefold hypostatical being, above name, above cause, and above impartation, and the work of God coming out of that one and that allows itself to be imparted and called. These ones cannot see that, as God and the Father is called as Father in report with His Son and He has the feature of being Father, in an uncreated manner, even if Father doesn't mean the being, so has God, in an uncreated manner, the work too, though the work differs from being. When we say only One Godhead, we say everything that God is, namely both His being and His work. Consequently, they are them who cut off, faithlessly, the One Godhead of God, in created and uncreated.

147. Accident is what occurs and disappears. Thus, we see also unseparated accidents. Accident is also what belong to somebody in a natural manner, for it grows up and it decreases. For instance, the knowledge into the rational soul. But within God, there is nothing of that kind, for God remains totally unchanged, so that nothing is reckon within Him as an accident. Despite all these, not everything that is said about God is said about God's being. This is because of saying also things in report with something else. These ones who the report with something else, but not the being. Similar is at God the godlike work too. So, the godlike work neither is the being, not it is accident, though it is called as accident by the theologians who shown only the fact that the work is into God, but it is not God's being.

148. We must also say that the godlike work, though being an accident, as they say, it is contemplated into God and it doesn't give birth to composition. This is taught to us also by Gregory called the Theologian, for he wrote about the Holy Ghost: "The Holy Ghost is either out of the self-standing realities, or out the realities contemplated in something else. Amongst these ones, the first ones are called as being by them who are knowers in these, and the second ones are called as accident. If there is accident, it will be the work of God. This is for, what else could be? Or Whose? This is for This One doesn't receive composition. So, he says openly that, if that is from among the ones contemplated into God and that's why isn't related to the being, but it is an accident, and He is called as Ghost, it couldn't be else but the work of God. This is for, he showed that by saying: "This is for, what else could that be, or shoe?". Preparing the readers in advance, in order they to understand that that isn't anything else, neither quality, nor quantity, neither something else from among those which can be contemplated into God, but they can only be contemplated into work, he adds: "This is for, This One doesn't receive composition". But what doesn't receive composition like, that work contemplated into God? This is for, only God alone has His work as consummately non-passive, by only working, but not by experiencing in it, neither becoming, nor changing Himself[869].

149. A little earlier, the Theologian presented this work also as uncreated. By not differentiating it and by not opposing it to the creature. For he says: "Amongst the wisemen from our time, some of them reckon the Ghost as creature, other as work, and other as God". He is calling here the hypostasis himself as God. And then he presents the work as opposed to the creature, he limpidly shown that the work isn't creature. And a little further on, he said about this work that that is the motion of God. How could not be the work of God, therefore, as uncreated? This is for, about that writes also Damascene, the bearer-of-God, in his chapter no. 59: "The work is, he says, the accomplisher and existential motion of the nature. The spring of the work is the nature, it is the nature where the work is. The accomplished thing is the work. And He Who works, is Him Who uses the work, of the hypostasis"[870].

150. The Theologian is saying here: "If there is work, it will be worked and it won't work, and immediately that has been worked (finished), he will stop it"[871]. The opposants understood and argued from here that the godlike work is created. This is because, they didn't know that also about the uncreated ones one can say that they are worked, as the Theologian shows somewhere else, by writing that: "If the Father is a name of a work, the worker of that work will be the One-Beingness". And Damascene, the bearer-of-God, he says: "Christ sat on the right hand of the Father, while working, in a godlike manner, the taking-care of everyone". But neither the fact of "being stopped" doesn't oppose the fact that the work to be uncreated. This is for, the creator work of God starts and comes to an end, as Moses says too, that "God rested of all His things which He started doing". But the creator work that God starts and ceases, it is a natural and uncreated work of God.

[869] The work of God isn't an accident in a proper sense, because of not having anything passive in it, namely the Ghost isn't forced at all, from outside, to do that work, as such neither the Ghost is forced in His work, nor is Himself composed with that element from outside. Consequently, by not bringing any foreign element into God, the Ghost's work doesn't bring composition into God, so that Ghost's work isn't an accident as such.

151. The godlike Damascene, after he said that the work is an accomplishing and existential motion of the nature, by wanting to show that about such a work spoke the Theologian, that that is works and stopped, he added: "It was necessary to be known that the work is a motion, and that the motion is more worked than it works, as Gregory the Theologian says in his Word about the Holy Ghost: "And if it is work, it will be obvious that it will be worked and that it won't work, and immediately after it will have been done, He wills top it". It is obvious, therefore, that they who cogitate the opposite things, by dogmatizing that the work which Gregory has been speaking here about, it is created, they insanely lower it on the creature's level, itself the natural and existential work of God, which, Saint Damascene, by showing it not only as worked by also as working, he showed it as uncreated. And the fact that, this affirmation doesn't differ from that belonging to him who bears the name Theologian, I showed that, in details, in my Words[872].

152. The hypostatical features are indicate into God as being in a report with one another, for the hypostases differ [871] So, through his word, Saint Gregory the Theologian shows that the work doesn't work by itself, but it has a subject. In the works of God within us, there is active God Himself as Person.

[872] The fact that the godlike work has as worker the hypostasis Himself, it doesn't mean that the work is passive. In the worked work it is shown Himself the Worker Subject. If the work had been passive, it would have been separated from its Subject. In reality, there cannot be operated a separation between the worker Subject and His work. And, just because of that, by declaring the work of the godlike subject as created, it will mean affirming by the godlike Subject as being created as well.

from One Another, but not according to Their Being. But sometimes God is called as being in report with the creation. This is because, one cannot call the All-Holy Trinity as Father too, as God is called as before ages, without beginning, great, and kind. This is because, not Each One among Hypostases, but only One is the Father out of Whom are and to Whom are related the Other Two. But in report with the creation, for the creation is a thing of All the Three Ones, a thing brought to existence out of nothing, and also for them who are made sons through the grace that is given, as a gift, in common by The Three Ones, the Trinity is called as Father too. For instance: "Your Lord God is One Lord" (Deut. 6: 4), or: "Our Father from heavens", these expressions show the Holy Trinity as One Lord and as One God or ours, and as Our Father Who gives us birth through His grace. But in report with the of-One-Being Son, only the Father is called as Father. And He is also called as beginning, in report with the Son and with the Ghost. But the Father is also called, in report with the begun creation, but as Master and as Creator of all realities. So, when the Father is called as beginning in report with eth Creation, then beginning is also the Son; but there aren't two beginnings (principles), but there is only one beginning. So, in sense as relation, the Son is also called as beginning (principle) in report with the creation, as he is also called as Master in report with the serving realities. Consequently, the Father and the Son with the Ghost, They are relatedly to Creation, as only One beginning (principle) and as only One Master, only One Creator, only One God and Father, only One Ruler, Supervisor, and all the others. This is because, that won't be say in report with something else, if that is His being[873].

[873] It seems that Saint Gregory Palamas reckoned that it belongs to Himself the Being of God to be towards something, but towards something God's Being's interpersonal interior. This is because, otherwise he wouldn't have been existed as Father and as Son and as the Holy Ghost. And on this structure of the Being of God, as being towards something in Himself the being of God, it is founded the fact that of being able to be also towards something that is outside the being of God (but this external something, it becomes, by the fact that God enters the relation with that something, to some extent, as interior to God), it is founded the fact of being able to create, namely of creating and of accomplishing a creature, by manifesting also the other form of His capacity to be "towards something". Otherwise, God would have remained locked up in some sort of pantheistic existence. So, the reality of the creature is the proving sign of the fact that God is Person, and without God being given that character by the creature itself. The fact of creating, it means that God is Person. The creature has its foundation in the Trinitarian character of God. That's why Saint Gregory Palamas says that, if

153. Positions, skills, places, and times, and everything similar to those, they are not said relatedly to God in a proper sense, but in a borrow sense (metaphorical). But to make and to work, it can be said, in the most real sense, only about God[874]. This is for, only God does them. And He doesn't become and He doesn't suffer relatedly to His Being. And He alone does each thing through all the other things. He alone created out of inexistence realities, by having His almighty work, which He is even called through, in report with the world, and He has the works in His power. But, if He wants, there could be added something to the creatures. Having the suffering and the need for receiving something, that is related to helplessness. But having the power of doing and of adding something to the creatures, when wanting, is characteristic to the godlike and all-keeping strength[875].

154. All the existing realities (the creatures) are recapitulated in ten categories: being, quality, quantity, towards what (relation), where (place), when (time) to make, to suffer, to have, and to lie (to stay). The last nine are contemplated into being (substance). Being so, God is being above-being, and only in Him is contemplated only the fact of existing and of making,

God hadn't been in Three Hypostases, God wouldn't have been either Creator or Master of all realities. By elevating up to the Being of God, His category as: "being towards something" (προς τι), Saint Gregory Palamas sees in the fact that right inside the divine being there is this "towards something", a supreme reason for the fact that nobody and nothing is for himself/itself, but for others. The divine being is nothing else from outside, except for the fact that He is Tri-Personal, that there is, forever, Another within Him. Due to this fact, also the creatures are one into another, but also for Somebody is above-creatures, namely due to Him Who, by creating them He accomplished them "towards something' of His, and He imprinted them too, through that, a "towards something" with Him. While God, by accomplishing His "towards something' only with the creatures, He accomplished that one in both possible ways, the creatures, by only accomplishing the "towards something" of theirs, also with that that is outside their circle, the creatures accomplish a perfect mode of theirs "towards something", and thus thy really overcome the prison of their circle.

What Saint Gregory Palamas has said here, it is the ultimate foundation of the relation among persons and between persons and any other reality right in the divine being.

[874] We must all the more recognize His work, to God, for only Him works by excellence while having nothing passive within Himself. God is actus purus. But this doesn't mean the absence of a subject or of some subjects who work, and of a fund which the work spring out from, into which there is given the capacity of the voluntary work. This is because, it there hadn't been a willing work, then it would have been a passive work, despite appearing as efficient.

[875] Properly said, to Him is reduced the whole work in creation. He makes each thing through all things. If the creatures can work, the creatures have that too, from God. If God had behaved as the One Who passively looks at any work, that would have been a sign of some helplessness within Him. If that had been the case, God wouldn't have been almighty.

which do not bring to God's being any composition of change. This is for, God does all things while not suffering anything according to His being. This is for, God is Creator towards the Creation and beginning (principle) and Master of the creation who he has given a beginning and which serves Him. And God is our Father too, by giving us birth anew, by grace. But He is also the Father towards the Son Who didn't start, at all, in time; and He is Son towards the Father; and the Ghost is the proceeded of the Father, together-eternal with the Father and with the Son, by being All Thre of Them of-the-same-being. And they who say that God is only being that has nothing to be contemplated within it, they deem God as not having either the power of creating and of working, nor the relation towards something. If, therefore, He Who they reckon as God, He doesn't have these ones, then that God won't be either work, or Maker, and he won't either have a work. And He won't either be beginning (origin), nor Creator and Master; neither He is our Father by grace. This is because, how could Him be all of these, once they are not contemplated into His Being and since He has not the power of making and of relating Himself to something? And even the Three Hypostases would have been abolished, if it hadn't been contemplated into the Being of the Holy Trinity the relation towards something. And if He hadn't been in Three Hypostases, He neither would have been Master or all, nor God[876]. So, they who cogitate like this, alike the opposants, they too are without God.

155. God has also that what is not a being. But because He is not a being, it won't mean that He is an accident. This is because, that what not only that doesn't disappear, but that what not even receives or suffers some growth or decrease, that cannot be counted among accidents. But if this isn't neither accident nor being, it won't mean that he is among those which do not exist at all, but he exists and even really. He is not an accident for He is totally unchangeable. But He is neither being, [876] Even God's real works shows God as existing in Hypostases, namely existing in a real manner, by the fact that He is towards something in His interior and towards something created. This is because, if God's Being hadn't had these ones, then His Being wouldn't have been towards something, His Being wouldn't have been working, so that God wouldn't have been a Subject (respectively, in Three) Who works and Who manifests Himself. Such a Being would have been non-hypostatical, namely unreal, or simply cogitated. Through works, namely by the fact that God is Person or Persons, God exists and we live God as something real.

because he is not among those who subsist by themselves. That's why He is called by some theologians as accident, only intending to show that he isn't being. So, what's next? If each among the hypostatical features and each among hypostases hadn't been either being or accident at God, would have been God inexistent? God forbid that! Likewise, the godlike work of God, isn't either being or accident, but it isn't inexistent because of that. And, I to say what all theologians reckon: If God does something by the fact that He wants that, but not only by the fact that He has a certain nature, it will differ to want from having a certain nature – and a godlike nature. So, what will we say? For the will at God is like so, the godlike will is something else than the nature of God and it is not being, and will there not be being, and will it not exit at all? By no means! But it is, and it is of God Who has not only a being, but He has will as well, according to which he makes, either somebody wants to call that as accident, as one that is not either being or accident, and as one that doesn't suffer composition or change. So, God has both what is being and what isn't being, even if one would call that accident, namely God has godlike work and will.

156. The being, if it hadn't had a work that differs form the being, the being would have been totally inconsistent and only as a contrivance of the cogitation. This is because, the man said sui generis, he doesn't cogitate, he doesn't believe, he doesn't see, he doesn't smell, he doesn't speak, he doesn't hear, he doesn't move, he doesn't breathe, he doesn't eat and, simply speaking, he doesn't have the work that is different from being and that isn't shown as in hypostasis. That's why, the man sui generis is totally inconsistent (inexistent). But the man who has a natural work that differ from his being, one or more works, or all the works we mentioned before, one can know out of those that the man is in hypostasis and not inconsistent. And for these works can be seen at more than one man, but at two, at three, or at many people, it will prove that the man is in countless hypostases.

157. According to our right-faith, namely the right-faith of the Church founded by the grace of God, God has a natural work which shows Himself and, by that, that works differs from His Being. This is for, He fore-knows and He takes care of the realities from below, He creates them, He upholds them, He masters them, and He transforms all of them according to His will, and that's a known fact. By this, it is shown that He is in Hypostasis, but not only non-hypostatical Being. And for all these works aren't contemplated in only one Hypostasis, but in Three Hypostases, God is known through these works as existing in Three Hypostases. The opposants, though, by saying that God hasn't a natural work showing Him, and by that being that work different from His Being, they actually say that God isn't in Hypostasis and so they deem the Lord Who is in Three Hypostases, as totally non-hypostatical (inconsistent). Thus, they overwhelm insomuch, into straying, on Sabellius the Libyan, as much as the disbelief surpasses in evilness, the right-faith[877].

158. The Three Godlike Hypostases, not only They have a resembling work, as it is in our case, but truly one according to the number too. This cannot be said by them who cogitate the opposite things. This is because, they say that the Three Hypostases do not have a common uncreated work, but they say that the Hypostases are consecutive works of One among Hypostases, so that, according to them, there is no common godlike work. So, neither they can thus, to say that the Three Hypostases have only one work, but, by abolishing, on at a time, other and other Hypostasis, one can see that they make as non-hypostatical, on God Who actually is in Three Hypostases[878].

159. They who have their souls ill because of this deceiving opinion, by calling as created that works that differs form the Being of God, they also reckon that the creator work of God, namely His creator power, it would be created. But no one can work and create without a work, as one cannot either exist

[877] If the work hadn't been different from Being, if the Being hadn't had a work differing from the Being, then the Being wouldn't have been either in Hypostases Who to give, through works, the sign of the real existence of the Being. Such a Being wouldn't have either existed in a real mode.

[878] If the Three Hypostases hadn't had a common work, but the Hypostases had been successive works of only One Hypostasis, by that the godlike Hypostases would have been abolished by and large, because of no longer being known a relation within the doghead (a "towards something"), and without that nothing can be proven as existing. If that had been the case, God would have become something inconsistent, or only thought, namely contrived. Each Hypostases must have a work, in order to manifest the real existence of the Being through work. But at God, this work must be common, for the Being is common too. Otherwise, the Hypostases would have been separated and the unity of Being, of God, it would have been abolished, or the Trinity of the Hypostases would have been abolished, so that the godlike Being would have remained as a simple abstraction.

without existence. So, as him who says that the existence of God is created, he cannot truly say that God exists in an uncreated manner, likewise he who calls the work of God as created, he cannot reckon that God can work and build in an uncreated manner.

160. Are and are called as creatures of God, by them who cogitate rightly-believing, not the work of God according to the nonsenses uttered by the opposants (woe, what faithlessness!), but the results of the godlike work. This is because, if the creatures had been the work, then the creatures would have been uncreated (oh, what insanity!), as ones existing from before being created, or if God hadn't had work before creatures (oh, what a stray belief!). But God being worker and almighty from ever, the creatures, whatever they would be called like, they are not the work of God, but they are the made things, or the results of the work. And the work of God is, according to some theologians, uncreated and together-eternal with God.

161. Not the work is known according to the Being, but the Being is known out of work. But it is a known fact that the Being is, but we do not know what the Being is. That's why we know about God that He exists not out of His Being, but out of His Providence. So, the work differs from Being and by that, namely by the fact that the work is the one making known, while the Being is what is known - as existing - through the work. But the defenders of the straying, by striving themselves to convince us that the godlike work doesn't differ at all from the godlike Being, they strive themselves, by abolishing that which God is known through, to persuade us that we do not know the fact that God exists, as they do not know it either. And he who doesn't know this, he will be the most-without-God and the most-without-mind.

162. When these ones say that God has work, but the work doesn't differ at all from the godlike being, they try to overshadow their straying and they try to bewilder and to alure their listeners, in a deceiving manner (sophistically). This is because, Sabellius the Libyan did the same, by saying that God-and-the-Father has Son too, but the Son doesn't differ at all from the Father. As, therefore, Sabellius was proven as affirming that the Father doesn't have a Son, because of denying the different according to hypostases between Them, likewise these ones, by saying that the godlike work doesn't differ at all from the godlike Being, they are proven now cogitating God as not having at all, a work. God doesn't have either "to make" or "to work". This is because, according to some theologians, somebody cannot work without a work, as, also according to those theologians, somebody cannot exist without existence. And the fact that the godlike work is different, in the opinion of them who think healthily, from the godlike Being, it is proven by that too. The work commits through work something that isn't the worker. This is for, God works and makes the creatures. But God is uncreated. And to relate to something, it always means to relate to something else. This is for, the Son is say in report with the Father. But the Father is never Son of the Father. So, like the relating to something cannot be but different from the Being, or it cannot be contemplated except into Being, but to be Being, likewise it is impossible the work not to differ from the Being, but to be Being, even though this is not pleasant to the opposants.

163. Basil the Great, when speaking in his syllogistic chapters, about God, he says that the work isn't either him who works, neither what he worked (made). So, the work isn't non-different from the Being. And the godlike Cyril at his turn, when speaking about God, he says that "to do" belongs to the work, and "to give birth" belongs to the nature. And the nature and the works aren't the same thing. At his turn, the bearer-of-God Damascene, he says that the birth is a thing belonging to the godlike nature, and the creation it is a thing belonging to the godlike will. In another place he also says, clearly: "Something else is the work and something else is the spring of the work; the work is the existential motion of the nature, while the spring of the work it is the nature which the work came out of". So, in many places, the godlike fathers say that the work is different from the godlike Being.

164. The godlike Being it totally without-name, because it is above-cogitation. But the godlike Being is called out of all His works, none of the names being different - when it is about the godlike Being - according to their meaning, from another name. This is for, through each of them and through all of them, it is not names anything else but that Hidden, and we do not know at all what that is. But referring to the works, each of these names has a different meaning. This is for, who doesn't know that to created, and to master, and to judge, and to take care of, and to be us adopted by God by His grace, all of these differ from one another? So, they who say that these godlike natural things are created, because of being different from one another and form the godlike Being, what do they else but lowering God on the level of the creature? This is because, the created realities, the mastered realities, the judged realities and, simply, all the ones like these, they are the creatures, and not the Creator, the Master, and the Judge, neither the creatures are the power of judging, and of mastering, and of creating, which are contemplated into God, in a natural manner.

165. The Being of God as it is, according to the bearers-of-God, totally without a name, for it is above-name, likewise is also impossible to be imparted, because it is, according to those, as above-impartation. But the opposants do not listen to the teaching of the Ghost, given through our fathers, as a gift, but they prefer to slander us, for we confess together withc the fathers, and the gossipers say that, if the godlike work differs from the godlike Being, and if there is everywhere contemplated something in the Being of God, then will be produced many gods, or The One God will become composed. They do not know that not the power "of working" and the work, but the feature of "suffering" and the suffering cause the decomposition. But God work while not suffering at all, and He neither changes Himself. Therefor, God isn't composed because of His work. In addition to that, God also has reference towards something else and towards creation, as The One Who is the Beginning (the Principle) and the Master of the creation. But, because of that, He is not counted together with the created realities. To say that there are several gods because God has work, even if the godlike Being and the godlike work belong to a unique God, or, better said, they belong to The Same God, it is truly a delusion of their insanity.

166. After our Lord said to His disciples: "There are some of those who stand here, who won't taste the death until their will see the Kingdom of God coming into power" (Mk. 9: 1), six days later, He took Peter and James and John, and they climbed the Mount Tabor, and He "shined to them like the sun and His vestments became white like the light" (Mt. 17: 1-2). This was because, they no longer were able to look at Him; better said, by not being they able to look at that light, they fell to the ground, on their faces (Mt. 17: 6). Still, according to the promise of our Savior, they saw the Kingdom of God, that godlike and mysterious light, called by Gregory and by Basile the Great, as godhead. The first one says: "The godhead shown, on the mountain, to the disciples, it is light and beauty of Him Who truly is powerful, and His intelligible and contemplated godhead"[879]. Basile the Great says: "That light is also beauty of God, a light contemplated only by saints into the power of the godlike Ghost"[880]. That's why he says again: "Peter and the sons of the thunder saw His beauty on the mountain, as overwhelming the shininess of the sun and they have been found worthy of seeing with their eyes the earnest of His presence"[881]. And Damascene, the speaker-about-God, together with John with a Golden Mouth, they called that light: the natural ray of the godhead. The first one writes: "Son born without beginning out of the Father, He has the without-beginning-natural-ray of the godhead, and the glory of the godhead become the glory of the body"[882]. And the Golden Speaker says: "The Lord showed Himself on the mountain shinier than Himself, the godhead showing His rays".

167. This godlike and mysterious light, the godhead and the Kingdom of God, the beauty and the shininess of the godlike nature, the vision and the joy of the saints into the endless age, the natural rays and glory of the godhead, all of these are called by the much-speaking heretics, as hallucination and creature, and they also call them who cannot endure to blaspheme this godlike light like they do, and who reckon that God is uncreated both according to His Being and according to His work, the heretics slander them as believing in two gods. But let the heretics be ashamed! This is for, despite being uncreated the godlike light too, One is our God in only one godhead. This is for, as it has been shown above, in details, also the uncreated being and the uncreated light, namely the godlike grace and its light, they belong to One God.

168. The stray heretics, therefor, by saying daringly at Synod that they reckon that as fantom and as creature, and by attempting to turn off the godlike light that shined out of our Savior on Tabor, and because they have been widely rejected, but they haven't accepted that, they have been submitted to a written anathema[883]. This is because they blaspheme the God's coming into body[884], and they insanely argue that the godhead of God is created, and so they say that the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost are creature. This is for the godhead of the Three One is one and the same. And if they say that they honor the uncreated godhead, it will be obvious that they argue the two godheads of God, one created and another uncreated. Thus, they aspire to surpass all the stray and ill-faithed ones, form yore.

169. On another occasion, by attempting to cover up their straying, they say that that light that shined on Tabor, it would be both uncreated and Being of God, and thus they blaspheme in many concerns. This is for, that light was seen by apostles, they wrongly cogitate in a stray manner, that one can see the Being of God. But let them hear him who says: “No one truly live, who saw or who described in words, the Being of the nature of God” (Jer. 23: 18). And not only among people but among angels too. Even the seraphs with six wings, they cover their faces with their wings before that light that comes out of there (Isa. 6: 2). So, once the supra-Being of God hasn’t ever been seen by anybody and ever, when the heretics say that that light is just that supra-Being, they confess that that light is also totally unseen and that neither the chieftains of the apostles were worthy of seeing it on the mountain, nor the Lord truly promised it them, neither tells the truth he who says: “I saw that light” (Jn. 1” 14). This is because, by being with Him in the mountain and taking vigil, “Peter and they who were together with him, they saw His glory”. And another says about John, the disciple especially beloved to Christ, that “he saw, on the mountain, itself the unveiled godhead of the Word”. So, they saw, they truly saw that uncreated and godlike light, God remaining unseen, according to His above-being hiding, even if the chieftains of the heresy and they who are of-one-thought with them will die.

170. But when somebody asks these heretics, who say that that light if the Being of the godhead: “Could one see, the Being of God?”, being forced, the heretics uncover their cunningness, by saying that that light is creature, for through it [884] Saint Gregory Palamas remarked on several occasions, that by denying the uncreated work of God into creatures, it implies in itself the denial of the embodiment. The Body of Christ would have remains, it that had been the case, beside His godhead, but not penetrated by his godhead.

the Being of God was seen. This is because “the Being of God can be seen through creatures”. Thus, they the wicked ones, they again transform in creature the light of the Transfiguration of the Lord. Besides, one cannot see the Being of the Lord through creatures, but one can see the creator work of God. So, in a stray manner, and in a voice with Eunomius, these ones say too, that the Being of God can be seen through creatures. Thus, the nonsense of their faithlessness, it has many sorts. Therefore, we must run away from them and from partaking with them, as from a corruptible-of-soul and with-many-faces hydra, and as from a of-many-faces crookedness of the right-faith.

“The lack of knowledge, concerning our history, it often makes the Westerners to ask the Romanians traveling there, very naïve questions. After the Romanians declare that they are Orthodox, those Occidentals conclude: «If you are Orthodox, you are Slaves, because you aren’t Greeks, and we know that the only existing Orthodoxy is Greek or Russians (l’Orthodoxie gréco-russe)». And when the Orthodox Romanians specify: «We are not Slaves, but Orthodox Latin», the Occidentals ask: «But what the Romanian Orthodoxy has given to the world, generally? There isn’t known any contribution of it to the Orthodox spirituality».

The Method, Or the One Hundred Heads, Of

Kallistos And Ignatius Xanthopol

INTRODUCTION

1. The Authors of the Writing and Its Connections with the Other Writings of Patriarch Kallistos

About Ignatius the second author of the present writing, it is not known anything, except what Simeon of Thessaloniki says: that he was from Constantinople, together with Kallistos, and he lived in ascesis together with this one, in the monastic life.

About the other author, Simeon of Thessaloniki writes, in addition, that he was also Patriarch of Constantinople. "He especially wrote about this (about the prayer of Jesus) in our days, into Ghost, as being them also into God, and speaking about God, and of God and of Christ bearers, and truly deified, the one amongst saints, our father Kallistos, who was also Patriarch from God, of the New-Roma Capital, and together thinker and ascetic, the Pious Ignatius. They presented in the book composed by them, in a spiritual manner, and in a highly elevated thinking, in a full number of one hundred heads, the full knowledge about this"[2].

On the basis of the affirmation of Saint Simeon of Thessaloniki, that, these authors wrote during his lifetime, being give the fact he dies in the year 1430, as Metropolitan of Thessaloniki (in that night the Turks occupied the city), it has been determined, rightly, that he doesn't speak about Kallistos I, who was Patriarch of Constantinople between the years 1350-1353 and 1355-1363, as Nicodemus the Hagiorite presupposes in the Preface to the present writhing, but about Kallistos II, who was Patriarch starting with the year 1397, for seven months[3].

About this Kallistos we know for sure that he was a monk in the Xanthopol Monastery from the Holy Mountain (Athos), one on the monastery neighboring the Pantocrator Monastery, but equally sure is that he also lived in the Xanthopol Monastery from Constantinople. The name of Xanthopol he probably has it due to the fact he lived in the monasteries which had this name, and not for the fact that he would have been born in the Xanthopol family from Constantinople, because, if this case, he would have been given by Simeon from Thessaloniki as blood brother with Ignatius, and this doesn't take place[4]. Xanthopol Monastery from Galata (Constantinople) was, perhaps, in a connection with the Xanthopol Monastery from the Holy Mountain[5]. In the year 1431 are mentioned, as living in the Xanthopol Monastery from Galata, about the Saint Xanthopols[6]. His birthday is celebrated by the Greek Church on 22th of November.

Under the name of Kallistos the Patriarch, in the Greek Philokalia, there are inserted two more writings: one entitled "About Prayer", in fourteen heads, and another alike, with the heads numbered in continuation, reaching eighty-three heads. The last one was not published in the first edition of the Greek Philokalia, but only in the second and in the third ones[7].

A. M. Ammann recognizes this as correct attributing. The Greek Philokalia, in the second and third editions, it calls the last writing like "Missing Heads" (from the first edition) and it numbers them starting from fifteen ahead. A. M. Ammann says that, in the second edition from Athens, the heads of the writing "About Prayer" have been added entirely[8]. But. It seems that the fourteen heads from the first writing represent the fragment of another writing belonging to Kallistos. At least so it turns out from the Romanian manuscript no. 500, from Văratec Monastery, written by the Abess Nazaria, in the year 1811, at the advice of the spiritual guide Iosif, comprising 186 sheets. In this manuscript, called "The Paradise", the heads do not start with the number fifteen (like in the Greek Philokalia), but with the number one, and it comprises, in total, eighty heads[9].

The most extensive writing "About Prayer" is published in the second edition, in volume no. II, p. 412-459; in the third edition, one can find it in the volume no. IV, p. 299-367.

Also in the Manuscript 500 from Văratec the writing "The Paradise" it is called "the third book" of Patriarch Kallistos. ON the other hand, in several Romanian manuscripts from the Library of the Romanian Academy, the writing entitled "The Method or the 100 Heads of Kallistos and Ignatius" it is given as having as author only on Patriarch Kallistos, or Kallistos Xanthopol[10]. And again, on the other hand, other manuscripts, from the mentioned library, give under the name of Kallistos and Ignatius Xanthopol also the writing entitled "The Paradise"[11].

From here one could deduce the fact that the writing "The Method" it belongs rather to Kallistos; maybe Ignatius would have given some help in collecting the quotes from the writing of the previous Fathers.

[10] Thus, the Manuscript no. 1922 comprises this hundred under the name of Kallistos Xanthopol, f. no. 3, r.-107 r. The Manuscript 1474 comprises several heads from the same hundred, also under the name of Saint Kallistos (f. 2 r.-23 v.; heads 35, 29). Then the entire hundred (f. 23 r.- 275 r.). In this library are, though also other manuscripts which attribute the "One Hundred Heads" to Kallistos and Ignatius (703, 1409, 1889, 2635, 2799, 2890, 3101, 3457, and 3546).

[11] The manuscripts 1981, 2890. Anyway, there is necessary a more thorough researching of all the manuscripts which comprise the writings of Kallistos (and Ignatius).

On this way, one could explain, maybe, the fact that the writing "The Paradise", it is given as the third book of Saint Kallistos. The first one would be "The Method", given in some manuscripts under the name of Kallistos and Ignatius Xanthopol, and the second one: "The 14 Heads about Prayer", which could have comprised also other heads given under diverse headlines in some manuscripts from the Library of the Romanian Academia[12].

Also, out of the fact that "The Method", is, in prevailing manner, a writing belonging to Kallistos (The First Book); that it would explain why this writhing it is also called, sometimes, as "Paradise", thought it is given under the name of Kallistos and Ignatius, and also, though the mane "Paradise" is given in the texts of other manuscripts only to the third writing, which is given as belonging only to Kallistos[13].

Anyway, in order to elucidate this matter, one needs to thoroughly search the Greek manuscripts from diverse libraries.

From the notes we have given until now, one can see how often the writings of Kallistos, translated in Romanian language, were copied; and we haven't mentioned but a small part of the Romanian manuscripts which comprise writings of Kallistos, dating from the end of the 18th Century and from the beginning of the 19th Century.

There is something more to be noticed, namely that, often, the writings of Patriarch Kallistos, including the one under the name of Kallistos and Ignatius, they are in the same manuscripts including the writings of Saint Gregory of Sinai. It seems that the writings of these two authors, together with "The Ladder" of John Climacus, were the most read by the Romanian monks.

[12] We mention here the manuscripts in which one can find heads of Kallistos, seemingly different from the 14 and from the 80 (or 83) "About Prayer" and from the 100 (of Kallistos and Ignatius); we also mention: "Way of Taking Heed and of Prayer" (Manuscripts of the Romanian Academy: 486, 1076, 3790, 3543, 179, 4716, 3547: Neamț Monastery: 29, 39, 44, 49). Then: Kallistos the Patriarch: "Heads about the Congregational Life" (Library of the Romanian Academy: 3548, f. 278 r.-295); The same, "For Obedience" (Library of the Romanian Academy: 3548, f. 278 r.-295 r.); Kallistos Xanthopol, "The Confession of the Sins" (Library of the Romanian Academy 2519, f. r.-7 r. 2647, f. 46 r.-59 r.).

[13] Like this it is called the writing of the "One Hundred Heads" of Kallistos and Ignatius Xanthopol, in the manuscripts no.: 24, 44, 73, from the library of Neamț Monastery, or in the manuscript no. 2890 from the Library of the Romanian Academy.

In the manuscript no. 1922, from the Library of the Romanian Academy, in which, after "The Hundred Heads of Kallistos Xanthopol" (f. 3-108), it follows the work of Gregory of Sinai (f. 108 r.-264 r.) with a "Foreword" of Saint Basil from Poiana Mărului (f. 108 r. – 118r.), and a part of the work of Peter Damascene (f. 265 r. – 283 r.), on the backside of the front cover it is written: "This Book it is called Philokalia, it is teacher for the mind's prayer and it has many ascetic teachings". The manuscript was, therefore, considered as comprising, essentially, everything a monk needs during his spiritual ascension.

But we reckon that also the internal motives plead that the identity of the author of the "Method of Kallistos and Ignatius" it the same of the other writings of Kallistos.

In order to see this, we give a brief summary of the content, of the "Method" known as belonging to Kallistos and Ignatius Xanthopol, and then of the other two writing of Patriarch Kallistos published in the present volume, with the similarities and with the differences amongst them.

2. The Content of the "Method" of Kallistos and Ignatius Xanthopol and Its Connection with the Content of the Other Two Writings of Kallistos

If all the writing comprised, in the Greek Philokalia, and almost all the spiritual writings of the Orthodox East, present in sentences, or in more continuous expositions, the diverse moments, states, or stairs, of the spiritual life, in a unsystematic manner, the "Method" of Kallistos and Ignatius, it wants to expose the entire ascension if this life in the form in which, actually, it is being fulfilled. In this concern, only "The Ladder" of Saint John Climacus, it resembles it; maybe, this one, it served as a model to it. It cannot be denied the fact that, the heads of this book do not always rigorously succeed, according to the stairs of the spiritual ascension. And this is because neither this ascension has a strict succession, required by our idea of systematic listing. During life, even during the spiritual one, there occur, in anticipation, and for shorter moments, states and stairs which will be fully mastered, within soul, only in higher phases; or, during the higher phases, for short moments, come back some: shadows, stages, and states; these might be reckoned, by the ones who have a more systematic approach, as already being definitively overcome. The authors of the present writing take into account in their exposition, with a certain liberty, this not so simple developing of the spiritual life. But, generally, in their writing, one can notice with enough clarity the ascending thread of this life.

Another characteristic of this writing is that, almost exclusively, it is composed of texts of the older Fathers. The authors give from themselves, in each chapter, only a few introductory words, and also a few for conclusion. But the texts from each chapter and from the whole writing, are so well chosen and placed, and listed in such a consistent manner, than each chapter, and all chapter together, are a well coagulated whole, and an organic ascension.

But, often, even amongst the quoted texts, there are personal observations, bringing in front deep meanings, maybe for the first time. And, a few themes from the final chapters, which are presented, almost exclusively, with words belonging to the authors, highlighting such surprisingly deep and new meanings. So, for instance, is the chapter 92, about the importance of the often impartation with the Body and the Blood of the Lord.

Especially accentuated and luminously described, it is the changing of the human nature, through deification, produced by the prayer of Jesus, accompanied by the warmth of the love for Him. The intimacy accomplished, between the human nature and the godlike work, it is described in terms capable to present the whole subtle reality of this unity. To be seen, in this sense, the chapter 90: “About faith, hope, and love”, where, amongst other things, it is said that: “The signs of the changing (produce by the warmth of the love of God) are: the man’s face becomes full of warmth, full of joy, the body become warm, the fear and the shyness are removed from that man, and he goes out of himself… He reckons the fearsome death as a joy”.

Another characteristic of the writing is, that in the whole his ascending thread of the spiritual life, it lets to be noticed the permanent and of prime rack presence, of the Prayer of Jesus. That’s why the authors speak repeatedly about this prayer, on very many occasions, on all the levels the spiritual life reaches at. But, because according to them, this prayer cannot be done as a formal method, making abstraction of the impediments posed by the diverse passions, imaginings, and memories, which tempt the man towards bodily pleasures, and tie him to the things and to the circumstances which can satisfy those passions, the authors (or the author) direct sometimes - after describing the way in which the prayer must be done – their attention to the methods through which the man can shun, can clean himself of passions, and he can develop, within himself, the virtues, or the impulses towards good, which lead to dispassion. The authors relate the dispassion, strongly, to love, to deification, and to the seeing of the godlike light.

Generally, the "quietude" the spiritual man must achieve, it is a dynamic process, though tranquil from another point of view; it is an increase in gentleness, in humbleness, but also in the happiness of the love, a continuous tension towards God, the supreme source of love, a tension which is not lacking the dramatic moments of the repentance for the thinner sins, which, the more the man has spiritually progressed, the more he notices them within himself, and this cause him a certain sadness. Ant the whole this ascension ends in "the resting" into the love of God, which neither is petrifaction, but a ceaseless enlargement of the human being, in order to receive and to irradiate this love.

Of course, this doesn't mean that the attention paid to Lord Jesus Christ passes on a secondary plan, as Ammann thinks. The ceaseless remembrance of the name of Jesus, with the fiery feeling of His live, of the sweetness of His presence, it is the essential power that carries the man, during the whole his ascension, towards the union with God, and toward his own consummation. This power stays at the basis of his entire effort of cleaning of the passions, of advancing towards dispassion, towards the increasingly deeper feeling of God, and towards the Union with Him in the Person Himself of the Lord Jesus Christ. If it is not encourage the imagining of Christ, with His shedding of blood wounds, as in the feminine Catholic mystique, it is because Christ, the One with Whom the spiritual man increases his ceaseless connection, is the Resurrected Christ, the One become transparent into light, the One Who is being felt, in the first place, as Subject – source of love, dwelled within man's heart, and not Christ of the memory, in state of crucifixion, a Christ Who is, actually, not really present, but rather only remembered. Christ from the spiritual writings of the East, he is really present and transparent within man's heart, a Christ Who, that's why, irradiates His power within the whole human being, but a power that if felt as being out of Him, as Subject full of endless love.

Ammann's reproach, from this point of view, it starts from not-understanding the Eastern spirituality, which doesn't remain to the sentimentalism sustained rather in memory and lacking the power to deify the man, this power irradiating only from the present Christ[14].

Of course, this is in connection with another considering of the savior essence of the work of Christ: in the teaching of the Fathers. Christ didn't save us by paying a juridical equivalence on the cross, for which we must be forever grateful to Him, as Ammann himself declares, but he saves us through the real and continuous connection we have, with the Resurrected Christ; of course, also for the fact He received the crucifixion.

And only for the fact that Christ is felt in His state -: resurrected, spiritualized, transparent, and irradiating power – the whole spiritual ascension leads the man towards a spiritualization resembling to His one, which prepares the full state of spiritualization and transparence into light or the spiritualized man, in the future life.

If the "One Hundred Heads" describe rather the restraints and the virtues of the one who wants to reach the union with God, and to see Him in the soul (we would call this the phase of cleaning, or the doing one), the 14 heads "About Prayer", which follow, they describe the higher stair of the prayer, and the 80 (or 83) heads of the writing entitled "The Paradise", or "About Paradise", they describe almost exclusively the spiritual peak of the union with God, to which has reached the one who strived himself to tend towards it. As Basil from Poiana Mărului will say later, it describes "the seeing prayer", unlike "the mind's prayer", product of the human effort. Of course that, also the last writing grants a great place to the prayer, for only the prayer introduces, in an unmediated manner, to the union with God, or to seeing Him. But it mainly occupies itself with "seeing God", which is above even to prayer. That's why, it equally occupies itself, or maybe even more, with the work of the Holy Ghost, for the state of culminant prayer and of supreme union being, actually, a state of total love, and it grants several chapters to describing the love for God. Thus, the themes of the third writing of Kallistos can be considered as being the following four: the prayer, the seeing of God, His love, and the work of the Holy Ghost.

But these themes occur, in a less accentuates measure, starting with the "One Hundred Heads of Kallistos and Ignatius". The affirmation that only into the Holy Ghost we can pray to Jesus Christ, it composes the chapters 12-13, and 50. About the need of the Holy Ghost, of the ones who want to ascend towards God, the authors speak in the chapter 6, and, in this chapter and in the chapter 4, they even affirm that the whole endeavor of the true life of the believer, it is to rediscover the grace of the Holy Ghost, received by him at Baptism, but covered later with passions. About the above mind seeing God, they speak in the chapter 70, and about love in the chapter 81.

Both writings were influenced, through the great role granted by the Holy Ghost and to love, by Saint Simeon the New Theologian's doctrine. The life of the hesychast unveils, in these writings, its face as life into the Holy Ghost.

One could say that the "One Hundred Heads of Kallistos and Ignatius" differ to each other not only by the fact that the first one described the ascension towards God, whilst the second one describes the peak of this ascension, but also by the fact that the first one gives a large foundation, in the writing of the anterior spiritual Fathers, of the state of union with God, described in the 80 (or 83) heads of the writing called "The Paradise".

But the two writings are preoccupied with the same spiritual peak, described by the first writing as a target to reach, and by the second writing as a reached target.

The kinship of the two writings is felt also out of some own and characteristic terms of both writings. For instance, the term "αεὶ βλυτα = always springing", which can be found in the "One Hundred Heads" (chapter 75), it can be also found in the 80 (or 83) heads of the writing "The Paradise" (chapters 22, 43). The preoccupation of the writing "The Paradise", with making the readers to gain the simplicity and the faceless state of the mind (ανείδεον, chapter 21) it is characteristic also to the "One Hundred Heads" (chapter 10). Also, in both writing is used the term "en-hypostatic grace" (Kallistos and Ignatius, chapter 70 – Patriarch Kallistos chapter 40).

This identity of terms and preoccupations could be illustrated widely through more detailed research of the two writings. It is felt within them the same atmosphere of thinking and style.

Anyway, in the writing "The Paradise" (80 or 83 heads) we have a serious theological deepening of the themes from the "One Hundred Heads". We have in it perseverant analyzes of the states live by the contemplative of by the seer (for instance in the chapter 16). But we also have in it interesting Christological and anthropological deepening (for example in the chapter 38). Here are described, in enthusiastic words, the states of the love for God, and the mode of the practical passing, from the diverse rationalities of the nature and of the Scripture, to the mysterious, personal Rationality, the One and Supreme. The writing comprises an admirable analysis of the "understanding feeling" and of the generated by it (chapter 41). The chapter 43 gives us a charming description of the love for God, which is the soul of the ceaseless prayer. In the chapters no. 47-48, we have interesting observations concerning the opening of the heart and the union between mind and heart. In the chapter 52 we have a remarkable philosophical argumentation of the faith as experiencing God. The expression "in en-hypostatic way" it is a parallel to the "en-hypostatic lighting" from the "One Hundred Heads" (chapter 60). Of course, it can be found also at Saint Gregory Palamas. But in the two present writings it receives a practical applying. The chapter 57, about knowing God, and about all the virtues related to this knowledge, is influenced by the doctrine of Saint Simeon the New Theologian. The chapters 65-73 comprise thoughts about the wonder of the union of God with the soul.

Of the Two Monks
Kallistos and Ignatius Xanthopol

A very detailed method and rule, which has the witnesses of the saints and it can be used, with the help of God, by the ones who choose to live in quietude and loneliness, or about their behavior and their living, and about all the good things caused by the appeasement, to the ones who strive with it, with right-judgment.

1. The present word is divided in 100 heads, and the introduction is considered as the first chapter, and it treats about the gift and the grace from above nature, dwelled through the Holy Ghost into believers[15].

It should have been necessary that us, the ones who according to the godlike words, who are taught by God (1 Thess. 4: 9) and bear inscribed into heart, in an untold manner, the new law (2 Cor. 3: 2-3), more luminous than a candlestick, and who are being governed by the good and wholly-right Ghost, as like sons and inheritors of God and together-inheritors with Christ (Rom. 8: 17), to live like the angels, and to not need to be taught by somebody, in order to know the Lord. But our distancing from the good, and our deviation towards evil, from the first raising of the hair and, together with this one, the envy of the dreadful Belial, and its relentless tyranny against us, have planted within us he impulse to get far, in the worst manner, from the savior and deifying commandments, and to let ourselves carried towards the soul-killer precipices; and what's even more pitiful, (it is the fact that) it stirred us up, in order to think and to work even against ourselves. Consequently, according to the godlike word, "there is nobody who understands, and there is nobody to seek God" (Ps. 13: 2)[16]. This [15] Actually, the chapter no. 1 doesn't treat about the grace. But the whole first section (chapters 1-14) treats about the grace and about the mode one can maintain the grace. In the manuscripts of the Library of the Romanian Academia, this writing is called: Craftsmanship and Guidebook.

[16] Psalm 14: 2: King James Bible (KJB): "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God. They are corrupt, they have done abominable works, there is none that doeth good."; 13: 2: Romanian Orthodox Bible (ROB): "Said, the fool, in his heart: "There is no God!" The people is because immediately we have deviated from the right path, he has become worthless (Ps. 13: 3)[17] and, that's why, we have become entirely bodies (Gen. 6: 3)[18]. And, by depriving ourselves of the lighting and godlike grace, we need to urge and to help each other towards the good things[19].

2. The present word has been written because of the question asked by a certain brother, according to the target he has been pursuing, but also for fulfilling a commandment of the Fathers.

Because, in your desire of researching, according to the word of the Lord (Jn. 5: 39), the godlike and life-giver Scriptures and to be introduced to them without danger, you have been asking often, us the unworthy, for a word and a written rule, for your use and maybe also of others, as you say, I reckon now that we have to fulfill, with the help of God, this worthy to be praised desire of yours, which we haven't wanted to do it before. We fulfill it now, our most beloved spiritual son, by leaving the laziness which accompanies us, for the sake of your love and of your use, being utterly amazed by your zeal for the good things and by your perseverant toil. But, before all these, we do it because we fear the punishment God menaced with, in a fearsome manner, the one who hid the talent (Matthew 25: 25).

Beside the said things, we are doing it to fulfill the commandment given us by our Fathers and spiritual teachers, by entrusting the things we learnt from them, to other loving of God men. So, God, Father of the love and the plentiful Giver of all the good things, to give us, the hesitant and the weak at voice ones, appropriate work into the opening of our mouth (Eph. 6: 19), He who often instilled word even to the speechless animals have become corrupt and they have made themselves ugly into their occupations. There is no one to do kindness, nobody to the last man."

[17] Psalm 14: 3: KJB: "They are all gone aside, they are all together become filthy: there is none that doeth good, no, not one."; ROB: "Everybody have deviated, together they have become worthless; there is not the one who does kindness, nobody to the last man."

[18] Gen. 6: 3: KJB: "And the Lord said, My spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh: yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years."; ROB: "But the Lord God said: "My Ghost won't remain always in these people, because they are only body. Therefore, their days will be one hundred and twenty years!"

[19] This reciprocal helping towards the good things comes in contradiction with the affirmation from before, that all of us have become evil. This is because the good we do, through this helping, it is limited. Besides this, the man, by helping another person, he exceeds in some measure the helplessness of being kind, which he lives when he opens himself in his loneliness.

(Num. 22: 28), for the use of the listeners. And to you and to all the ones who will read these, according to your saying, let Him give you ears to hear them with wisdom and understanding, and to live in a right manner, as it is pleasant to Him. "Because without Him we cannot do anything" of the useful and savior things, as it is written (Jn. 15: 5); and "If the Lord won't build the house, vainly will the builders toil" (Ps. 126[20]: 1). And about these things, we say only that much.

3. Knowing the purpose is precursory to everything. And the purpose of this work is to show which the foundation is.

If knowing the purpose is precursory to everything and our purpose is to tell the things which help to the spiritual growth, and yours is to truly live according to the said things, we must, before anything, to observe towards what fullness of that thinking according to Christ, looking us at, to lay down then, a useful beginning as foundation, that, then after, in time, being imparted with the help from above, abundantly, to tend also towards a roof, according to the building built by the Ghost.

4. The beginning of each according to God work, it is to live according to the commandments of the Savior. And the end is to turn back to the consummate grace of the Most Holy and of life beginner Ghost, given us through the godlike Baptism.

Therefore, the beginning of each work that is according to God, is, shortly speaking, to hurry us up in every way, with the whole our power, to live according to the law of the deifying commandments of the Savior. And the end is to turn us back, by keeping them, to the dowry given us from above, and from the beginning from the sanctified baptistery, namely to our consummate composition and spiritual rebirth, through grace; or, if you like to call this gift like this, to the rejection of the old Adam, with his deeds and lusts, and to put on the new and spiritual One (Col. 3: 9-10), and this is our Lord Jesus Christ[21].

[20] In KJB we have Psalm 127: 1. (English language translator's note (E. l. t.'s n.)).

[21] The "turning back" to our state from before sin isn't, thought, a turning back to a fix state; only with this condition one can accept what Ammann says, that there isn't any objective theological growth of the grace (quoted work, p. 25). That state is though the state of the new man, which is just by this, a living, dynamic state. It is the state in which is imprinted Christ, the state in which the man has taken the image of Christ, and that's why is the state of Christ as a new man, that restores the man to his true image. But Christ Who has been imprinted in the baptized one, He unveils Himself within him, bringing the man towards the measure of His

For the godlike Paul says: "My children, whom I give birth again into pains, until Christ will take image within you" (Gal. 4: 19); and: "How many of you into Christ have been baptized, you have put Christ on" (Gal. 3: 27).

5. What the grace is, and how can we achieve it? And what are the things which disturb it and the things which clean it up?

But what is the grace, and how we can achieve it, and which are things that disturb it and which are the things that clean it up, they will be shown to you by the one who shined with the soul and with the tongue more that the whole gold. He says: "What does it mean: "by reflecting, as a mirror, the glory of the Lord, we are being transformed in the same image" (2 Cor. 3: 18)? This was shown, more limpidly, when the gifts of the wonders were working. But neither is difficult now, to the one who has believer eyes, to see this. Because, immediately that we are baptized, the soul becomes more luminous than the sun, being cleaned up by through the Ghost. And, not only hat we look towards the glory of God, but we also receive brightness from it. This is for, like the silver being under the rays of the sun, it also sends rays, likewise the cleaned soul has reached brighter than the whole silver, and he receives a ray from the glory of the Ghost, in addition to the glory that is within him; and namely an appropriate one, from the Lord into the Ghost" (2 Cor. 3: 18)[22]. And, after a little while: "If you want, I am going to fullness, to "the measure of the consummate man". So, on one hand the gift of the Baptism, as dwelling of Christ, it doesn't bring the man beyond Christ, and in this sense it doesn't cross the man to another grace, but on the other hand there is a growth of the man into Christ, giving Christ the possibility to actualize Himself increasingly more, into the man. And without any doubt, this actualizing of the grace within man, it hasn't only a subjective character (Ammann, quoted work), but, within the man who increases his opening towards Christ, the grace is unveiled in an objective mode, namely it is inwardly communicated increasingly more, though, on the other hand, it is whole in him as reality, preponderantly virtual for the man, from Baptism. We have here the same situation as in the case of the Revelation, which doesn't cross beyond Christ, but out of which the Holy Ghost communicates continuously new powers and lights, namely "leads to the whole truth", but only out of Christ ("out of Mine he will take") and not from outside Christ.

[22] Saint John Climacus, Homily no. VII to the Second Epistle towards Corinthians, in G.P. 61, col. 449. Without any doubt that there cannot be separate the brightness of the cleaned up soul and the one that comes from the Holy Ghost, if only by standing under the light of the Ghost, the soul becomes also bright. And the brightness that comes to the soul from the Ghost, which makes also the soul shining, it is not a created grace, contrary to what Ammann affirms, namely that the authors of the writing "discern between the created gift of the grace and the show you this, even more clearly, at Apostles. Think at Paul, whose vestments did were doing miracles (Acts 19: 12), at Peter, whose shadow had so much power (Acts 5: 15). If these ones didn't wear the image of the Emperor, and if they rays of light wouldn't have been possible to look at, their vestments and shadows wouldn't have been working miracles[23]. This is because even the vestments of the emperor scare the thieves.

But, do you want to see this glory shining through the body? "Looking, he says, t the face of Stephen, they saw it like a face of angel" (Acts 6: 15). But this was nothing in comparison to the glory that was shining inside. This is for what Moses had on his face (Exod. 34: 30), that was worn by these ones in their souls. And even more. For what Moses had it was something felt, whilst this one was something bodiless. And like the colors which are fiery luminous, by gushing out of the shining bodies, towards the things which are neigh, they transmit also to these ones their light, likewise it happens to the believers. That's why, I reckon that the ones who suffer this, they detach themselves from earth and they think at the things from heavens. This is because it is good to bitterly sigh here, lets, by enjoying such a great honor, to no longer know the said things, because we have left so quickly those things and we have become addicted to the things of the senses. This is because this untold and fearsome glory remains inside us for a day or two, and then we quench it, by bringing the winter of the life's things and by impeding its rays through the thickness of the clouds"[24].

And he says again, in another place: "The bodies of the ones who have been pleasant to God will be dressed up in such a glory that cannot be seen by these eyes. Some signs and unclear trace of them, God deigned to give in the Old and in the New Testament. For there the Moses' face was shining with so much glory that was impossible to the eyes of the Israelites to grace Giver" (p. 23). How could the created shine in godlike manner, by receiving a created light? How could be known this light which is communicated to the soul, as one that is characteristic to the Lord, to the Ghost? How could the soul, in this case, to mirror the glory of Christ, which is not created?

[23] The image of Christ wasn't worn by Apostles, and neither is worn by the ones who stick with Him, only by imitating Him from distance, but through His working presence within them. It is obvious that this isn't a created grace.

[24] Saint John Chrysostom, Towards the Young Widow, in G.P. 48, 603. It is good to suffer here the harsh things, lest, by rejoicing of the heavenly things, to no longer take care and to fall into the earthy things.

look at it (Exod. 34: 30), and in the New Testament, the face of Jesus was shining much more than that one" (Matthew 17: 2).

Have you heard the words of the Ghost? Have you understood the power of the mystery? Have you known which are the pains of the consummate birth out of the holy baptistery, which is done within us[25], and how great are the fruits and the fullness and the rewarding? Have you known how much it depends also on us to increase and to diminish the grace, or to show it or to darken this gift from above nature, as much as it is possible to us?[26] And the things which darken it, are the storm of the life's things and the darkness which is born out of passions, which, by rushing upon us as a winter, or like a torrent, and by covering our soul, they don't let the soul even to breath, or to look at the really existing and happy good, for which the soul has been made, but they darken the soul and drown it, once the soul is wholly taken into mastery by the tormenting unrest of the swirl and of the pleasures. And to the things contrary to this one, namely to the things which are born out of the deifying commandments, are partakers the ones who do not walk according to the body, but according to the Ghost. "Walk, he says, into the Ghost and you won't fulfill the body's lusts" (Gal. 5: 16). These things are useful and savior and they lead, as a ladder, towards the top and towards the highest stair, namely towards love, Who is God (1 Jn. 4: 8).

6. In the Holy Baptism we receive the godlike grace as a present; but, by covering it through passions, we have to clean it up again, by fulfilling the commandments[27].

[25] Our rebirth is done, in the same time, also inside us, for we are killed so that to not take place, in the same time, within us, and to not feel, also us, the pains of this birth that happen within us. This is for the death of the old man and the birth of the new one within us, are don through the participation of our will. That's why, at Baptism, we are also asked to reject satan and to unite with Christ.

[26] So, one can speak also about an increase of the grace received by us at Baptism, through our efforts, contrary to what Ammann says (quoted work, p. 25).

[27] The grace of the Baptism it can never be lost; it is only being covered. Once entered the relation with Christ, the man never gets totally out of it. He cannot erase its memory, no matter how hard he would try. One can say that the trace of God is no longer erased from him, as also it cannot be erased either the trace of any other person we ever entered in relation with. This shows the personal character both of God and of man. The man isn't only a chemical substance, which can be totally transformed by new assimilations, and neither God is such an essence. The Catholic theology knows only the persistence of a "character indelebilis" in the one who has fall, after Baptism, in deadly sins, or in the apostatized one. But what this seal is, if not the grace itself, or if it isn't in a relation with the grace?

We receive, so, in the godlike bosom, namely in the holy baptistery, as a gift, the totally consummate godlike grace. But, if, later, by wrongly using the temporary things and by taking care of the life's things and through the mist of the passions, we are covering the grace, inappropriately; but it is possible to us, through repentance, and by fulfilling the deifying commandments, to receive and to achieve again this brightness from above nature, and to see, the most limpidly, its showing. Of course, its appearance it is unveiled to each one, on the measure of his toiling into faith; but, before all, through the help and benevolence of our Lord Jesus Christ. For, says Saint Mark: "Christ, being consummate God, He has given to the baptized ones, the consummate grace of the Holy Ghost. For the grace doesn't receive anything in addition, from us. But the grace is unveiled to us and is shown to us on the measure we work the commandments and is given to us in addition to our faith, "until we will reach, all of us, to the unity of the faith, at the age of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. 4: 13). So, no matter what we would bring Him, once we are born into Him, it is from Him, and out of Him and it has been hidden into Him"[28].

7. The one who lives according to God, he must fulfill all the commandments. But the most part of his work, he must dedicate it to the first ones and to the most comprising ones.

As I said, the beginning and the root of the whole this work, it is the living according to the savior commandments; and its target and fruits are the turning back to the consummate grace of the Ghost, given to us for the first time through Baptism. This grace is within us – "for God is not sorrow for His gifts" (Rom. 11: 29) – but this grace is drowned in passions, but it can be unveiled by working the commandments. That's why, we owe to force ourselves on all ways, to clean up and to make as obvious as possible, the showing of the Ghost within us, by fulfilling, according to our capacity, all these commandments. This is for "torch is to my feet Your law and light to my paths"- says the blessed David towards God (Ps. 118[29]: 105) – and "the bright commandment of the Lord (is that) which lightens the eyes" (Ps. 18: 9), and "… towards all Your commandments I have been directing myself" (Psalm 118: 9). And the one who was resting on His chest (Saint Apostle John) says: "The one who keeps His commandments, he remains into Him, and He in to that one" (1 Jn. 3: 24), and "His commandments aren't heavy" (1 Jn. 5: 3). The Savior says, also: "The one who has My commandment and keeps them, that one is the one who loves Me; and the one who loves Me I will love him also and I will show Myself to him" (Jn. 14: 21), and "If somebody loves Me, he will keep My word and My Father will love him and We will come to him and We will make a dwelling place in him"(Jn. 14: 23), and "The one who doesn't love Me, My words he doesn't keep"(Jn. 14: 24).

[28] Saint Mark the Ascetic, About Baptism, in G.P. 65, 1028 C; The Romanian Philokalia, vol. I, p. 309. So it is reconciled the persistence of the same Christ within us with the dynamic of the Christian life. The grace given at Baptism is Christ, whole. In this sense, it is not given to the man, during his life, a plus of grace. But, for Christ unveils within man, increasingly more, through the Holy Ghost, His light and power, it takes place within man an increase or a growth of the light and of the power of Christ, and, in the same time, a spiritual growth of the man. We add from us increasingly more faith, but not a plus of grace.

But more than to these ones, the most part of his work, he must dedicate it to the first and the most comprising commandments, which are somehow the mothers of all the other commandments. Because, only in this way we will advance without mistake towards the target that stays before us, namely we will set a good beginning and we will reach the desired end or to the showing of the Ghost (1 Cor. 12: 7)[30].

8. The beginning of every work that loves God, it is the calling with faith the name of our Lord Jesus Christ and, together with it, there come the peace and the love which spring out of it.

The beginning of every work which loves God, it is the calling with faith of the Savior name of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is for Himself said: "Without Me you cannot do anything" (Jn. 15: 5)[31]. And together with it there is the peace – for it is due, he says, that each one "to pray himself without anger and [29] In order to avoid confusion for the English reader, please remember that between the King James Bible and the Romanian Orthodox Bible, concerning the numbering of the Psalms, the Psalm 11 from KJB corresponds to the Psalm 10 from ROB. Also, ROB contains the uncanonical Psalm 151. Also, please also keep in mind, when reading quotations from the Holy Scriptures, that, usually, the writers making those quotations, they rather paraphrase.

[30] The showing of the Ghost means the transparency of the man and the showing of the Ghost through deeds of power, which overwhelm the evilness and the egotism; it is a transparency of the inward kindness, which looks like a light on the face and through the whole living of the man.

[31] This means that, by calling the name of Jesus, it is imparted to us His power itself. This is for through the calling of the name of Jesus, we address Him with love and he answers this love.

without thoughts" (1 Tim. 2: 8) – and the love, for "God is love and the one who remains into love, into God, God also remains into him" (1 Jn. 4: 16). But the love and the peace, they not only that make the prayer well-received, but they are also born out from prayer as some twin rays, and they grow up out of it and they are made consummate by it[32].

9. Through each of these ones and through all three together, we are given, plentifully, the fullness of the good things.

Through these ones, better said through all three together, we are given, plentifully, and we have it abundantly, the fullness of the good things. Actually, we hope that, by calling, with faith, the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, we will surely receive the mercy and the true life, hidden into Him (Col. 3: 3). This is for the name of Lord Jesus Christ, shouted out with cleanness into the heart, it is like an inexhaustible godlike spring, out of which are gushing up, plentifully, those good things[33].

And through the peace that exceeds the whole mind and it doesn't have any border (Phil. 4: 7; Isa. 9: 7), we are being found worthy of the reconcilement with God, and amongst us. Finally, through love, whose glory is unmatched, and which is the end and the fullness of the Law and of the Prophets (Mt. 22: 39) – for God Himself is called love – (1 Jn. 4: 8) – we are wholly united with God, being abolished the sin from within us, by the righteousness of God, and through the feature of being us sons according to the grace, worked within us, in a wonderful manner, through love. This is for "the love, he says, covers a multitude of sins (1 Pet. 4: 8); and: "Love covers all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things; love never falls" (1 Cor. 13: 7-8

[32] The often calling of the name of Jesus is the beginning and the source of all virtues. But the first virtues amongst these are: the peace and the love; of course, not from the beginning, in a consummate degree. They are separated and tightly interwoven with the calling of the name of Jesus, and therefore also with His power. This is for the calling of this name it produces by itself the peace of any worry, of any fear, of any anger, a restraint from these ones and a forgetfulness about them. But, in the same time, who calls the name of Jesus, he does it with love and with trust in Him. Of course, the love is also the highest virtues, and one can reach it through all the other virtues. But, if there wouldn't be in all the virtues, from the beginning, a certain love towards Jesus, one couldn't reach the consummate love for Him.

10. Our Lord Jesus Christ, at the time of the savior suffering, He left these things to His disciples, like some testamentary commandments, and like a godlike inheritance; likewise, after Resurrection.

That's why, the most Good and the Most Sweet our Lord Jesus Christ left these, as a true and loving Parent, to all His disciples, like some testamentary commandments and comforting, like some supporting, sweet, and strengthening[34] guarantees, or, better said, as an impossible to steal inheritance, given us by God, both when he reached His suffering and when He showed Himself to the Apostles after Resurrection; and, also when He was to return back to His Father by nature, and our Father, by grace.

He did this by telling the disciples when He was neigh to His suffering: "Everything you will ask for, in My name, it will be given to you. Until now, you haven't asked for anything in MY name; ask, and you will receive, for your joy to be full". And: "In that day you will ask in My name" (Jn. 16: 23-26).

And again, after Resurrection he said: "To the ones who believe, these signs will follow them: in My name they will cast devils out, and in tongues they will speak" (Mk. 16: 17-18), and the others. Things like these are also said by the disciple who was resting himself on the chest of Jesus: "Also many other signs Jesus did before His disciples, things which are not written in this book. And these ones have been written for you to believe that Jesus is Christ the Son of God and, by believing, "you to have life in My name"" (Jn. 20: 30-31). And the godlike Apostle Paul says: "Into the name of Jesus, let every knee to bow down" (Phil. 2: 10), and the followings. But also in the Acts, it is written: "Then Peter, being full of Holy Ghost, spoke: "that all of you, and the entire Israel, may know, that through the name of Jesus of Nazareth Whom you have crucified, and Whom God rose from dead, This One is staying before you, healthy" (Acts 4: 8-10); and a lithe further: "And the salvation is within no other. This is because there is no other name given amongst people, in which all of us are to be saved" (Acts 4: 12).

And the Savior said: "It has given Me the whole power in heavens and on earth" (Mt. 28: 18).And he told this also through [34] The Lord, by giving us the urge of calling His name, he has ensured us the peace and the love. But he has promised those in addition, both as commandments and as strengthening gifts. The gifts don't become characteristic to us if we do not work it out.

what He said as God-Man, to the Apostles, before crucifixion: "I let peace to you, My peace I am giving to you" (Jn. 14: 27); and: "I am speaking these things, for you may have peace into Me" (Jn. 16: 33); and: "This is My commandment, that you to love each other" (Jn. 13: 35); and: "like My father loved Me, I loved you too. Remain into My love. I you keep My commandments, you will remain into My love, like I kept the commandments of My Father and I remain into His love" (Jn. 15: 9-11).

And again, after His resurrection from dead, our Lord Jesus Christ, showed Himself on different occasions, to His disciples, giving them His peace and saying: "Peace to you" (Jn. 20: 19). And to Peter, whom He entrusted the leadership of the disciples, showing that the care for the flock is some kind of reward for his fiery love towards Lord Jesus Christ[35], He tells him, for the third time: "If you love me, Peter, more than others, feed My sheep" (Jn. 21: 15)[36].

16. The one who really wants to live in quietude and according to God, he must take care of being, besides faith, full of good deeds. And the faith is twofold. And besides this, the one who appeases himself, he must be peaceful, not-scattered, careless, not worried, quiet, serene, and thankful in everything, conscience about his helplessness; he must manly endure the trials, to trust God, and to wait from Him what is useful.

a). The Lord says: "Not everyone who calls Me "Lord, Lord", will enter the Kingdom of Heavens, but the one who does the will of My Father Who is in heavens" (Mt. 7: 8). Therefore, also you, my beloved, if you love, not with empty words, the deifying quietude – which gives, since now, to the ones who leant it with cleanness, the possibility to receive the showings of the Kingdom of God, which shine from far away, and in the future age more fully and more consummate – but you truly love it also with the work, make sure that, besides the right-worshiping faith, to be you also full of good deeds. Besides that, be you in peace with everybody, as much as it concerns you, not-

[35] If isn't an interpolation what it is said here, it is not a primate of jurisdiction, but one of love. It is, though, strictly personal of Peter. Or, in any case, when the one who shepherds, he no longer loves his flock, namely its faith, he neither has, for any longer, its leadership, for he no longer has the love.

scattered, careless or fully not worried, quiet, tranquil, thankful in everything, conscious about your helplessness, and, over all, keep your eyes not-sleeping and awake towards the diverse and of many sorts temptations, which happen to you every day; fight, with patience and with long-sufferance, every storm and every trouble which come upon you in every way.

About the first and the second things, namely about the need that, besides faith, to adorn yourself with good deeds, let be teacher to you, the glorified brother of the Lord, who says: "The faith without deeds is dead, as also the deeds without faith" (Jas. 2: 26, 18). And before this one, the adviser of everybody, our Lord Jesus Christ, Who says towards disciples: "Going, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them how to keep everything that I have commanded to you" (Mt. 28: 18-20). The speaker of the Lord, he says also: "God asks from every man who has the Baptism, these three things: the right faith from the soul, the temperance from the body, and the truth from the tongue"[37].

b). The faith is twofold. – Keep in mind that the faith, according to the words taught by God, it is twofold. One is, generally, the one of the Orthodox Christians, and other is of the few ones, who, by fulfilling all the deifying commandments, they have come back to image and likeness and, thus, they have been enriched with the godlike light of the grace, and they have leaned all their trust on the Lord (Ps. 72: 27)[38]. And this is in such a measure that – oh wonder! –, according to the word of God, they no longer discern anything (they no longer have any doubt) during the prayer, in the requests they direct towards God, but the ask only for faith, and that's why they immediately receive the things useful to them. Thus, these blessed ones, they have achieved, out of sincere deeds, the sure faith, as ones who have cast away from themselves the whole knowledge, the discernment, the doubt, and the care, and they baptized themselves (they sank themselves), totally, in the godlike drunkenness of the faith, of the hope, and of the love towards God, and they have been changed with the higher and blessed change of the right hand of the Most High, according to David the Prophet (Ps. 76: 10).

[37] I think that is about Saint Gregory of Nazianzus.

[38] The continuous fulfilling of the commandments, or the strengthening into virtues, they deify the man, for they unite him with God, increasingly more, they put him in increasingly stronger communication with Him. Such a man has a sight (a feeling) of the grace as light. This is because the grace, as opening of God towards the man who has also opened himself to God, it is, in the same time, light in his quality of manifestation of the love of God, being given the fact that any opening of a person towards another it is shown as light. The bigger if the goodness that opens, or, the more sincere and the more total the opening itself is, the most his light is also more powerful. The light of the All-Good God it overwhelms the poor light of the man, or it fills him up with a deep and persistent light. In this way, the deeds sourced by the faith without sight, from the beginning, lead to a seeing faith. They are born out of faith and lead to a superior faith.

About the first faith, it is not now appropriate to speak in detail. But it is very appropriate to speak about the second one. It occurs and it is achieved like some sort of fruit, from the first one. This is because the faith is like a root and like a beginning of the deifying quietude. "If you do not believe, says Saint John Climacus, how will you appease yourself?"[39]. That's why, says David the Prophet: "I believed, that's why I spoke" (Ps. 115: 1). And the Great Apostle Paul says: "The faith is the foundation of the hoped things, the proof of the unseen things" (Heb. 11: 1), and: "The righteous will be alive due to his faith" (Rom. 1: 17), and so on. The Savior Himself says towards the disciples who ask Him to increase their faith: "If you had so much faith as a grain of mustard, you would say to this fig tree: Pull your root out and plant yourself into the sea, and it would listen to you. And, if you had faith and you didn't discern (you didn't doubt yourselves), not only with the fig tree, it would do this, but even if you would tell this mountain: Get up and throw yourself into the sea, it would be done. And everything you would ask for, in prayer, by believing, you would receive" (Mt. 21: 22), and so on, and then: "You faith has saved you" (Mt. 9: 22).

But the Pious Isaac writes also: "The faith is thinner than the knowledge, as also the knowledge is thinner than the knowledge of the things which fall under the senses[40]. This is for [39] The Ladder XXXVII; G.P. 88, 1113B. The strong faith gives steadfastness and a soothing of the worries which torment the man. The more does this the faith generated by the experience of the union with God, the source of the whole power and of the not-chipped life.

[40] Perceiving the sensitive things it is characteristic to anybody, even to animals. The knowledge of some rational principles is subtler, for it implies a power of abstraction from the sensitive things and from their multitude. But the faith is more subtle even than this knowledge, for it notices the indefinite, which is the form of the highest reality or of the person. Who can define somebody's person, endless in his always new manifestations? The person cannot be comprised in exact definitions of the rational knowledge. All the more, who can define the experience and the work of the Supreme Person of God? The faith is the way of noticing the subtlest realities, being, itself, the subtlest way of knowing. For the person of the

all the saints, being found worthy to find out this state, which is the love of God, they live, out of the power of their faith, in the delectation of that about nature living. And we call faith, not the one through which somebody believes in the difference of the most extolled and godlike Hypostases, and in the Most High and Unique Being of the Godhead, and then into the wonderful embodiment into humanity, and in receiving our nature – even though this is also very high -, but that faith that arises into the soul, out of the light of the grace, having the witness of the mind and supporting the heart, in order to overcome any doubt, out of the surety of the trust, which shuns it from any deceit. This is the faith that doesn't shows itself in giving the hear to the ears, but in the spiritual eyes which see the mysteries hidden into the soul, and the godlike richness hidden to the eyes of the body's sons, and unveiled into the Ghost to the ones who feast at the table of Christ, by walking in His laws, as Himself said: "If you keep My commandments, I will send you the Comforter, the Ghost of the truth, Who cannot be received by the world; and That One will teach you the whole truth", etc. (Jn. 14: 17; 16: 13); and again: "Until That One will come, Who is the consummation of the mysteries, and we will find worthy, in a shown manner, of their unveiling, the faith celebrated, amongst God and saints, untold mysteries. May us be found worthy of them, through the grace of Christ Himself, now like of an earnest, and there in the hypostasis (the foundation) of the truth, in the Kingdom of Heavens, together with the ones who love Him"[41].

c) You must be peaceful. And for the third thing, namely for the need to be at peace with everybody, let it be a clear urge other one unveils himself only to the faith, because it doesn't want to be, otherwise, and cannot be, reduce to an object.

[41] Isaac the Syrian, τα ευροεθέντα ασχητιχά, editor Nicephorus the Hieromonk, Athens, 1895, chapter 65, p. 261-262. The second faith, which is higher, it is a seeing into the Ghost, of the richness of the kindness of God, it comes in the souls of the ones who have fulfilled His commandments and, by putting themselves in connection of love with Him, they have thinned the sight of the spiritual eyes. They feed themselves out of this richness, as at a godlike table which is within themselves. The presence of this richness within somebody's soul, it is the presence of the Ghost Himself, for he makes it characteristic and intimate to the soul. But in the earthly life this richness it is not fully unveiled. That's why the faith still has a role in this life. The faith is the celebrant which makes us possible the living of these mysteries. The faith is mediator between us and God; it is like a necessary eye, but though like a eye in which it is present, by reflection, and in the same time by direct work, the light and the kindness which irradiates from God.

to you the word of the blessed David, as also of the Christ bearer Paul, who shout out more resounding than a trumpet. The first one says: "Much peace is to the ones who love Your law, and there is not offense to them" (Ps. 118: 165); and: "I have been peaceful to the ones who hate the peace" (Ps. 119: 6); and: "Search for the peace and follow it" (Ps. 33: 13). And the second one says: "Follow the peace and the holiness with everybody, without which nobody will see God" (Heb. 12: 14); and: "If possible, as much as depends on you, be at peace with everybody" (Rom. 12: 18).

d) You must be not-scattered. And the forth thing, namely the need to be not-scattered, it will be shown to you by the Pious Isaac, who says: "If the lust is the fruit of the senses, then let be silent the ones who sustain that they keep the peace of the mind with their attention being scattered". And: "Do not accompany with the scattered ones"[42].

e) You must be careless, or not worried. And about the fifth thing, namely about the need to be careless and not worried, let be teaching to you what the Lord says into Gospel: "Therefore, I say to you: do not worry into your soul what you will eat, neither for your body, what you will put on it. It is not the soul more than the food and the body more than the coat? Look at the birds of the sky, for they neither sow nor reap, and they neither gather into barns. And your Father from heavens, he feeds them. Aren't you more than them? And who amongst you, by worrying himself, can add a cubit to his stature? And regarding the coat, what do you worry for?"(Mt. 6: 25-28). And a little further: "therefore do not worry, saying: what will we eat, or what will we drink, or what will we put on; because all these things are searched for by the Gentiles. Your Father from heavens knows that you need all these. Search, firstly, for the Kingdom of God and for His righteousness and all these things will be added to you. Therefore, do not worry about tomorrow, for tomorrow will take care of its things. It is enough to the day its evilness" (Mt. 6: 31-34).

But Saint Isaac says also: "If you haven't liberated yourself from worries, do not search for light into your soul"[43].

[43] Quoted work, chapter 13, p. 51. The worries totally fill up the cogitation with the things necessary to the body; they pull it up to the surface. The things lose their transparence. The depths of the soul, with their transparency towards the godlike plan, are being covered. The

And Climacus says also: "A hair troubles the eye and a little worry banishes away the quietude. This is for the quietude is the rejection of the thoughts and the renouncing to the worries which seem to be justified. The one who has achieved the quietude, he neither will take care of his body; for "it is not liar, the One Who has promised this" (Heb. 10: 23)[44].

f) You must love the silence. The sixth thing, namely the need to be silent, it come out from the word's sequencing. But the Pious Isaac says also about this: "The one who restrains his tongue from gossiping, he guards his heart against passions; and the one who cleans his heart of passions, he always sees God"[45]; and: "When you will place all the deeds of your living on one side of the scales, and the silence on the other, you will find out that the silence weighs more"[46]. And: "Love the silence above all, for it brings you closer to the fruit; because the tongue has no power to come close to it"[47]. And: "Firstly, let's strive to be silent; then, out of silence is born within us something that leads us towards silence. I wish God to give you something that is born out of silence. If you start to life thus, I don't even know what light will rise to you out of this"[48]. And again: "The silence is the mystery of the future age. And the words are the tools of this age"[49]. And to Saint Arsenius, so commanded for the second cogitation is no longer preoccupied with the meaning of the life. This meaning is no longer highlighted; there is no longer place and time for it into the soul.

[47] Unidentified.

[48] Quoted work, Word no. 34, p. 149. In silence, our depth is working. When we talk, it is impeded to work. In silence, our depth encounters the godlike Ghost, Who powerfully attracts our look towards His richness and life; our depth meets the godlike Ghost, Who is beyond our depth, and out of this encounter is born a knowledge, which cannot be known but only by the ones who has this experience, and by the ones whom he communicates it, not so much by words, but through the way he looks and he behaves. In silence you encounter something that brings you again to silence. The silence grabs better the mystery that happened in our encounter with the infinity that irradiates from the personal God. When the tongue starts expressing it, we are losing the full living of this mystery of an indefinite richness, and we start tearing it in pieces, which all together, they cannot express the indefinite. In silence, you are somehow in the middle of the mystery, identified with it, by speaking, you detach yourself, you get far from it; in words you only catch strips of it; you no longer live the whole and this whole cannot be obtained by combining the strips, for the infinite cannot be realized by combining the limited parts. Of course, this is not about a diplomatic silence, but about that silence that is the sign of the deepening into the godlike infinite, through the depth of the heart.

[49] Through silence we elevate ourselves on the plan of the infinite and of the indefinite, fully lived. Through words we express the distinct things of this world and we descend in this world time, the godlike voice: "Arsenius, run, be silent, appease yourself, and you will be saved"[50].

g) You must get quiet. And about the seventh thing, namely about the need to live quietly, consider as worthy of your trust and as proof: the Great Basil and, again, Saint Isaac. The first one said: "The quietude is the beginning of the soul's cleaning"[51]. And the other one: "The end of the appeasement is the silence regarding everything"[52]. The first one showed, through these words, shortly, the beginning of the appeasement, and the second one, its end. And in the Old Testament it was said: "Have you sinned? Appease yourself" (Gen. 4: 7) and: "Stop yourselves and know that I Am the Lord" (Ps. 45: 10). Climacus says also him: "The precursory thing of the quietude is the lack of care regarding all the justified or unjustified things. This is because the one who opens himself to the first ones, he will fall into the other ones. Then, there is the tireless prayer; and, thirdly, the not-stolen (not-deviated) work of the heart. It is impossible by nature, to the one who hasn't learnt the letters, to read the books; but it is even more impossible to the ones who haven't achieved the first thing (the carelessness), to work the others two (the prayer, and the work of heart) with judgment"[53].

And again, Saint Isaac says: "The longing of the one who appeases himself is the relentless waiting for death. The one who enters the road of the quietude, without this thought, he cannot bear the things we must suffer and endure in all ways"[54].

h) You must give thanks for everything. For the eight things, or for the need to give thanks for everything, let Saint Paul be teacher to you, who commands: "Give thanks for everything" (1 Thess. 5: 8). Also, the Pious Isaac, who says: "The thanks giving, of the one who receives, it determines the one who has given the gifts, to give even greater gifts than he gave before. Who do not give thanks for the small things, he will be ungrateful (liar) and unjust also in the great things"[55]. And: "What guides the gift of God towards man it is the heart that moves itself towards ceaseless thanksgiving. And what guides the temptation towards the soul it is the thought of speaking against, which always is moving into the heart"[56]. And: "The mouth that always gives thanks, it receives blessing from God; and within the heart where it perseveres the thanksgiving, there it is poured the grace"[57].

i) You must recognize your helplessness. The ninth thing is to know what great gain achieves the one who has reached to recognize its helplessness. You will find out this by taking heed to the Psalm no. VI of David the Prophet, where it is said: "Have mercy on me, Lord, for I am helpless (Ps. 6: 2). And in another place: "I am worm and not a man, the reproach of the men and the defamation of the people" (Ps. 21: 6). And Saint Isaac says: "Blessed is the man who knows his helplessness, for this knowledge it becomes to him foundation and root and beginning of all kindness. This is because when he will find out who he is and he will truly feel his helplessness, he will gather his soul from the inflated and empty state, which darkens his conscience, and he will put guard to himself"[58]. And: "The man who has reached to know the measure of his helplessness, he has reached the consummation of his humbleness"[59].

j) We must endure, with manhood, the trials. The word left, and which fulfills the number of the ten words presented by us, it speaks about the need to bear with manhood, and to face patiently the diverse and of many kind trials, which will happen to you. Listen, therefore, to the things written about this fact in the Holy Scripture. For the Christ bearer Paul says: "Brothers, it is not our fight against the blood and the body, but against the principalities, the masteries, the masters of the darkness of this age, against the ghosts of the evilness into the heavenly things" (Eph. 6: 12). And: "If you are without rebuking, to which [56] Unidentified. The heart which gives thanks to God, it is a heart opened to Him. That's why within that heart are poured other and other gifts. The one which speaks against, it is a heart closed into itself. That heart doesn't see the received gifts and that's why it actually doesn't receive anything from God and from another person. By reducing everything to nothing, it remains nothing to that heart. That heart destroys, by criticizing, even what it receives.

everybody has been partaker, behold you are illegitimate and not sons" (Heb. 12: 8). And: "Whom God loves, he rebukes him, and He beats every son who receives Him" (Heb. 12: 6). The brother of the Lord says also: "The not-tempted man is also untried" (Jas. 1: 12). And Saint Elijah the Ecdicius says: "It is necessary to each Christian, who rightly believes in God, to not be careless, but to wait for and to receive always the trials, for, when they come, to not wonder, neither to be him troubled, but to endure the heaviness of the trouble and to understand what that trouble says, by singing from the psalms, with the prophet: "Try me, Lord, and tempt me" (Ps. 25: 2). This is because he didn't say: "Your rebuking has destroyed me", but "it corrected me to the end" (Ps. 17: 39)[60].

Neither you research the cause of your trials, nor where they come from, but only pray God, to you able to bear them with thanksgiving, as Saint Mark says: "When comes the trials, do not search why and through whom they have come, but try to suffer them with thanksgiving and without keeping in mind the evil"[61]. And again: "If it is not easy to find somebody who is pleasant to God without being tried, it is appropriate to give God thanks for everything happens to us"[62]. And: "Every trouble unveils the state of the soul, if this one tends towards the things from the right or towards the things from the left. That's why, any troubles which happens to us, they are called trials, giving the partaker to them the knowledge of his hidden wills"[63].

Saint Isaac the Syrian, besides many other things, he says also these: "The trials are useful to every man. If they are useful to Paul, let every mouth to be silent and let the whole world to obey God" (Rom. 3: 19)[64]. The fighters are tried in order to increase their power, to learn how to guard themselves; the ones who sleep are tried in order to be helped to wake up; the ones who are far from God are tried in order to come closer to [64] Quoted work, head 48, p. 198. To each man it is difficult the happening that opposes the leaning of his will. Because of this reason that is to him and it is called trial. To the one who has a hidden leaning towards the praise from people, it is trial the condemnation word, or to not be appreciated by somebody; to the one who doesn't have this tendency, such a happening doesn't heart him too much. That's why each trial is a medicine for a hidden illness, if it is endured with manhood and some sort of carelessness concerning it.

Him; the ones who belong to God are tried in order to daringly dwell in His home. No untried son receives the richness of his father's house, in order to be helped by it. That's why, God firstly tries and beats, and then He shows His gifts. Glory to the Master Who, by giving us bitter medicines, he gives us the joy of the health. There is no man who, during the trial, to not get tired. But without this, it is impossible to achieve a strong health. But to endure them, it doesn't stay in our power (1 Cor. 10: 13). For, where could the clay pot have from, the power to stop the flowing of the water, if the godlike fire wouldn't strengthen it? If we obey, by praying with humbleness, with uninterrupted desire and patience, we will receive everything through Christ Jesus, our Lord"[65].

It has been said, then, also in the Wisdom of Sirach[66]: "If you come closer to serve your Lord God, prepare your soul for trial. Correct your heart and endure and do not hurry yourself up in the time of the persecution" (the Wisdom of Sirach 2: 1-2)[67].

l) We must hope in God and to wait from Him what is useful to us[68]. Cast the anchor of the hope into God, Who can save, and wait for the useful end of the trials from Him. This if for "faithful is God, Who won't let us be tried above our power, but together with the trial He will make also the end"(1 Cor. 10: 13). And: "The trouble works the patience, and the patience the proving, and the proving work hope, and the hope doesn't get [65] Quoted work, Word 48, pp. 198-199. The patience is out of our effort, but this effort wouldn't be possible to us without the help from God. The synergy, or the collaboration of the man with God, it has a very subtle character. The effort and the godlike help aren't separated. In our effort itself it is proven to be present the godlike help, by making possible this effort, but this one remains, though, also our effort. We toil for we receive the power to toil, but we really toil. I do not boast myself with my toil, as being only mine, but my part from it, it is, though, requested by God.

[67] The one who wants to serve God, he sets in movement the good parts of his being. But just then are set in movement also the contrary impulses. Against restraint, there rise up the desires for pleasure, and against patience, the impulse towards comfort, etc. Only the tarrying in the first ones will weaken the power of the last ones. That's why, the one who receives trials, he mustn't hurry up to quickly finish with them. The evil impulses do not weaken easily. They must be faced and withered for a long time, through prolonged or always repeated trials. Only thus they are truly weakened.

[68] This paragraph is not numbered individually; it closes the previous one. This is because the trials are endured through hope.

ashamed" (Rom. 5: 4). And: "The one who endures to the end, that one will be saved" (Mt. 10: 22). And: "Into your patience you will gain your souls" (Lk. 21: 19). And the brother of the Lord speaks like this: "Towards every joy reckon, my brothers, when you fall in many sorts of temptations, by knowing that the testing of your faith works patience; and let the patience have its consummate thing, in order to be you consummate and whole, not needing anything" (Jas. 1: 2-4). And: "Blessed is the man who endures the temptation, for, by becoming tested, he will take the crown of the life promised by the Lord to the ones who love Him" (Jas. 1: 12). And: "Aren't worthy, the sufferings of the present time, of the future glory which will be unveiled to you" (Rom. 8: 18). And: "Waiting, I have been waiting for the Lord, and He took heed at me and He heard my prayer and He took me out from the pit of the trouble and from mud and He placed my feet on rock and he directed my steps and he put in my mouth a new song, praise to our Lord" (Ps. 39: 1-4). Also, the Blessed Simeon the Metaphrastes writes: "The soul which is tied by the chains of the love, to God, that soul reckons the suffering as being nothing. For that soul delights himself into pains, and he flourishes in the unpleasant suffering, and when He doesn't suffer anything saddening for the beloved One, then, he rather reckons that he suffers, and he runs away from resting, as from a punishment"[69].

17. About the fear of God, which is a twofold one: one belongs to beginners, and one to the consummate ones.

We mustn't get lazy and not speaking also about the twofold fear of God. But it seems to us that, by speaking only about the consummate fear – after we finished the eight heads – we disregarded the order. Therefore we must also speak about the first fear, because the Holy Fathers placed the fear after faith.

a) About the first fear, the one that belongs to beginners. Let yourself know, therefore, my beloved, that the fear of God is a twofold one, one that belongs to the beginners, and one that belongs to the consummate ones. About the first one it was written like this; "The beginning of the wisdom is the fear of God" (Proverbs 1: 7); and: "Come, my sons, to listen to me; I am going to teach you the fear of God" (Ps. 33: 11); and: "Because of the fear of the Lord, each man deviates from sin" (The Wisdom of Sirach 2: 16)[70]. And the Pious Isaac says: "The fear of God is the beginning of the virtue, but one says that is also the beginning of the faith and it is sown into heart when the cogitation detaches itself from the scattering of the world, by gathering its thoughts – which walk into scattering – in the thinking of the future gathering of everything"[71]; and: "The beginning of the true man's life is the fear of God. But it doesn't want to remain within soul in the same time with the scattering"[72]; and: "Try to become wise, in order to lay as foundation, to your travel, the fear of God, and in a few days you will see you again at the gate of the Kingdom, on a direct road"[73].

b) About the second fear, the consummate one. And about the second fear, or the consummate one, it has been said like this: "Blessed is the man who fears the Lord; into His commandments he will wish very" (Ps. 111, 1). And: "Blessed are all the ones who fear the Lord, the ones who walk in His paths" (Ps. 127: 1). And: "Fear the Lord - all His saints; for nothing lacks to the ones who fear Him" (Ps. 33: 19). And: "Behold, so will be blessed the man who fears the Lord" (Ps. 127: 4). And: "Fearing the Lord is clean; it remains forever and ever" (Ps. 18: 10).

But also Saint Peter Damascene writes: "The sign of the first fear, it is that hates the sin and gets angry with it, like the one who is wounded by a beast. And the sign of the consummate fear, it is that it loves the virtue and fears the change. This is because nobody is unchangeable and in each thing, in the present life, we must always fear the falling"[74].

[70] See footnote *TBD

[71] Quoted work, head 1, p. 1. In text: "in the future restoration". The world is now divided by sin. Its impulses are contradictory. The mind mustn't move itself from an aspect of the world to the contrary one, but, by thinking at the renewal of their final harmony, to see it even since now, gathered together again in The One, and to work for this gathering back, and contemplating That One, even since now, in all things. This is not building castles in the air, but an anchoring in the most basic reality of all things.

[72] Quoted work, head 2, p. 3. The fear makes us depend on God. That's why it is contrary to the scattering of the mind in the world's things, considered in themselves, outside the connection with God, or, it cannot remain within soul together with this scattering.

[73] Quoted work, head 2, p. 5. The fear, by keeping us depending on God, with the whole our feeling, , it is the shortest road to the entrance at Him, which is a true restoration of our nature in the state we were at the beginning, or in the state to which we were able to easily advance, namely in the state of fulfilling the true human.

[74] The Romanian Philokalia, vol. III, Word no. 3, p. 200.

That's why, you also, by listening these with understanding, strive yourself to ceaselessly keep within you, together with all the things said before, also the first fear. This is because the first fear is the best guardian of the treasure of all the good things. If you have this first fear, you will have your steps directed towards working all the commandments of our Lord Jesus Christ. And by advancing on their path, you will also achieve the consummate and clean fear, by desiring the virtues and by the mercy of the Good God.

18. For fulfilling all the commandments and for the faith into our Lord Jesus Christ, we mustn't spare, when the times asks for it, even our life.

In addition to what has been said, you must also know that, for the sake of the live giver commandments, and for the sake of the faith into our Lord Jesus Christ, we owe, when the times asks for it, to joyfully give even our soul, or to not spare even our life. This is because our Lord Jesus Christ Himself says, regarding this, that: "the one who has lost his soul for Me and for My Gospel, that one will be saved" (Mk. 8: 35). This is, without any doubt, for that man believes and doesn't doubt, that God-Man Jesus Christ Himself, the Savior, He is the resurrection and the life and everything that is salvation"[75].

This is because He says: "I am the resurrection and the life. The one who believes in Me, even if he dies, he will be alive. And everyone who is alive and believes in Me, he won't die ever" (Jn. 11: 25-27). And: "So much He loved the world, that He gave even His Only Begotten Son, for everyone who believes in Him to not perish, and to have eternal life" (Jn. 3: 16). And: "I have come for the world to have life, and much more life to have" (Jn. 10: 10).

Therefore, being like that, and, as it has been said, "forgetting about the things from the past and looking forwards" (Phil. 3: 14), run, without turning back, together with Christ, on your road.

But it is good and is very useful to present here, firstly, the natural method of his beatitude Nicephorus, about the way in which one can reach inside heart, through the breathing through the nose. It is a method that also helps to gathering the cogitation together[76]. On this way, our work will advance, with God, in a due manner.

[75] That one who gives his earthly life for Christ, he gives it for his own resurrection and for the eternal life.

So, that godlike man, amongst many other things, which were the written witnesses of the saints, he also says these:

19. Natural method about the way in which one can enter within heart and getting out from there by breathing through the nose; and about the prayer itself practiced by us, which is: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me". This method also helps to gathering the cogitation together.

"You know, brother, that the breathing we have it is occasioned by the air. And we inhale the air also for the heart. This is because this breathing is the cause of life and of body's warmth. So, the heart absorbs the breathing (the breath) in order to send its warmth out, through exhaling, and to cause itself a good temperature. The cause of this work, or better said, its servant, it is the lung. This one, being created by God with an airy composition, as some bellows, takes in and gets out the content (the air), without difficulty. Thus, the heart, by attracting the cool air, and by banishing away the warm air, it preserves undisturbed, the order for which it has been created, for sustaining the vital organism.

Therefore you, by sitting in the tranquil cell, and by gathering your mind, introduce it through where the breathing enters the heart, and force it to descend with the breath into heart. And by entering there, the mind, after it is united with the soul, it is filled up with untold pleasure and joyfulness.

So, accustom your mind, brother, to not get out from there quickly. For, at the beginning, the mind stays there with difficulty, due to the closing up and to the narrowing. But, after it has become accustomed, it no longer likes walking outside. This is for "The Kingdom of Heavens is inside you" (Lk. 17: 21). To the one who looks at it there,, and who searches for it through clean prayer, the things from outside seem to him as being sad and ugly".

And, "you must also find out that, you, by reaching there, you mustn't be silent and let it stay not-working, but give it the prayer: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on Me", as ceaseless work and thinking, and never let this work to stop. For, this work, by keeping the mind not-strayed, it makes it impossible to be caught by the enemy's attacks and it elevates it to the love and to the longing for God"[77].

These things are said by this blessed Father, having as main goal that, by using this natural method, the mind comes back from its usual straying and slavery, to taking heed and, by taking heed, the mind to unite again with itself, and so to unite itself with the prayer, and then to descend with the prayer within heart, and remain there forever. This was said also by a certain man from the ones made wise by God, when explaining the method shown before, as one who knew this sanctified work by experiencing it[78].

20. About the natural method of inhaling through the nostrils and calling, together with it, the Lord Jesus Christ.

We must make obvious, to the one who loves learning, also the fact that, if we will accustom our mind to descend into heart, with the inhaled air, we will surely find out that the mind doesn't start descending before renouncing to any thought, and before becoming unitary and before emptying itself, and no longer being mastered by any memory, except by the calling of the name of Jesus Christ. And, by getting out of there, and directing itself towards the external things, or towards the memories of many kinds, it divides itself (it scatters), even unwillingly[79].

[77] What is presented between quotation marks it is taken from "The Method" of Nicephorus from loneliness (The Greek Philokalia, Third edition, vol. IV, pp. 27-28, and The Romanian Philokalia, vol. VII).

[78] It seems that here is hinted Gregory of Sinai, who asked that the breathing to not be too hasty, in order to longer remain inside heart, the cogitation and the remembrance of Christ, and to be more deepened, with the mind, in the meaning represented by Christ (The Greek Philokalia, Third edition, vol. IV, pp. 71-72. See also The Romanian Philokalia, vol. VIII). The purpose of The Method is that the man to become fully aware of himself, and by this, to become fully aware of God. Thinking at Christ strengthens the conscience of the self, and the conscience of the self strengthens the feeling of the presence of Christ.

[79] Even the old Greek philosophy affirmed that the mind takes the image of its content: if this one is diverse, the mind – or its work - is also divided, and if its content is one, the mind becomes unified. But only when the unique content is limitless, only then the mind can tarry into it. Otherwise, the mind will try to complete the limited cogitated content with other things, jumping always from a thought to another. And only the mind which has elevated itself to an infinite content, for it has elevated itself from the preoccupation with the external things, and

21. But also the godlike Chrysostom and others of the Holy Fathers from yore, they urge us to pray into Jesus Christ, our Lord, and inside our heart[80]. And they say that this prayer is: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me".

But the Great Chrysostom says also that: "I pray you, brothers, to never transgress or disregard the canon of the prayer"[81]. And a little further: "The monk must say ceaselessly, either he eats, or he travels, or he does something else: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me". And then: "For the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, by descending into the deep of the heart, to humiliate the dragon which masters over its stretches, and to save the soul and to make the soul alive. Therefore, persevere in the name of the Lord Jesus, for the heart to receive (to contain) the Lord, and the Lord to comprise the heart, and the two to be one". And he says again: "Do not separate your heart from God, and persevere and guard it always, with the remembrance of the Lord Jesus Christ, until the name of the Lord will be planted into the heart, and the heart won't think at anything else, but to Christ extolled within you"[82].

from its works referring to those things, that mind has turned towards itself as an indefinite subject of the works directed towards those things. That's why, the infinite God is contemplated with the mind that has come back to itself; the mind experiences on itself, it experiences God, and vice versa. (This theme is much developed by Kallistos the Katafygiote).

[80] Experiencing God, it means experiencing Him in state of prayer, for in that state we are in direct communication with Him, and we strongly feel that we have everything from Him. But God makes Himself accessible to us, into Christ. When the mind gathers itself together from everything, it gathers itself into Christ, and it prays into Him; but also inside the heart. This is for the heart is, from another point of view, the indefinite deep of the mind, unveiled in its emotional state, or it is another side of it, through which it opens itself towards God. It is a deep that doesn't close into itself, but it opens itself into God, or into Christ. When it closes itself, the heart itself is covered. The man becomes "heartless". Christ, being in the opened and unveiled heart, which becomes like this consequently to the mind's gathering from scattering, it is One with the Kingdom of Heavens. That's why, in "The Method" of Nicephorus, we are told that the mind, by gathering itself into the heart, it finds there the Kingdom of Heavens, within which, it doesn't get fed of remaining there.

[81] Epistle towards Monks, full of every useful things and watchfulness (non authentic); G.P. 60, 752-753.

[82] Only with the name of Lord Jesus can be the heart guarded. Otherwise, it is taken in mastery by the "dragon", arousing in it less clean loves: the love for the self, the love for pleasures, which close the heart in a limited horizon, darkening it and making it passionate in an inferior mode. By "swallowing" Jesus Christ in it, and the Lord Jesus Christ also "swallowing" it, it becomes characteristic to the heart the horizon of the infinity and of the clean love, of true

22. Again about breathing through the nose, together with the taking heed at the remembrance of Jesus within heart.

Saint John Climacus writes also: "Let the remembrance of Jesus stick to your breath and you will know the profit of the appeasement"[83]. And Saint Hesychios says: "If you want, therefore, to cover the thoughts with shame, and to appease yourself with joy, and to easily keep the watchfulness within your heart, let the prayer of Christ stick to your breathing, and you will see how this is going to be fulfilled in a few days"[84].

23. The one who wants to take vigil with his mind, and especially the beginner, he must stay, during the prayer time, in a tranquil and not-lightened cell, in order to gather up, thus, in a natural manner, his mind and his cogitation from overflowing.

That's why, in addition to the things shown above, and ordered by the Holy and Great Fathers, according to the witnesses shown by us, about the breathing through nostrils, and about the need of praying and of cogitating and of taking vigil within our heart, into our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and into the holy and the savior His Name[85], and of asking for mercy from Him, there it is necessary to be added also, that exceeding, which is in Christ, of His endless light. The heart is no longer preoccupied, in a selfish manner, with itself; such a heart embraces everybody and everything. Through the name of Christ, the heart enters in the stretches of light and of love from within Jesus, it enters His atmosphere. This is because uttering the name of Jesus it means thinking at Him, with emotion, and this it means entering in living connection with Him. The name of Jesus catches giver of fruits roots, not in a static heart, but in a "wet" feeling, which also grows continuously up, and it is always alive and warm in its love towards Jesus. In this sense, the heart can no longer be cogitated without the name of Jesus, without the thinking at Him, and without His love which keeps the heart in this movement, like a garden cannot be cogitated without trees or without some plantation.

[83] The Ladder XXVII; G.P. 88, 1112 C.

[84] About temperance and virtue II, 80; G.P. 93, 1537 A.; The Romanian Philokalia, vol. IV, p. 88. It is recommended to connect the remembrance of the name of Jesus, with the uninterrupted rhythmicity of the breathing, in order to achieve this uninterrupted rhythmicity also of the prayer. There isn't anything bizarre in connecting of the soul's and spiritual life to the body. This is a law of the human being.

[85] If praying in the heart were Christ is present, we pray within Christ Himself, it is obvious that we also pray in His name, by whose remembrance and thinking at, we get into and maintain ourselves into Christ. In this sense, the name itself of Christ, called by us, by placing us in connection with Christ, it is savior.

the one who strives himself to take vigil with the mind within heart, and especially the beginner, he must always stay, and especially during the time planned for prayer, in a tranquil and not lighted corner, as teach and order the godlike Fathers and teachers, who had the experience of this most-happy work. This is because, the looking and the sight of the eyes get scattered naturally, towards the things they look at, and towards the seen things, and by this, they cause the division of the cogitation, and they even tear it apart and make it of many kinds[86], by closing it, as it has been said, in a quiet and dark room, the scattering and the fickleness themselves, caused by sigh and by looking at, they cease, and thus the mind, willy-nilly, gets appeased and gather itself together. This is for the Great Basil says: "The mind that is not-scattered towards the external things and that is not-overflowed through senses towards the world, it ascends again toward itself"[87].

24. The mind is given the steadfastness, before all, through our Lord Jesus Christ and by calling, with faith, within heart, His holy name. But to this it also helps, the natural method of inhaling the air into heart, and staying in a tranquil and not lightened corner, and the things alike.

But before this, better said before everything, in this fight the mind is being helped by the godlike grace, which comes within soul by cleanly and not-scattered calling of a sole thought[88] of our Lord Jesus Christ within our heart, so, not by the simple prolonged natural method of inhaling through nostrils or of staying in a tranquil and darken place. These weren't established by the Holy Fathers for anything else, but only as some means helping to gather the mind in itself, by turning it back from its usual scattering and by taking heed. It is what we have said also before. But through them he mind gains also the power of praying ceaselessly and cleanly and without scattering[89]. This is because, as Saint Nilus says: "The taking heed, by searching for prayer, it will find prayer. This is for the prayer follows to the taking heed, even though it is something else. That's why, we must strive towards it"[90].

[86] It produces contradictions in the cogitation, tearing it apart and making it to fight against itself, and annulling its power to reach some unitary meaning, which to please it and to give the man the possibility to consecrate his life to a superior unitary serving.

[87] Letter towards Gregory about Loneliness; G.P. 32, 228 A.

[88] The most recent study on the "Mono-Logos prayer" is the one of L. Regnault, La prière continuelle "monologgiste" dans la littérature apophtegmatique, in "Irénikon", 1974, no. 4, p. 462-494. The author says that the term was used for the first time by John Climacus (G.P. 88, 889 D), as attribute for "The Prayer of Jesus" ("Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me"), "for it excludes, obviously, the multiplicity of the words, but especially the multiplicity and the variety of the thoughts, especially what necessarily the "contradiction" implies (p. 469).

But we stop here the speaking about these things. And you, son, if you want to have life, and if you want to see good days (Ps. 33: 12) and to live into body as you would be bodiless, live according to this canon and to this rule.

25. How must spend, the ones who appeases himself, the time between evening and Vespers (the taking vigil from midnight); and the beginning of the teaching, widely.

After the sun sets, by calling the All-Good and the Almighty Lord Jesus Christ to help, you sit on a little stool, in the tranquil and not-lightened cell. And by gathering your mind out of its outside walking and straying, and by pushing it gently inside heart, and by inhaling the air through nose, fill the mind up with the thoughts of prayer or with: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me", namely introduce within, somehow united with the breathing, also the words of the prayer. This is because Saint Hesychios says: "Unite the watchfulness and the name of Jesus with your breathing, as also with the ceaseless thinking at death and with the humbleness. For both of them are useful[91]. In this way, let you have, together with the prayer and with the other things I've mentioned to you, also the [89] The authors of the present writing discern between gathering the mind in itself and bringing the grace within heart. The last thing is helped by the ceaseless calling of the name of Jesus. Only the first thing, namely what the man gives, it is helped by a regular breathing and by staying in a dark place. But, through the gathering in itself, the mind receives the power of praying ceaselessly. So that the coming of the grace it is only the indirect result of the regular breathing and of staying in a dark place. We have here something totally different from the yogic methods, which have a purely natural character, and they do not aim to intensify the believer's relation with the Person of Jesus Christ. The believer who prays, through interiorizing, he is filled up with the love of Christ; he doesn't simply concentrate in his own essence, which, in the end, it is part of the impersonal essence of the whole.

[90] Out of the description "About Prayer", attributed in the G.P., 1165-1200, to Nilus of Sinai (see The Romanian Philokalia, vol. I, p. 92). The prayer is something else than the taking heed (or than the mind's focusing), because the last one is of the man, whilst the first one is of the grace, if the prayer is not-scattered.

[91] About Temperance and Virtue II, 87; G.P. 93, 1540 D. The Romanian Philokalia, vol. IV, p. 89-99.

thinking at the judgment and at rewarding the good and the evil deeds; and reckon yourself, with all your soul, more sinner than all people and more lawless than the devils themselves, and that you will be eternally punished[92]. If the thinking at the shown things, it will produce within you, pricking of the heart, and crying with tears, you persevere in it until these will pass away by themselves. And if you haven't been found worthy of the gift of the tears, strive yourself and pray with humble though, in order to achieve these. This is for through these we clean ourselves of passions and of defilements, and we make ourselves partakers to the good and deliverer states"[93]. That's why Saint John Climacus says: "Like the fire consumes the reed, so the clean tear cleans the whole seen and unseen defilement"[94]. And another Saint Father says: "The one who wants to detach himself from evilness, he detaches himself with crying; and the one who wants to gather virtues, he gathers them with crying. And, if you don't have pricking of the heart, you know that you have vain glory, because this one doesn't let the soul to humiliate himself"[95].

And if the tears do not come, deepen yourself in these thoughts with the prayer, for an hour; and then, by rising yourself up, utter attentively the Small Compline and, by sitting down again, keep the prayer with the whole you power, in a clean and without scattering manner, namely without worries and without any thought or imagination, but with much watchfulness, for a half of hour, as it was said[96]. Beside [92] The remembrance of the name of Jesus mustn't be only a formal repeating of the name, but it must be accompanied by the full of feeling thinking at death, at the judgment after death, and at the concrete sins for which, the one who prays, will be led accountable at that judgment. This makes that the remembrance of the name of Jesus, to be united, by the ones who prays, with the begging for His mercy. The Prayer of Jesus isn't, therefore, only a formal technique, but the persistency of a state of profound emotion, which goes to the tears, It is an existential state, full of tremble, of the whole human being.

[93] The tears were reckoned by the Holy Fathers as a gift from God. This is because they do not come to us by our will, though thinking at death and at judgment prepare the coming of this gift. This is because you can think at death with resignation, with frowning, but without tears. The tears are the result of the last degree of humbleness and repentance. That's why they imply the faith in God and they are means of cleaning and of new life, out of the fear of God and out of our love for Him.

breathing and eating, be, during the prayer, stranger to everything, if you want to be only with your mind. Then, by marking yourself with the sign of the most-holy cross, and also making this sign upon your bed, sit down on the bed and think at the future good things, or at punishments, at the perishable and deceiving nature of the temporary things, at the unnoticeable and general duty, namely at death, at the fearsome giving of account after your end and before it, by shortly recalling your mistakes from the whole your life, and warmly asking for to be forgiven, and then study in detail how you have spend the day that passed. Then, by laying yourself on your bed, and saying the prayer, according to the one who said: "The remembrance of Jesus to fall asleep with you", sleep for five or for six hours. Better said, sleep as long as the night lasts[97].

26. How you must do the Matins and how to spend your time until next morning.

Awakening yourself, and praising God, and calling Him again to help you, start with the first thing, namely to pray in your heart without scattering, and in a clean way, about an hour. This is for during this time the mind is in the most tranquil and undisturbed state. That's why, we have been commanded to sacrifice to God the first born and the chosen things of ours (Deuteronomy 12: 6), namely to raise the first thought to Him, through the clean prayer towards our Lord Jesus Christ. This is because Saint Nilus says: "That one commits prayer that brings to God every first thought of his"[98]. Then, you sing the Midnight Office.

And if you still haven't strengthened yourself for a even more consummate appeasement and, that's why, you cannot yet, as I said, to be kidnapped (into prayer), or if you cannot do this for some other reason, as it happen to the ones who are beginners in this work, or rarer, to the advanced ones, if they haven't reached yet the consummation (for the consummate ones "can do everything into Christ, Who strengthens them" (Phil. 4: 13)), - getting yourself up from sleep and keeping yourself awake with all your power, sing firstly the Midnight Office with the whole taking heed and understanding. Then, by sitting down, pray, in a clean and not-scattered way, into your heart, as it has been shown, one hour; better said, as much as the Giver of the Good Things will give you power to do it. This is for Climacus says: "Give, during the night, the longest time to the taking heed, and the shortest to the singing. And during the day, prepare yourself according to your power"[99].

And if, while toiling you in this manner, you still are dominated by drowsiness and laziness, and your mind is troubled by some happening, stand up, awaken yourself as much as you can, and persevere in prayer. Then, sitting down, strive yourself to pray, as it has been written above, always taking care of speaking, through clean prayer, to God the clean One. Then, by standing up, say with understanding the six psalms, the 50th one and the canon, as you want. Then, by sitting down and taking vigil, pray with cleanness for a half an hour[100]. And again, by standing up, sing "The Praises", the usual "Doxology", "The First Hour", and then do the benediction at the end of the prayer. The words uttered by your lips, let them sound only that loud that they could be heard by your ears, since we have been ordered to bring to God only the fruits of our lips (Heb. 13: 15). Give thanks, with all your soul and with all your thought, to the One Who loves the people, to the Care Taker, and to the Most-Wise God, to the One Who according to His endless mercy, has made us worthy to cross quietly the sea of the past night and to see the luminous stretch of the present day; and to pray Him equally fiery, to help us crossing, not agitated, the darkened and savage storm of the demons and of the passions, and to have mercy on us.

27. How we must spend our time from morning to evening.

And from morning to noon, spend your time in the clean and not-scattered prayer of the heart, giving yourself wholly to God, as much as you can, for, by praying to Him with a pricked heart, to be helped by Him, you who are helpless and idle and

[100] It is a Matins, interrupted from time to time, by the gathering of the mind and by the Prayer of Jesus. Maybe that's why the Matins it is also called "Taking Vigil", having to be always interrupted by periods of time dedicated to the taking heed. The Matins was done by hesychast in his cell, after midnight, being given the remoteness of his cell from the church.

lacking the will. Read while standing, what it has been assigned to you from the Book of Psalms, from Apostle, and from the Holy Gospel. Do also the prayers towards our Lord Jesus Christ, and towards the Most Holy Birth Giver of God. Then, sitting down, do also the other reading from the godlike Scriptures. After these ones, sing with understanding the usual "Hours", composed with much wisdom by the Fathers of the Church, persevering in shunning the soul from not working, not working being the teacher of all evilness. Remove, in the same time with the passions, also their occasions, even though some of them seem to be small and harmless.

28. About avoiding the not-working and about the need that the one who appeases himself to keep the whole churchly teaching.

Saint Isaac says: "Guard yourself, my beloved ones, against not-working, because in it is being hiding itself the sure death. This is because without it, it is impossible to somebody to fall in the hands of the ones who strive themselves to enslave the monk. Not for the psalms will God judge us in that day, neither for the hesitation into prayer; but because the desertion of them it given the demons the possibility to enter. And when they will find place and they will enter and when they will close up the doors of our eyes[101], and they will overwhelm us with their tyranny and uncleanness; because they master, according to the godlike decision, their servants, with the most dreadful revenge. And so we reach to be theirs slaves, due to disregarding the small things, of which we are asked to take care of, for Christ, as it was written by the wisest ones: "He who doesn't obey his will to the will of Christ, he will be submitted to his enemy". Therefore, let's reckon these things, which seem to be small[102], as some walls, against the ones who want to take us in slavery. That's why, it has been wisely ordered, by the ones who keep the order of the Church, to be these things accomplished inside the [101] They will close up the doors of the spiritual eyes, in order to not see – these eyes - the good things, and to not see God within heart; the demons will close the man up, in himself, and in his pleasures, making him blind towards what is beyond this narrowness.

[102] The reading of the psalms and the uttering of the prayers, are reckoned by some people as small things, they declaring that important is the union with God and the consummation through it. But these small things occasion the big things, because in their absence we can be taken in slavery by demons.

cell, in order to keep our life in the ghost of the unveiling (revelation). For that, it is unjustly reckoned as small, their disregarding, by the unwise ones, who do not think at the damage caused by this. There are people who do both their beginning and their continuation of the road in an unrestraint freedom, which is the mother of the passions. That's why, it is good to strive ourselves to not disregard the small things, then to give room to the sin through the width we allow to ourselves. This is because the end of this freedom is an awful slavery"[103].

And again; "oh, sweet are the occasions of the passions! Sometimes somebody can cut off the passions and he appeases himself by removing them and he rejoices of their ceasing. But he cannot remove their causes. That's why, we are tempted even unwillingly. And we get sad because of passions, but we like to remain within the occasions which cause them. We do not like the passions, but we pleasantly receive the occasions which cause them within us[104]. That's why, the last ones become causes to the first ones, by working them. This is because the one who loves the occasions of the passions, se obeys himself and he becomes a servant, unwillingly, to the passions. The one who hates his sins, he stops from working the passions, and the one who confesses them, he will achieve forgiveness. But it is impossible to somebody, to leave the habit of the sin, before achieving the enmity towards it, and to obtain forgiveness before confessing the sins. This is because the first one (the enmity towards sin) it is the cause of the true humbleness, and the second one (the confessions) it is the cause of the pricking that is born within heart, out of shame"[105].

[103] Quoted work, Word no. 42, pp. 174-175. The freedom given us by passion it is apparent; it proves to be, in a short time, a dreadful slavery. The drunkenness, the fornication, the laziness, they appear to be, at the beginning, as manifestations of freedom. But soon, as their power increases, they prove to be monsters which chain us and drive us to serve them without being us able to oppose them.

[104] We get sad when the passions have enslaved us, but we like to taste, at the beginning, a little bit of them. We reckon that these tastings won't lead us to passions. Namely, we enjoy the occasions of the passions. But this means that also the occasions of the passions remain within us and we love them. They remain as some roots, which, immediately that they are watered, the quickly give leaves. That's why, the effort of mortifying them, or of guarding against them, must continue for the whole life.

[105] Quoted work, Word no. 55, p. 218. The confession of the sin is, on one hand, a overcoming of the shame we feel for them, and on the other hand, a deepening of the sentiment of shame, fact that produces the pricking or the crushing of the heart. This is because the confession isn't an overcoming of the shame by callousness, but by the repugnance of sin and through the fear for the eternal punishment for it. In confession there takes place a culminant shame for the sin,

And again: "There is no unforgivable sin, but only that one for which there isn't done repentance"[106].

But about these things, it is enough. And you, after the singing of the mentioned "Hours", eat, keeping the prayer also during eating, for, by doing that, to reach, by the power of the grace, the habituation of ceaselessly praying[107]. But the word about the food that sustains the body, through the untold wisdom of the Maker, let it wait a little more. Let's give firstly the word about the food that sustains and that gives life to the soul. This is, according to the Saints, the holy and the deifying prayer. And it is very appropriate to do like this, because also the soul is more precious than the body.

29. Also about prayer an about the need to be us praying always.

Like this body of ours, in the absence of the soul, it is dead and smelling badly, so also the soul, which doesn't move itself through prayer, it is dead and miserable and badly smelling. This is because we must reckon its lacking of prayer, more bitter than any death, as correctly teaches us Great Daniel the Prophet, who wanted rather to die than to be deprived, even for a moment, of prayer (Dan. 6: 10 and the followings; 10). Likewise teaches us the godlike Chrysostom: "Everyone who prays, he speaks to God. And who doesn't know what great thing is that, being a man, to dialogue with God? But nobody can show this honor by using words. This if for this honor exceeds even the angels' greatness"[108]. And again: "The prayer is a and there is manifested also the manhood that overcomes the shame. This is the manhood of the soldier during the heat of the battle, superior to that one from before battle. The spiritual guide helps both of them. Only thus the confession is a spiritual event of deep shaking and a beginning of a new life. Otherwise, it becomes a callous, formal act, which doesn't shake the being, and it doesn't help to the renewal of the life. With this pricking of the heart repented also the ones who became Christians in the day of the Pentecost (Acts 2: 37-38).

[106] Quoted work, Word 30, p. 121.

[107] Maybe singular good deeds can be done only through the man's effort. But the habituation of doing them, by ceaselessly persevering in them, and of not alternating the good deeds with evil deeds, cannot be achieved by somebody except with the help of the grace. Otherwise, he can do, from time to time, a good deed, out of the boredom of the monotony brought by the evil deeds. That's why, even the pagans do sometimes good deeds; but they cannot do only good deeds. The habituation, gained through perseverance, it implies a special power of the man's ghost, a power from above nature; and especially the habituation of the ceaseless prayer.

[108] Saint John Chrysostom, About Prayer, II; G.P. 50, 779.

common work of the angels and of the people and, in what concerns the prayer, nothing separates a nature from another. It separates you from animals, and it unites you with the angels. Through it somebody quickly elevates himself at the living, and at the life of those ones, at the honor, and the nobility, at the wisdom, and at the understanding of theirs, striving to spend his whole life in prayers and in serving (worshipping) brought to God"[109]. When the devils see the soul fenced by virtues, it doesn't dare to come close, fearing the strength and the power the soul is given by the prayer, the prayer feeding the soul better than the foods feed the body"[110]. And again: "The prayers are the nervs of the soul. This is because like the body is sustained together through nerves, and through them it moves unitarily, it persists, and it maintains its strength, and if somebody cuts off these, he undoes the whole harmony of the body, likewise the souls are harmonized and are sustained together through prayers, and through them the souls easily travel the road of the awe[111]. So, if you deprive yourself of prayer, you do something like getting the fish out of water. Like the water is the life of that one, so is to you the prayer. Like that one lives through water, so we can elevate ourselves to heavens and to reach night to God, through prayer"[112].

And again: "The prayer and the asking for, they make the people churches of God; and, like the gold and the gems and the marble, they make the houses of the emperors, likewise the prayer makes the people churches of Christ. What greater praise one could bring to the prayer, than the fact that the prayer builds churches to God? And That One, Who cannot be comprised by the skies, enters the living soul through

[110] Ibid. col. 780. The prayer nourishes the soul, for it brings the power of God in the soul, for through the dialogue with God, it is communicated to the soul His power and life. If it would be a simple work of the man, the prayer wouldn't feed the soul with something that is not in the soul himself. Generally, the man cannot renew by himself. This is because if his being is evil, where to get from it a power through which to overcome this weakness?
[111] A German physician declared to me, that the nervous asthenia, so spread nowadays, it has its cure also in the cross, namely in understanding the superior meaning of the difficulties of life, and in their useful suffering, for the spiritual growth of the man. Anyway, the prayer, by strengthening the soul with godlike power, it brings strengthening also to the body-s nerves. It brings tranquility and, through this, it sooth the agitation which prolongs itself also in nerves.
[112] Quoted work, col. 781.

prayers"[113]. And again: "Somebody could see the power of the Saints' prayer also in that fact that Paul, who was running all across the world as a winged man, he was living in prisons, was suffering whippings, was wearing chains, was living covered in blood and in dangers, was resurrecting dead people, was healing sicknesses, he wasn't though trusting any of these in saving people, but he surrounded his soul with prayers; and, after he was doing these signs and rose dead people, he was running to prayer, as an athlete towards the crown, on a stadium. This is for the prayer causes also the resurrection of dead and all the other things. This is for the power the water has upon the trees, it is that had by the Saints' prayers upon the life"[114].

And again: "The prayer is the occasion of the salvation, the generator of the immortality, the not-crumbled wall of the Church, the not-plundered shelter, fearsome to demons, savior to us, to the right-believers"[115]. And: "Like all the kingdoms follow to an empress who enters a city, likewise all the virtues, together with the prayer that enters a soul"[116]. And then again: "What the foundation is to a house that the prayer is to the soul. We must, firstly, to lay this one down, as a basis and as a root, and then to diligently build upon it, the temperance and the care for poor and all the laws of Christ"[117]. "The zealous prayer it is the light of the mind and of the soul, unquenched and ceaseless light[118]. That's why the cunning one throws tens of thousands of piles of thoughts, crowded and entangled, into our minds. The [113] Quoted work, col. 783. The prayer makes the man church of God, but also priest of Him. This is for Christ Himself is in the soul that prays, together with the Holy Ghost, Who prays within us with untold sighs, or He imprints Himself, in our self, into prayer. This is for the church isn't only the place where the man prays, but also the place where Christ is.

[116] Quoted work, col. 786.

[117] Quoted work, quoted place. The prayer is fundamental to the soul, for in it there is Christ, the hypostasis of the human nature in general, so also of our nature. The horizontality of serving the people grows up out of the verticality of the union with Christ, or out of the depth which through us reaches further from us, into God. Out of that spring of infinite depth, there come out the powers of serving people, likewise the water that waters the plains comes from the depth of the earth.

[118] The prayer rises from the evidence and the feeling of the presence of God and it strengthens this evidence and feeling. And God gives a meaning to all things. Through Him we know what we live for: for our consummation out of Him, through the love for all people, seen also them, as we are, in the light of the eternal value of each man, light shown us by the Son of God, by becoming a man forever and ever.

things which we have never thought at, these are gathered by him during the prayer and he overflows them within our soul"[119]. "Great weapon is the prayer, great insurance"[120].

And of God speaker (the Theologian) says: "Let the remembrance of God be to you more often that the breathing"[121]. And again: "Think at God more uninterrupted than you are breathing"[122].

Saint Isaac says, at his turn: "Without the ceaseless prayer you cannot come close to God"[123]. And: "Giving to the mind, after the tiredness of the prayer, another worry, it means causing the scattering of the cogitation"[124]. And: "Any prayer, in which the body doesn't get tired and the heart doesn't get sad, it must be reckoned as an abortion, because that prayer is without a soul"[125]. And Saint John Climacus says: "The prayers is, according to its nature, the closeness to and the union of the man with God; and according to the work, the prayer is the power that sustains the world, reconcilement with God, the mother of the tears and in the same time their daughter, the sins' expiation, bridge against temptations, the middle wall against troubles, the crushing of the wars, the work of the angels, the food of all the bodiless groups, the future gladness, the borderless work, the source of the virtues, the one who causes the gifts (charismas), the unseen prosperity, the food of the soul, the enlightenment of the mind, the ax that cuts off the despair, the proving of the trust, the escape from sadness, the richness of the monks, the treasure of the hesychast, the diminution of the anger, the mirror of the advancement, the showing of the measures, the unveiling of the reached state, the

The more we want to gather the mind in a sole essential though of the prayer, the more its contrary tendency tries to resist us, by getting scattered in all sorts of small thoughts. unveiling of the future things, the sign of the glory. The prayer is the judge, of that one who prays, and the judgment and the chair of judgment of Christ, before the chair of the future judgment"[126]. And again: "The prayer is nothing else by the estrangement from the seen and unseen world"[127].

And Saint Nilus says: "If you want to pray, reject everything, to inherit everything"[128]. And again: "the prayer is the ascension of the mind to God"[129]. And again: "The prayer is the speaking of the mind to God"[130]. And then: "Like the bread is food to the body and the virtues to the soul, so is the spiritual prayer to the food of the mind"[131].

Enough about these; but it is now the appropriate time to shortly speaking also about the bodily food, namely about its weight, quantity, and quality.

30. About the bodily food; how must feed himself the one who appeases himself.

It was written: "You, son of man, eat your bread with the scale and drink your water with measure" (Ezek. 4: 10-11), so that the one who strives for God, to be able to live on these. This is because: "if you do not give blood, as it was said, you won't take Ghost"[132]. But the great Paul says also: "I oppress my body and I enslave it, lest by preaching to others, to become myself

Into prayer are shown and are lived the future things. It opens the horizon of the endless perspectives of life; it makes transparent the measures reached by a man; it is the judgment done to himself by the one who prays, in front of God, for in it is present also Christ sitting on the judgment chair. It is the anticipated living of the future life.

Only when you are free of everything, you are master over everything, namely you have everything through love and through understanding. And you have them, especially, into God, in Whom it is everything. You have all things into God, by being united with Him into prayer. Anything on which we tie ourselves with passion, it narrows our sight and the power of embracing everybody. This narrowing produces also the defined ideas, theoretically known; even the ideas of a theoretical knowledge about God and those ones regarding the salvation. Where isn't prayer, it is, that's why, resistance of ideas and division.

untried" (1 Cor. 9: 27). Likewise, David the Prophet: "My knees have become weak due to the fasting and my body has changed due to the lack of the oil" (Ps. 108: 23). But also the Speaker about God (the Theologian) says: "Through nothing one serves God so much as through the unpleasant suffering; and the tears set in movement His love for people"[133]. Also Saint Isaac says: "Like a mother takes care of her baby, so Christ takes care of a body which suffers and He is always nigh to such a body"[134]. And again: "In the filled up stomach, there isn't the knowledge of the mysteries of God"[135]. And: "like the ones who sow with tears, they will reap the sheave of the gladness (Ps. 125: 6), likewise to the unpleasant suffering it follows the joy"[136]. And: "Blessed is the one who stops himself from all the sweet suffering, which separates him from the One Who has built him"[137]. And again: "For many times, being tempted by the things from the right hand, and by the things from the left hand[138], and by testing myself, often, in these two ways, and by receiving countless wounds from the enemy, but also being found worthy of great hidden help, I have gained experience to myself, out of the long time of the years and, out of the trial and of the grace of God, I have learnt these things: that the foundation of all the good things and the liberation from under the slavery of the enemy and the path that leads to light, they consists ion these two modes: in gathering yourself in a sole place and to always be fasting, namely to submit yourself to the canon (to discipline yourself), through the restraining of the stomach in a wise and sapient manner, by sitting still and by always thinking at God.

[134] Quoted work, Word 56, p. 223: "Like a father takes care of his child, so Christ takes care of a body that suffers for Him and it is always nigh to His Body". The body of the one who suffers for Christ, it is the body of Christ Himself.

[135] Quoted work, Quoted word, p. 223: "In the loving of pleasures body, there doesn't dwell the knowledge of God".

[136] Unidentified.

[137] Unidentified. The Father oppose the "bad suffering" (χαχοπάθεια), or the painful suffering, to the "sweet feeling", or to the passions of pleasure. The cross is a bad suffering. The cross makes God transparent, for it detaches the man from the world's things. The sweet suffering separates the man from God, because it ties him to the world, through the pleasures offered by the world to the body.

[138] The man can be tempted by the worldly and evil things, but also by the achieved virtues which can determine him to boast himself; likewise through pleasures and pains, which can determine him to niggle.

This is for out of this it comes the submission of the senses, and out of this the watchfulness; through this are tamed the passions which move within body; out of this, the gentleness of the gestures; out of this, the luminous movements of the cogitation; out of this, the zeal for the godlike deeds of the virtue; out of this, the high and thin meanings; out of this, the unmeasured tears which are born all the time and the remembrance of the death; out of this, the clean wisdom, totally stranger to any hallucination which tempts the cogitation; out of this the understanding and the sharpness of the knowledge of the things from far away; out of this, the mysterious deeper meanings, which are seen by the understanding into the godlike words, the more inner movements born within soul and the diversity and the difference among the ghosts discerned by the powers of the Saints and the true visions, which are stranger to the vain hallucinations; out of this, the fear of the ways and of the paths from the ocean of the cogitation[139]; out of this, the flame of the zeal, which overcomes every danger and crosses through all fear; out of this, the warmth which despises every lust and it destroys it through thought[140] and it produces the forgetfulness of all the perishable things, together with the memory of others. And to say it shortly, out of this it comes the freedom[141] of the true man and the joy of the soul and the resurrection and the resting with Christ in the Kingdom of Heavens[142].

And if somebody disregards these two (the gathering in one place and the ceaseless fasting), let him know that he will lose not only all the things mentioned before, but he will also shake the foundation of all virtues by despising these two. And, as these ones are in the soul the beginning and the end of the godlike work, and the door and the way towards Christ, if he [139] The cogitation leads the man on countless ways, to countless opinions and decisions, some of them savior, others leading to perdition. There is an ocean of countless possibilities, given to the man towards choosing. But, through the fear of losing the soul, one can avoid the paths which lead to the shipwreck in the depth of the ocean. The sailors and the helmsmen know that in time of storm, one must choose only a certain way, in order to not be swallowed by waves.

[140] The warmth of the clean enthusiasm for the good things, it overwhelms and destroys the inferior warmth of the bodily lust, or of the anger, or of the ambition.

[141] The true freedom is the freedom from passions; it is characteristic to the true and strong man. Until the man still is enslaved to some inferior passions, he still has something of the animal that moves under the power of the instincts.

[142] It is about the "resting" from the tormenting of the passions and of the worries. It is united with the liberty.

keeps them he will remains within them; but, if he goes out of them or if he jumps out of them, he will reach in the opposite things, namely he will walk from place to place with the body, and he will be greedy in an inappropriate manner, and all the things alike"[143].

And in another place: "The ones who are idle and drowsy, they are scared of, and they are troubled, not only by this ascesis and of the ones alike, but even by the sound of the leaves of the trees, and they are brought down even by the tiniest weakness and the quickly go back to the previous things. And the true and experienced ones, they do not satiate themselves even with green vegetables and, by feeding themselves with roots of dry plants, they do not want to taste something before the established time, even if they must stay, due to their weakness and to their helplessness, lying down of the floor, with the eyes cloudy due to the great exhaustion of the body. And even if they would necessarily come close, by doing this, to the exit from the body, they do not let themselves to be defeated and to fall, not even then, due to their strengthened will. This is because they want and the desire to force their own nature for the love for God[144]. And they decide rather to tire themselves for virtue than to keep the temporary life and the whole resting it can give. And, when the temptations come upon them, they rather enjoy themselves for being consummated in them, or they become consummate. And neither in the tormenting pains they must endure in temptations, the do not hesitate in their love for God, but they are – until they pass away – mastered by the longing to manly endure the temptations and they do not renounce, for they are made consummate within them"[145].

By following, also us, to these ones, and listening to the one who commands: "Walk the imperial way and to not deviate to the left or to the right" (Prov. 4: 27), we are giving to you also, [144] The cross is to them an occasion to prove the strength of their ghost. Through this strength, in which there is present also the power of God, they pass to life and then, at the end of the world, also to resurrection. Neither the coming of the death, does weaken their love for Christ (Rom. 8: 35; Hebr. 11: 33), respectively the faith in Him, in order to determine them to transgress His will. The conscience of the connection with Christ is stronger than the fear and the pain of the death.

both a way and a rule of the mid way. The mid way it is like it follows.

31. How must nourish himself the one who lives in ascesis, on Monday, on Wednesday, and on Friday.

In these three days of the week, namely on Monday, on Wednesday, and on Friday, you fast to the ninth hour[146], namely eat only once a day, by imparting yourself with six ounces of bread[147]; take also dry food, as you need, but with temperance. Water, if you want, up to 3 or 4 glasses per day. Follow the canon apostolic no. 69, which rules: "If a certain bishop, or presbyter, or deacon, or reader, or singer, doesn't fast during the Holy First Forty Days of the Easter Fasting, or on Wednesday and on Friday, let him be defrocked, except the case they would have been impeded by a bodily sickness. And if it is laymen, let him be excommunicated (be cursed). And for Monday it has been ordered after, by the Holy Fathers.

32. How one must nourish himself on Tuesday and on Thursday.

On these two days, namely on Tuesday and on Thursday, you eat twice a day. At lunch, take six ounces of bread, something boiled, and something of the dry foods, with temperance. Take also wine mixed with water, up to 3 or 4 glasses, if you need. And in the evening, take three ounces of bread and something of the dry foods, or some fruits and wine mixed with water, a glass, or at most two, if you are very thirsty. This is because the thirst helps also the tears very much, if it is accompanied by taking vigil, as Saint John Climacus says: "The thirst and the taking vigil crushed the heart; and out of crushed heart there gushed out the tears"[148]. And Saint Isaac says: "You get thirsty of God, in order to be filled up by His love"[149].

And, if you choose to eat only once, on these two days, you will be very right. This is for the first source and the mother and the root and the foundation of all good things (virtues), there are the fasting and the restraint. This is because even one from outside says: "Chose the good life. And the habituation will makes it sweet". But also the Great Basil says: "Where the assertiveness of the will is, nothing impedes it". And another of the God-bearers says: "The beginning of the fruition is the flower; and the beginning of the doing (towards consummation) it is the restraint"[150].

But all of these and the things alike them, will seem to be difficult to some people, or even as being impossible. But the one who takes heed to the fruition that emerges out of these ones, and who had in mind what shininess these ones usually bring, he will reckon them as easy to do and, with the help of our Lord Jesus Christ and through own perseverance, according to the individual power, he will herald these as easy and through words and through deeds, and the power will seal them through these. This is because Saint Isaac says: "Sparse bread at the table it cleans the soul of the one who eats it freed from all the passions"[151]. And: "take the medicine of the life from the table of the ones who are fasting, and who take vigil, and who toil into the Lord, and awake your soul from death. This is because the loved One rests in their middle, sanctifying the foods, and He transforms the unpleasant bitterness from within them, into His unspoken sweetness. His spiritual and heavenly servants overshadow them and their holy foods"[152]. And: "the fragrance of the one who is fasting, it is all-sweet, and the meeting with him makes glad the hearts of the ones who have the gift of discernment; and the living of the restraint one is pleasant to God"[153].

33. How they must feed themselves on Saturday; and about taking vigil; and what they must eat during this time.

On each Saturday, except the Holy Sunday, you must eat, as it has been ordered for Tuesday and Thursday, by the decision of the Holy Canons, for you must take vigil during the night towards the Sundays of the year, except the week of the cheese, and except the case you have take vigil during the week, for the great imperial holidays or the ones of the great saints.

[153] Quoted work, head no. 43, p. 181.

For in this case, by taking that vigil, you leave it the one towards Sunday. Although, either is like that or otherwise, eat on Sundays, twice. This is for it is useful to force yourself in taking vigil during the night. That's why also after the taking vigil you must do for a royal feast which falls in the middle of the week, it is very useful to do also that one towards Sunday, for a great earning will follow to you out of that, very soon. Better said, "It will rise to you, as it was said, the morning light, and your vestments will be filled up, quickly, with shininess" (Isa. 63: 8). This is for also Saint Isaac says: "The beginning of each fight against the sin and against the lust, it is the tiredness of the taking vigil and of the fasting, and especially to the ones who fight the sin from within themselves. Out of these ones can be seen the sign of the hatred against the sin and against the lust, at those ones who wage them this unseen war. This is because almost all the passions' attacks start to diminish through fasting. And after fasting, great help in this fight is brought by the taking vigil. The one who during his entire life loves the company of this pair, he makes himself the friend of the temperance. A contrary, the comforting of the stomach it is the beginning of all evils and the drowsiness of the sleep it is the one that lights the body's lust. Thus, the holy way of the Lord, and the foundation of all the virtues, are the fasting and the taking vigil, in serving God"[154]. And again: "Within the soul that sparks due to the often remembrance of God and due to the wakeful taking vigil, during day and night, the Lord build up towards strengthening that soul, the cloud that overshadows him during the day, and the fire that light him during the night (cf. Exod. 13, 21-22); and from within the darkness, the light will shine"[155]. And again: "Choose to yourself, as full of delectation work, the ceaseless taking vigil during the nights, through which all the Father disrobed the old man and they were found worthy of mind's renewal. During those hours, the soul feels the immortal life; and in this feeling the soul disrobes itself of the passions' darkness, and it receives the Holy Ghost"[156]. And again: "Keep the work of the taking vigil, in order to find the comforting within your soul"[157]; and: "Do not reckon, man, that in the whole living of the monks there is a greater work than taking vigil through the night"[158]; and: "On the monk who perseveres in the taking vigil united with the discernment (with the right reckoning) of the mind, do not consider him as bearing a body. For this truly is a work of the angelic group"[159]; and again: "The soul striving in this wise work of taking vigil, he will have cherubim eyes, by the fact that he is focused and he looks at a heavenly view"[160].

[156] Quoted work, Epistle no. III, p. 364. Through taking vigil, the old man is disrobed, for in it he researches on himself in all the creases of his soul, and he gets sick of what he sees evil in there. During the taking vigil, by rejecting the passions' darkness, he penetrates in the soul's

But you do this taking vigil in prayers, in singing, and in reading, with cleanness and without scattering and with crushing of heart, alone and with a beloved and of the same living congregation[161]. And after each taking vigil give to yourself also a small comforting for the tiredness consequently to the taking vigil, by eating and drinking something. Namely, eat three ounces of bread, adding some dry food, as much as it is enough to you. But take heed, lest in the days you are fasting to the ninth hour, by taking the vigil, to leave the fasting due to it. You must do also this one, and not to leave also that one (Mt. 23: 23). This is because it has been ordered to do the comforting after you have finished the taking vigil.

34. How you must on Sundays; and about other things; besides these, also about toiling and humbleness.

clean deep, and he encounters God there, namely the new life. Because this research also produces a sharp feeling of the passions' ugliness, and a deep desire after the clean life, which, being unveiled or reestablished by the man, it is being filled by the love of God. And within this thrilling love, he feels the Holy Ghost working. In the darkness of the night, the one who takes vigil disrobes himself of the passions' darkness, which is tied to the seen things of the world and to the passionate sticking – and therefore blind – to these things, and he is filled up by the light of God Who appears to him when he no longer stops at the sensitive world.

[157] The taking of vigil, it is not a motionless state, but a work, a probing that penetrates increasingly deeper into the soul, and in the same time it disrobes the passions from the soul and it unveils in the deep where it encounters God, the comforting He brings.

[158] Quoted work, Word no. 29, p. 122.

[159] Quoted work, Word no. 29, p. 123. In fact, the one who takes vigil during the night, he penetrates with the cogitation and with the understanding, soothed of any other worries, the world from beyond the sensitive world, where he feels God, like angels do.

[160] Quoted place.

[161] The taking vigil isn't simple theoretical research, but a deepening into the own being and in the meanings of the song and read things, as in front of God, into the ghost of the prayer and with the heart crushed by humbleness and by the conscience of the sinfulness. Only in this way the taking vigil continuously renews the man, disrobing him of the old man. Only in this way it is feeling and intuiting of the presence of God.

Likewise, eat twice on all Sundays, like on Saturdays. Keep this rule without deviation, except in case of illness. Do the same also in the allowed days which are permitted by the Holy Fathers after a long-time validated custom, and to some newer reasons, either godlike or not. On these days neither we eat only once nor do we eat dry foods. But we indulge ourselves of all useful and not stained foods, and of vegetables, but with restraint and in the ordered quantity. This is because always, the best thing is to restrain ourselves in all things. But, in cases of sickness, we can impart ourselves, as I said, without feeling shame, with all useful and lawful foods, which sustain the body. This is for the Holy Fathers taught us that we must be killers of passions, and not killers of the body[162].

Also, you owe to taste a little of all ordered things, namely of all things allowed through promise towards glorifying God, and to thank Him, and to not boast yourself[163]. But avoid gathering more than you need. This is "for the scarcity of the things, as Saint Isaac says, teaches the man, against his will, the restraint. This is because when we have them plentifully and we use them as much as we want, we cannot master ourselves"[164]. You shall not love the body's resting. For, also according to Pious Isaac, "the soul that love God, has achieved the resting into God"[165]. Choose, rather, the humbleness through toiling and suffering. This is because "the toiling and the humbleness earn God", as one of the saints writes[166].

[162] This is a concentrated formulation of what one must aim and avoid by fasting. The Christendom isn't against the body, which is created by God and destined to resurrection and to the eternal life, but against the passions which fill the body up with disorder, and against soul's and body's living in an existence deprived of true life and light. The fasting is just in favor of the body, and not detrimental to it.

[163] All things are given by God and, by tasting them we glorify Him and thank Him for their wonderful fitting, also from this point of view, to our life. But if we sink ourselves too much into the pleasure produces by them, we will forget about God. WE must always to keep the balance (dialectical) between tasting them and detaching us from them. Only in this way we glorify God and thank Him for them and we reckon Him above them. We mustn't lean too much either towards a side or another; we mustn't either sink ourselves in them or despise them, by forgetting about our condition that needs them, and of the fact that we owe to give thanks to God for he took account of our humble condition, for through them to be us able to raise ourselves to Him.

[165] Quoted work, Word no. 23, p. 90. Another paradox: not by resting the body one gains the resting into God, but through the pains and by restraining the body. This is for in these cases the soul searches for support into God; through cross one reaches to resurrection.

35. About how we must feed ourselves and live during the Forty Days of the Holy Fasting Period of the Easter.

About the food and the living during the Easter fasting period, we reckon as unnecessarily to speak to you in detail and in a special manner. This is because as it has been ordered to you to live on the days when you are fasting to the ninth hour, so it is due to be done also during the Easter fasting, except on Saturdays and on Sundays; better said, if there is possible, with even more care, with even more watchfulness, especially during the Holy and Great Forty Days Period. This period is the tithe of the whole year and the cause of the crowns of the ascesis, of the ones who obtain victory into Christ, through the light bearer day of the godlike Resurrection of the Lord.

36. About the right reckoning, especially, and that the measured work doesn't tend towards glory; about obedience.

But these ones and the ones close to these ones, you must fulfill them with a detailed right reckoning, for the harmony and for the state of peace of our twofold being. "With wisdom, he says, the house is being built, and with understanding it is being finished; with feeling are the chambers filled up with all the expensive and good richness" (Prov. 24: 3-4). But, also the godlike Thalassius writes: "The lack of richness and the tribulation, accompanied by the right reckoning of the rationality, they are an imperial way. That's why, the harshness lacking the right reckoning or reckless, it is useless, as also allowing all the reckless mistakes, either on one side, or in another, contrary to the first one[167]. And the Pious Isaac says: "To the resting of the body there follows the going out from appeasement and the disturbance caused by thoughts; and to the unmeasured work there follows the idleness; and to the idleness, the going out from quietude. But this going out is different from the first one. To the first going out from quietude there follows the war of the body's lusts; to the second one, out of idleness, there follows the parting with the place of the quietude and the moving from place to place. And the work with tiredness that keeps the measure, it doesn't search for glory. Its diminution multiplies the pleasure, and the lack of measure multiplies the going out of the thoughts"[168].

And Saint Maximos says: "Do not pay all your attention towards the body, but decide an ascesis to it, according to the power, and turn your mind towards the things from inside. This is because "the bodily ascesis is useful to few things, but the right-believing is useful to everything" (1 Tim. 4: 8)[169].

And if the body's balance pan attracts and dominates and burdens the soul's balance pan, lowering it towards irregular and soul corrupting movements – because "the body lusts against the Ghost and the Ghost against the body (Gal. 5> 17) – you, by braking your body with the rein of the restraint, mortify it, until, even unwillingly, it becomes easy to wear, and it obeys what is better. Remember the great Paul who says: "As much as our outside man is being corrupted, that much the one from inside strives daily" (2 Cor. 4: 16), but also the Saint Isaac: "Give yourself to die in ascesis and do not live carelessly; this is because not only the ones who received death for the faith into Christ are martyrs, but also the ones dying for keeping His commands"[170]. And this one says also: "Better is to die fighting (the sin), than to live in mistakes"[171]. And again: "Before everything, do all things with the advice and asking your spiritual Father into the Lord. For, thus, by the grace of Christ, these things will seem to you easy to bear and as on a flat road, even the difficult and opposite things"[172].

37. How the one who lives in ascesis must cross the afternoon time to the sunset. And that we must believe that the sharing of the godlike gifts it has been given to us according to our toil and work.

[168] Quoted work, Word no. 55, p. 220. The Right reckoning, which doesn't exaggerate neither in a tormenting ascesis, nor in all sort of concessions, is accompanied by modesty. It doesn't want to shows itself as glorified through harshness, but it doesn't draw the attention either through too much lenience. It doesn't want to come on plain sight. And, generally, it doesn't allow the thoughts to get out from the grip they are kept in. The first coming out of the thoughts, that one that is consequent to the body's resting, it drives to adultery; through those thought the man searches for occasions to fornication. The second coming out of the thoughts, due to drowsiness, to boredom, and to idleness, it pulls the man to vagrancy.

After you have strengthened yourself – as it is appropriate to the ascetic – according to the godlike Paul, who says that the ascetic must "restrain himself from everything" (1 Cor. 9: 25), read, while sitting, as much as you can, the writing of the Holy Father about watchfulness. Then sleep for an hour, if the days are big. And then, by awakening yourself, work a little with the hands, also keeping the prayer. After these, you pray, as it has been shown before. Read, meditate, and force yourself to become humble, in order to reckon that you are below all people. This is because it was said: "the one who extols himself he will be humbled, and the one who humbles himself he will be extolled" (Lk. 19: 11): and: "the one who reckons that he stays, let him take heed to not fall" (1 Cor. 10: 12): and: "The Lord stays against the pride ones, and to the humble ones He gives them grace (Jas. 4: 6); and: "The beginning of the man's haughtiness stays in not seeing the Lord" (The Book of Wisdom of Sirach[173] 10: 12); and: "The proud ones transgress the law, very"(Ps. 118[174]: 51); and: "Not cogitating the high things, but letting yourself to be taken away with the humble ones" (Rom. 12:16).

But also, Saint John Chrysostom says. "This one is the one who knows himself the best, he who doesn't reckon himself as being something. This is because nothing is so pleasant to God than somebody who reckons himself together with the last ones"[175]. And Saint Isaac says: "The mysteries are unveiled to the ones who are humble in thought"[176]. And: "Where the humbleness sprouts out, there springs out the glory of God"[177]. And: "The self-appreciation precedes the rebuking"[178]. Also, Saint Barsanuphius says: "If you truly want to save yourself, obey with the deed. Raise your feet from the ground and elevate mind to the sky. And let your cogitation be there, day and night. And despise yourself with all the power you have. Force yourself to reckon that you are below any human being. This is the true way and there is no other to the one who wants to be saved, into Christ, "The One Who strengthens him" (Phlm. 4: 13). "The one who wants this, let him running in order to take it" (1 Cor. 9:

And Climacus says: "I haven't fasted, I haven't taken vigil, I haven't slept on the floor, but I have humbled myself and this have saved me in a short time, by pursuing this before any other thing: to be disregarded"[180]. And again, Saint Barsanuphius says: "If you do not worry about anything, you come closer to the city; and if you are disregarded by the people, you will inhabit the city. And if you will be dead to each man, you will inherit the city and its treasures"[181]. And: "If you want to be saved, care to be disregarded and run towards what stays in front of you"[182]. And according to Pious John, the disciple of this Saint, trying to be disregarded it means, to not yourself reckon as being equal to anybody, and to not say about some good deed that: "I did it also".

Then, by sitting again, pray in a clean and not-scattered way, until the evening comes. And then sing the usual Vespers and do the benediction the priest utters at the end of the religious service, while believing out of a clean heart that after our toiling and pain for virtue, and according to the measure of our work, we will be rewarded by God with the crown of the gifts and with the showing of the ascesis and with His comforting, as the godlike Psalmist says: "According to the multitude of my pains, in my heart, Your comforting gladdened my soul" (Ps. 93[183]: 19). For the Savior says: "Come to Me all the tired and burdened ones, and I will rest you" (Mt. 11: 28). And also, the great Paul says: "If we duffer together with Christ, we will also be glorified together. This is because I reckon that the sufferings of this era aren't worthy of the glory that will be unveiled to us" (Rom. 8: 17-18). For also the wise in the godlike things Maximos says: "As they say, the difference in sharing the godlike good thing it has as cause the each one's measure of the faith. For, as we believe, so we have also the strengthening towards doing good deeds. And the one who works, according to the measure of his deeds he shows his faith, and he receives the measure of the grace, as he has believed. And the one who doesn't work, according to the measure of his lack of working he shows the measure of his lack of faith and, according to his lack of faith he is deprived of grace. So, the envious one does wrong envying the ones who do good deeds. This is because it depends on him, and not on somebody else, to make the decision to believe and to work, and according to the measure of the faith to receive the grace that comes to him"[184].

Therefore, let's ask, out of our soul, for being us given to live the other part of our life and to reach its end, without pain, not-rebuked, in peace, and, in addition to all these, so be us given a good answer when we will stay before the fearsome judgment chair of our Lord and God and Savior Jesus Christ.

38. Greater than the Word, It Is the Clean Prayer.

In addition to the shown things, let you know this, brother, that all the methods, and all the guidance, and, if you want, the whole diversity of the deeds, they have been established and ordered because we cannot pray into heart in a clean and not-scattered way. This is because, after fulfilling these, with the benevolence and with the grace of our lord Jesus Christ, by leaving everything, we are united above word in an unmediated way with Him, with the One and unitary and unifier, as it was said by the known speaker about God: `God unites Himself with "gods" and He makes Himself known by them; and this is the illumination out of hypostasis of the Holy Ghost into the heart"[185]. This illumination is born, as it has been said, out of the mentioned clean and not-scattered prayer, within heart[186].

This thing happens rarely and only one in a thousand is found worthy, by the grace of Christ, to advance to this state. And to float over it and to be found worthy of the clean prayer and to reach to the unveiling of the mysteries of the future age, are found worthy very few people, whom are chosen from [184] St Maximos the Confessor, Five Hundred Heads, The Third Hundred, 35; G.P. 90, 1271 CD.

[185] St Gregory of Nazianzus, Word no. 34, 13; G.P. 36, 253 A. "ενυπόστατος ελλαμψις" it is an illumination which springs out from the hypostasis himself of the Holy Ghost, Who dwells within heart. This illumination is felt as light of His Person, or it lightens Him as Person, who has entered the relation with the man as person.

[186] But the Holy Ghost is the subject of our prayer, together with us. That's why the illumination of the Ghost is born out of the clean prayer within heart, in the transparent deep of our being, which vibrates due to the communication that takes place between him and the Holy Ghost.

generation to generation, by the benevolence of Christ. This is because Saint Isaac says: "Like out of tens of thousands of people, barely there is one who has fulfilled the commandments and the lawful things, and he has reached the cleanness of the soul, likewise, barely one in a thousand was found worthy to reach, with much self-guarding, the clean prayer, and to break this border and to enter this mystery. This is because, most of the people weren't found worthy of the clean prayer, at all, but only a few ones. But at that mystery from after it and from beyond it, barely reaches only one, from generation to generation, by the grace of Christ"[187]. And a little further, he says: "And if barely one out of a generation prays with cleanness, what will we say about the spiritual prayer?" "The whole spiritual prayer, also according to him, has liberated itself from movement". "And the one who changes, it is below the spiritual one"[188].

That's why, also you, it you want to be found worthy of this kind of mystery, with the deed and with the work, or of the experiencing itself of Christ Jesus, force yourself always and in every moment and in every work, to reach to pray in a clean and not-scattered manner; for, thus, to advance like from the toddler to "the consummate man, at the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. 4: 13) and to be imparted, together with the faithful and wise steward (Lk. 12: 42), with happiness, with praise, and with rewarding, like one who has thoughtfully administrated your rationalities (words), by living with consideration[189]. That's why, let you not doubt ever, like Saint Philemon writes about this: "Son, if God will find you worthy, either during the night, or during the day, pray with the mind in a clean and not-scattered manner, to not keep some rule of yours; but tend with all your power to remain stuck to God and He will illuminate your heart concerning the spiritual work"[190].

[187] Quoted work, Word no. 32, pp. 135-136.

[188] Quoted work, Word no. 32, p. 136. The prayer which is clean of thoughts, it still isn't a spiritual prayer, or totally into the Ghost. This is because in the clean prayer the man still can advance towards being even more with God. But in the spiritual prayer the man has reached the stillness or the total resting into God; for he has consummately united himself with God, not having where to advance now, once God is borderless in the richness of His life. The spiritual prayer doesn't change, doesn't cease; it is the stillness as stability into prayer.

[189] To administrate thoughtfully the rationalities, through which it is being actualized that one rationality of our being, it means to fully actualize our being's unit and all its power, by uniting them with The One.

[190] The Romanian Philokalia, vol. IV, p. 170.

And one of the men made wise by God says: "If you want to celebrate the Liturgy - while still being into the body – like a bodiless one, secretly earn to yourself the ceaseless prayer into your heart, and you soul will become like and angel even from before death". This kind of things also writes Saint Isaac. For, being him asked by somebody, which is the top of all the toils in this work, namely in that of the appeasing, that somebody reaching there to find out that he has reached the consummation of the living, h answered like this: "When he will be found worthy of persevering into prayer. This is because when he will reach this, he has reached on top of all virtues. And since then, he has become dwelling place of the Holy Ghost. This is because if somebody hasn't received in a sure manner, the grace of the Comforter, he cannot do this prayer without effort and without interruption. For the Ghost, he says, when dwells in some man, that one doesn't cease praying for the Ghost Himself always prays. Then, either he sleeps or he takes vigil, his prayer doesn't cease in his soul. But either he eats, or he drinks, and whatever he would to, and even in a deep sleep, the good fragrances and the respirations of the prayer are moving within his heart effortlessly. Then he no longer parts with the prayer. And in all his hours, even if the prayer ceases externally, it secretly celebrates the Holy Liturgy inside him. For "the silence of the clean ones is prayer", says one bearer of Christ[191]. "And the clean heart's, and cogitation's movements are gentle voices, through which secretly sings to the hidden One"[192].

And many other amongst God bearers, taught by grace through the experiencing itself, said such wonderful things.

39. About the Number of the Prostrations on a Day and on a Night.

And about the number of the prostrations, we know that the godlike Fathers ordered to be three hundred. So many we must do on each day and night, on the five days of the week. This is because on Saturday and on Sunday, as also on other days established by tradition, and even on some weeks, we have been ordered to stop doing prostrations, for some mysterious and untold reasons. But there are some people who exceed this number. And others lessen it - each one according to his power and will. Therefore, you also do them according to your power. But truly happy, and this in a multiplied way, is the one who forces himself in all the things regarding God. This is because "the Kingdom of Heavens it taken by force and the ones who force it, they kidnap it" (Mt. 11: 12).

40. Not only according to the fight and the measure of our work it is done the sharing of the godlike gifts, as it was said before, but also according to the habituation, to the skillfulness, to the faith, and to our natural disposition.

It is good to know that, not only according to the measure of our struggle and work it is done to us the sharing of the gifts, as it was said before, but also according to the living and skillfulness, and even according to our faith in what lies ahead for us, and according to our natural disposition seeded into our nature. For, says Saint Maximos: "The mind is the organ of the wisdom; the rationality is the organ of the knowledge; the conviction[193] of both of them is the organ of the faith imprinted in them both; and the natural love for people is the organ of the charisma of the healings. This is because every godlike gift has within us a natural organ, (capable of receiving and working that gift (E. l. t.'s. n.)), as power, as habituation, or as disposition. For instance, the one who has cleaned his mind of all the sensitive imaginings, he receives the wisdom; the one who has made his rationality master upon the passions related to the nature, namely upon anger and lust, he receives the knowledge; the one who has in mind and in rationality the unshaken conviction about God, he receives that faith that can do everything (Mk. 9; 23); and the one who has achieved the love for people, after the consummate destroying of the love for the self, he receives the gift of the healings"[194]. And these things are thus.

But take heed for nobody to know your work, except the abbot and your spiritual guide. And pray for us, the unworthy ones, who speak about good, but we don't do it, to be found worthy firstly to do the things pleasant to God, and then to speak about them to other, and to urge others to do these things. "For the one who did and taught, according to the godlike word, that one great will be called" (Mt. 5> 19).

And the All-Keeper and All-Merciful Lord, to strengthen you and to guide you, to listen to these things with understanding and to do them with your whole will. This is because "not the hearers of the law are righteous at God, as Saint Paul says, but its fulfillers" (Rom. 2: 13). And let Him be leading you to every good and savior thing, and guiding you towards the sanctified understanding work into Ghost, that work that lies ahead of us, through the prayers of the saints. Amen.

But because we have spoken, just before this, also about the working right-reckoning, it is now the appropriate time to speak briefly, according to our power, also about the general right-reckoning, and about the all-consummate one. This is because, according to the famous Fathers, this is greater than all virtues.

41. About the General and Consummate Right-reckoning. Who Is the One Who Lives Contrary to the Nature, and Bodily; Who Is the One Who Lives Accordingly to the Nature and In a Soul's Manner; and Who Lives above Nature and Spiritually?

The one who lives contrary to the nature and bodily, he has totally lost his power of discernment (the right reckoning). And the one who restrains himself from the evil things and has started to do the good – as it was written: "Avoid the evil and do the good" (Ps. 33: 13)[195] – that one, as one who is a beginner and gives his ear to the teaching, he comes to a little feeling of the right-reckoning, as much as a beginner is able to. And the one who lives according to the nature and to in soul's manner, as one who work with understanding and judgment, due to what reason he is reckoned to be in the middle, he looks at his measure and he discerns the things regarding himself, and the things of the ones who are like him. Finally, the one who lives above nature and spiritually, that one, as one who has crossed the borders characteristic to the beginners and to the one from amidst, and, with the help of Christ, he has advanced towards the consummate one, or towards that illumination from hypostasis[196], and towards the all-consummate discernment, he also sees his nature in the most limpid way[197]. He sees and discerns everybody very clearly, in the same time, but he isn't seen or discerned by anybody, though, on the other hand, he becomes seen and discerned and likened, as one who is an is called spiritual man, but not on paper and with ink, but through work and grace[198]. This is for the godlike Apostle says: "The spiritual one judges everybody, but he isn't judged by anybody" (1 Cor. 2: 15).

42. And Again about Discernment, through Exemplification.

From amongst these ones, the first one resembles to the one who walks in the deep, sad, and dark night. That's why, by roving in the darkness where he has nothing to lean against, he not only doesn't see or discern himself, but he also doesn't see where he heads or walks to, as the Savior says: "The one who walks into darkness doesn't know where he goes" (Jn. 12: 35). The second one resembles to the one who walks in the transparent night, which is lighten by stars; that's why, for he is lighten a little by the stars' rays, he slowly advances, often hitting his feet against rocks, due to his lack of discernment, and suffering fallings. This one sees and discerns himself a little, as in a shadow, as it was written: "Awake you, who are sleeping, and get up from dead, and Christ will lighten you" (Eph. 5: 14).

The third one resembles to the one who walks in a night with full and luminous moon; that's why, by being guided by the rays of the moon, he travels in a not so strayed manner and he walks towards the things from ahead; he sees himself like in a mirror and he discerns also the people he travels together with, as it was said: "You do good, taking heed to the law, like to a candlestick that lightens to you in a dark place, until the daylight will rise up and the morning start will rise up into your hearts" (2 Pet. 1: 19). Finally, the last one resembles to the one who walks in the steadfast and most-luminous noon, lighten by [196] It is an illumination that starts from the hypostasis of Christ or of the Holy Ghost, and therefore it doesn't have a subjective, or psychological, or illusionary, or of a simple understanding character.

[197] In that illumination that he lives, he firstly sees his self, or he lives with the sharpest conscience his own self.

[198] He becomes seen and discerned by other through his deeds, though either the grace from within him, or himself, aren't intimately understood or intuited.

the not-lessened rays of the son. This is because he sees and discerns himself in a clean manner, in the sunlight, and he also discerns the many others - better said: all of them – according to the godlike Apostle (1 Cor. 2: 15)[199], and he also sees even the things he meets anyhow and wherever, he also walking without straying and guiding, without error, the ones who follow him, towards the true light and towards life and towards truth. About these ones it was written: "You are the light of the world" (Mt. 5: 14). This is because also the all-godlike Paul says: "God, Who said to be the light lighting into darkness, He lightened within our hearts, towards the lighting of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. 4: 6). But also, the Blessed David says: "It has been imprinted upon us the light of Your face, Lord" (Ps. 4: 6): and: "Into Your light we will see light" (Ps. 35[200]: 9). And the Lord says: "I am the light of the world, the one who follows me he won't walk into darkness, but he will have the light of the life" (Jn. 8: 12).

57. About the longing and the love born out of warmth, out of paying attention, and out of prayer.

Out of such warmth and out of the prayer made attentively, or out of the clean prayer, it is born within heart the longing and the godlike love for the remembered name of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is for it is written: "The virgins love Me, they attracted Me" (Song. 1: 3-4). And: "I am wounded by love" (Song. 2: 5). But Saint Maximos says also: "All the virtues help the mind to gain the godlike love, but, more than all of them, the clean prayer. This is for through it, flying towards God, it goes out of all things"[201].

58. About the tears from within heart; and, in continuation, about the godlike longing and about love.

Out of such a heart flow many tears, which clean up and thicken the one who has become enrich with them, but they don't dry him out, nor do they wither him. The last thing come out of the fear of God, and the first one comes out of the godlike love, out of the longing and of the powerful and unrestraint love [199] Only in the light of Christ, the consummate man sees himself as he is and as he should be. And he even sees the others.

[200] In KJB we have: Ps. 36: 9.
[201] Heads about Love, I, 11; G.P. 90, 964 A; The Romanian Philokalia, II, p. 39

for the remembered Jesus Christ. This is because the heart, by being comprised by enthusiasm, it shouts out: "You have charmed me with Your longing, Christ, and You have changed me with Your godlike love". And: "Whole are You, Savior, sweetness and whole, my longing; whole, the One I cannot have enough of; your holly are, untold beauty". But also, the godlike Paul – the herald of Christ - shouts out: "The love of God crushes us" (2 Cor. 5: 14). And: "Who will separate us from the love of Christ? The trouble, or the tribulation, or the persecution, or the nakedness, of the danger, or the sword?" (Rom. 8: 35). And again: "I trust that neither death, nor the life, neither the angels, nor the principalities, neither the masteries, nor the powers, neither the ones from now, nor the future ones, neither the height, nor the depth, neither some other creation cannot separate us from the love of God that into Christ Jesus, our Lord" (Rom. 8: 38-39).

59. Advice to not search for the things above our measure; and continuation to the teaching about the ceaseless remembrance within heart, of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Good is to somebody to be found worthy of these and of all the things coming after these. But it is not the right time now to speak about them. This is because "do not search, he says, before time, the things appropriate to a certain time"; and: "The good is not good when it is done wrong". And according to Saint Mark: "It is not profitable to know before working the first things, the last things"[202]. This is because "the knowledge makes haughty", for the lack of the deeds; "and the love build up, for it endures all things" (1 Cor. 8: 1). But in order to be found worthy of them, the man must strive and he must always live in ascesis, to always keep, as we have said, the remembrance of Lord Jesus Christ in the deep of his heart and to not let it outside and at surface. This is because the Blessed Mark himself says: "If it is not opened, through the usual and understanding hope, the inner chamber, more hidden and more sincere of our heart, we won't know, surely, the One Who dwells in it and we won't be able to know whether our sacrifices of thoughts have been accepted or not"[203].

60. About the fiery zeal and about the godlike showing within us and about that illumination from the hypostasis of the grace[204].

By doing like this, somebody will easily escape not only the evil deeds, but also the passionate thoughts and the inappropriate hallucinations, as it is written: "Walk with the Ghost and you won't fulfill the lust of the body"(Gal. 5: 16). Even more, this one will go out of every thought and of every hallucination (imagining), by burning and banishing away, through his fiery zeal for virtue, the whole evil doing that have been worked before within him and through his senses and through his mind, together with the devils who have been sustaining that and who have been imprinting the evilness within him. This is for Saint Isaac says: "Fearsome is to the devil and loved is by God and by His angels, the one who uproots with fiery zeal the brambles sprouted out of the enemy's work within him"[205]. He will reach the advanced stage of having within himself the trust (the sure and full feeling) of the love of God for him and of the showing of the hypostatized and most-godlike illumination of the grace[206]. And if you want, you can say that through this he comes back in a glittering manner to the nobility and to the spiritual resurrection worked within us from above, through the grace of the Baptism[207]. But Saint Isaac the Syrian says again: "This is the Jerusalem and the Kingdom of God, hidden within us (Luke 17: 21), according to the word of the [204] There is an illumination that comes to the heart from the Hypostasis of the Ghost Himself; it is not from the heart, it is not subjective. This light implies a relation with the Person of the Holy Ghost.

[205] Quoted work, Word 43, p. 177. The warmth of the zeal for good, for what is pleasant to God, it is that burning down the brambles of the passions which prick the soul's life of the man with regrets, with remorse, with the discontent produce by them.

[206] It appears within him an illumination hypostatized by grace within his person, but which has its natural source, or which is originally hypostatized in Jesus Christ, the Embodied Word of God. The authors of the present writing identify this illumination to the grace of Christ, become felt and intuited. One can notice in this the influence of Saint Simeon the New Theologian and of Saint Gregory Palamas. If the grace is the love of Christ for the one who continuously calls upon Him, we will understand that this openness of Christ, as any loving openness of the person, it is shown as light, for the loved person is light, or love.

[207] The lighting taking place within us it doesn't belong only to the grace but also to us. The light of the grace, or of the love of Christ, by encountering or producing our love of luminous openness, which is done under His work, it becomes together with our lighting only one lighting (illumination). The light of the grace has been dwelling within us from Baptism. Through the fiery zeal of the ceaseless remembrance of Christ we are doing, this light becomes actualized.

Lord; this place is the cloud of the glory of God, which will be entered only by the ones who are clean in their heart, in order to see the face of their Master (Mt. 5: 8). Let him only search, himself, for the showing of God, in order not to receive what is in fact darkness but it pretends to be light (2 Cor. 11: 14)"[208].

61. About the godlike work and about the opposite work.

And when his mind, without searching for, it sees a light, let him not receive that light, neither to remove it. This is for saint Mark says: "There is a work of the grace unknown to the little child; and there is another, of the evilness, which resembles to the truth. But it is good to him to not receive these, because of the fear of the deceit; but let him neither consider them anathema, because he need to fearfully think that they can be true; but let him always run to God with hope, for He knows the benefit of both of them. But let him also ask about these, the one who has grace and power from God to teach and to discern"[209].

62. About the lightened and not-deceiving teacher.

And if he finds the one who can teach him not as he has already known only from the Holy Scripture, but as that one [208] Let the man not force the showing of God, for in this case, by losing the feeling of the presence of Christ from Himself, the man produces to himself a hallucination of the light of God, which is in reality the darkness of the demons. The man must pursue only to be cleaned of any passion and of any thought and to increase his love for Christ, by ceaselessly remembering Him. The illumination will come by itself, from Christ. This is a spiritual orientation which is totally different from that of the feminine mystique from occident, which forces for a showing of Christ like bearer of wounds. But one cannot say that the spiritual life, as described by the authors of the analyzed writing, it lacks the love for Christ, the communion with Him, as A. M. Ammann says, quoted work, p. 40. We do not reckon that such a communion comes only out of the juridical conception of the satisfaction Christ brought to God through His sacrifice on the cross. A contrary, only a teaching about the salvation as deification of the man it really values the communion of Christ with the man. This is because the occidental feminine mystique doesn't draw any practical conclusion out of the sentimental communion with Christ, once he has given us something else, through His sacrifice, than the escape from guilt. The communion remains in such a vision a sentimental and superficial matter, without having any effect upon man.

[209] The man doesn't see the glory of God in a totally unmediated manner, but he sees it always through the creature that has become transparent as a cloud through which one can see the light of the sun. Even the body of Christ is such a cloud, transparent in the highest degree (Mt. 17: 5). Otherwise, the man couldn't bear the sight of the glory of God. Through this, the being also becomes beautiful, by actualizing its rich colors, or its complex virtualities, all of them bearing a charming light. This is for Jerusalem isn't monochromatic and therefore monotone and lacking variety (Rev. 21).

endured in a blessed manner the godlike illumination[210], let him give thanks to God. And if not, it is better not to receive it, but to run to God with humbleness, by reckoning himself, with the whole sincerity of his heart, unworthy, and by declaring himself beneath to such a worthiness and sight. And this and others like this, as many as have been told, we have learnt them with by the grace of Christ, out of the not-liar mouths which spoke to us moved by the Holy Ghost, as also from the inspired by God Scriptures, and out of some experience.

63. About the true lighting and about the liar lighting, or about the godlike light and about the devilish light.

Actually, our famous Fathers show us in some of their writings the signs of the not-deceiving lighting and those ones of the liar lighting. So did for three times the Blessed Paul from Latro[211], saying to his disciple who asked him about this: "The light of the enemy power is in the image of a fire and it smokes and it is like the fire felt with the senses; and when the temperate and cleaned soul sees it, it is disgusted and abhorred by it. And the good light of the Good One is very pleasant and clean and when it shows up it sanctifies and it fill the soul up with joy and with serenity and it makes it gentle and loving of people". And others say the same. But, as I have heard the things said before, verbally, so you are going to hear about these at the right time. Because now isn't that time.

64. About the indecent imagination and about the decent imagination and about how we must behave to them.

For, a little earlier, we have mentioned about imagination and about the indecent imagination, we reckon that it is most profitable to shortly speak also about that, batter said, as much as it is possible, about imagination in general. This is for this cursed movement it opposes very much the clean prayer of the heart and the unitary and not-deceiving work of the mind. That's why also the godlike Fathers speak on many occasions about it and against it. The Saints from before reckoned it as the mythical Daedalus, as an imagination with many faces and with many heads resembling to hydra, as abridge of the demons. This is because the cursed killers, by crossing on it, they enter in communication with the soul and it mix themselves with the soul, making the soul some sort of wasps' hive and like a cave of barren and passionate thoughts[212]. And when you do not want, for the sake of the repentance and of the crying combined with the crushing of the heart and with the humble cogitation, and before this also for the sake of the understanding and of seeing the creatures, and also for the will of comparing the indecent imagination to the decent imagination and of placing the last one on the first place, you bring the last one closer to the first one and thus you powerfully banish away the indecent and shameful one which is like a coward, and you are going to achieve victory upon it. By doing so, not only that it won't cause any loss to you, but it will rather be cause for gaining, for you have led your things with judgment, without mistake, as one who has destroyed the indecent imagination through the decent imagination, and you have mortally wounded your enemies with their own weapons, as yore the godlike David did to Goliath (1 Kings[213] 17: 51)[214].

[210] This is the light "seen" by the ones who were reaching at the ceaseless practice of the prayer of Jesus within their heart. This light is "suffered" because it is not produced by the man, but received from God. The knowledge of God from the Holy Scripture it is not rejected, but the godlike illumination it differs from that. But, before deciding to receive that light as being true or to reject it, it is good to ask one - who has suffered it at his turn - about it. Otherwise, it is better not to receive it, in order not to be deceived by a false light.

[212] In the Romanian manuscripts the Greek word "φαντασία" (fantasia) was always translated as "hallucination". We discern today between "hallucination" and "imagination". The first one has rather the meaning of an ill hallucination. But the difference between these two meanings isn't always a full one. Anyway, the meaning of the "imagination" some of our authors reject it, it is not that of a simple idea or new intuition, but is about imagining a concrete situation. This is because they don't always have something tempting in them. But, generally, the one who wants to focus himself on prayer, he must shun himself from any imaginings. This is because they attract the soul to surface and make the soul passing from an imagining to another. They are reckoned by our authors as bridges of the devil through which the devil enters the soul and makes the soul get out of the focusing on the simple thinking about the undivided and the borderless God. If the thinking always presupposes a subject who thinks, so also the thinking the subject of which we do not seem to be, it has as its subject deeper within us, or related to us, an evil ghost, or a demon. He wants even through the seemingly good imaginings to break us off from the prayer. That's why they even the seemingly good imaginings must be rejected in time of prayer. But out authors make an exception in the following considerations, with the good imaginings, for the shown reasons.

[213] In KJB we have 1 Samuel.

[214] This is a remarkable proving of the value of the good imaginings in order to destroy the evil imaginings, to the ones who haven't reach yet the stage of the ceaseless prayer "of a sole thought". But they are used also by the consummate ones in order to communicate their imageless experiences to the not-consummate ones. And even the Prophets use the good

Of Kallistos Angelicude

Introduction

According to some data about Kallistos Angelicude, given by A. Erhard[215], and then mentioned by H. G. Beck[216] too, this author has been recently studied by Stelian Papadopoulos[217], who also published Kallistos' work "Against Thomas d'Aquino"[218]. This author, whom, in the Greek Philokalia and in the G. P. 147, 817-826, it has been published in, only a small in dimensions writing, bearing the title: Ησυχαστικη τριβή, translated in the present volume with the title: The Craftsmanship of the Appeasement, it is mentioned by the Greek Philokalia and by the Greek Patrology (G.P.) under the name of Kallistos the Angelicude. Stelian Papadopoulos confirmed the data provided by A. Erhard and Beck, that the author's real name was Kallistos Angelicude, and he provided new data about him. This author activated during the second half of the XIV Century, near to Melenic locality, situated in Macedonia, and he lives around the end of the XIV Century. He lived in a monastic "settlement" near the mentioned locality, in some kind of hermitage, where he built up also a church, being him helped also by the Serbian tzar from that time. Around that church were living several ascetics, tonsured in monasticism by Kallistos. In a document of the Patriarchy of Constantinople, Kallistos is called as "spiritual man, virtuous and hesychast". The name "hesychast" was being given after the hesychastic disputes from the middle of the XIV Century, to a monk who was occupying himself with the prayer of the mind, and who has reached, through his ascesis, with his appeasement, to seeing the godlike light.

According to the locality which he was living in, he is also called as Melenichiotis. In Greek Codex Vatopedi, 736, and in Arundel 520 din British Museum, it is preserved an ascetic writing of his, composed by 30 "Words". Stelian Papadopoulos mentioned the title of these "Words" in his introduction to the publication of the Kallistos' writing against Thomas d-Aquinas. The Word XXII, bearing the title Ησυχαστικη τριβή, it seems to be, according to its title and according to the words it begins with, identical to the writing from the Greek Philokalia and to its older Romanian translations, given under the name of Kallistos Tilicude and comprised under the title: "The Skillfulness (or the Craftsmanship) of the Appeasement" in several manuscripts (for instance, in the manuscripts which can be found in the Library of the Romanian Academia, no. 1841, f. 102 v-119v, written in the year 19818, and in that one bearing the number 2435, f. 208 v-218 v, and then in the manuscript no. 40, f. 44-55 v, from the Library of the Romanian Patriarchy, a manuscript dating from the XIX Century).

Behold a few of the titles which we can find in the "Words" of Kallistos' ascetic writing: Word III: Spiritual Paradise, or the Godlike Lights Having as Gate the Seeing through the Ghost: Word IV: About Entering, through the Lord, the Spiritual Paradise and About Its Gate and about Its Key; and the explanation to the words: If somebody enters through Me, he will be saved; Word XIII: About the Spiritual Pleasure and Joy and about Their Occasions; Word XIV: How We Skillfully Must Use the Contemplation of God; Word XXI: About the Life Hidden within Christ; Word XXIV: About the Doer and the Contemplative; Word XXV: About Contemplation.

Perseveringly occupying oneself with the "spiritual paradise" and with the contemplation, preoccupation we can find also in the "Hundred Heads" of Kallistos and Ignatius, and in the "Heads about Prayer" and in their continuation or in the "Paradise" written by Kallistos the Patriarch, a preoccupation that goes all the way up to the identity of several titles of the "Heads", it gives room to the supposition that the last ones were influenced by the writing of Kallistos the Angelicude, or vice versa. This problem couldn't be definitively solved except after a parallel study of Kallistos Angelicude's writing and of the three mentioned writings. Beck said: "It seems that (Kallistos and Ignatius) closely followed the work of Kallistos Angelicude, which they have filled it up with quotations"[219]. WE are going to see in the introduction to the writing of Kallistos the Katafygiote, published in the present book too, that that writing too, it breathes the same ghost and it is full of the same preoccupations.

KALLISTOS ANGELICUDE

The Craftsmanship of the Appeasement[220]

Nobody can repent without appeasing himself; neither can one somehow reach the cleanness, without withdrawal; and no one can become worthy of dialoguing with God and of seeing God, while that one still is in dialogue with the people and seeing them. That's why, the ones who have made their objective out of repenting for their mistakes, out of cleaning themselves of passions, and out of enjoying the dialogue with God and the seeing of God – which is the end of the road and the target of the ones who live according to God, and the earnest, to say so, of the eternal inheritance of God – they aim for the appeasement with the whole their zeal, and they reckon as the most useful thing to withdraw themselves and to avoid the contact with people, with the soul their soul's feeling. Their start in the appeasing life, it is the crying, the rebuking, and the self-despising, for which, in order to work those as cleanly as possible, they take upon themselves the takings of vigil, the standing on their feet, the restraint, and the bodily toiling, which have as general goal the river of tears starting out of the eyes of the ones who cogitate the humble things into the crushing of their heart. This is for, as the one tending towards cleanness and they achieve it through deeds, the end is the peace from the thoughts, likewise in those there is, as I've said, the flowing of the tears[221].

And from here the mind starts, in a natural way, to penetrate the things' natures and to see the artistry of God. From now on, the mind's thing is to catch up and to contemplate the godlike meaning of the power, and of the glory, and of the kindness, and of all the other things belonging to the Ghost of God. In the same time, the mind penetrated the mysteries of the Scripture, and the mind tastes the above-world beauties, and the mind becomes chamber to God's love. And thus, the mind is engulfed by longing, it rejoices and it gladdens itself, by running towards the last end of the virtues, namely towards the love of the Maker of all things[222]. That mind no longer experiences and it no longer fears any going astray amongst the things from here, though that mind still experiences some transgressions and sinful impulses and indecent movements, because of many reasons, as that mind still is changeable[223]. But the mind must withdraw itself from these ones, by removing from itself any discouraging. The mind of these ones, by being winged up with the hope in God's love for people, it flies up towards the godlike things, by occupying itself with the tears, with the prayer, and with the other mentioned toils, and it delights itself with the godlike Paradise of the love, as much as it is possible to the mind. That mind no longer sees anywhere, anything else, neither image, nor thickness, neither countenance, nor anything else; to say it shortly, it only sees the tears, the peace from the thoughts, and the love from God. This is for through these ones, it is preserved also the mind's lack of scattering, and it is given as gift the soul's salvation. This is for the temperance watches over, and the mind prays to Christ Jesus, our Lord.

[220] G.P. 147, 817-825.

[221] Here is made the discernment between workers and contemplatives, of seers, or prayers. The first ones reach the peace from thoughts, and the second ones reach the torrents of tears. The tears come out of a very burdening awareness about their sins, that produces in the ones who deepens that awareness, a such a deep feeling of sorrow, and of pain, and of torment, and of "pricking of the heart", that the tears start flowing, a fact that doesn't happen until there is within man a certain callousness.

Sitting in your monastic cell, let your mind daring into humbleness, towards God: it is about that humbleness caused to you by your unworthiness and nothingness; the daring is for the undiminished love from God, and for He doesn't remember the evil. And the soul is elevated to honor before God, when, despite the soul sees himself being sinner, he still dares for the God's love for people, and the soul reckons about himself as tied [222] The ones reaching the contemplative state, their firstly understand the mysterious meanings of the things and of the Holy Scripture, and through those meanings, they contemplate the artistry of God in creation, and they contemplate God Himself. The love from God find room within them, and that love forces them towards ever-more love from God. This is the end of all the virtues, which the ascetic has been occupying himself with, ever since the doer phase.

[223] We have in these ones, though, some resemblances to the "Paradise" of Kallistos the Patriarch. This "Paradise" will be mentioned in the followings. The ones who have reached this state he no longer is tempted by the outside things, but he still has within himself his changeable nature and, in the remnants of some habits lasting within him, there is the possibility of some transgressions and inappropriate impulses.

to God[224]. That's why Saint Paul commands too, saying: "Let's come close, with daring, to the throne of the grace" (Hebr. 4: 16). This is for the daring towards God is some kind of an eye of the prayer, or a wing, or a wonderful dependency[225]. That one who reckons himself as being good, that one doesn't' have daring – let that not be! Run away from this thought! – but that one who flies towards the godlike hope, being him winged up by the thought at the untold love from God, and by the thought at God's forgiveness. You pray, therefore, with daring in humble thought, one nourished by good hopes in God, into Christ Jesus, our Lord, as it has been said. You must always carefully search for the things which temperate the body and deliver the mind from disturbance. And these ones are: eating with temperance, drinking light beverages, sleeping shortly, standing on your feet according to your power, kneeling as much as possible, having a humble countenance, wearing a disregarded coat, speaking little and only if needed, sleeping on the floor, and all the other things which partially tame the body. And in the same time with these, you must occupy yourself with all the things awakening the mind and helping to attach your mind to God. And these things are: reading the Holy Scripture, reading the writing of the saints who interpreted the Scripture, but these ones too, with temperance; singing psalms while understanding the meanings thinking at the things said in the Scripture and at the wonders seen in the creation; praying with your mouth until the holy grace of the Ghost will move your prayer, in a felt manner, out of your heart; this is for, then is another celebration and it is the [224] In The Lives of the Saints it is very often mentioned the "daring" the saints have towards God. But here the "daring" is seen as united with the humbleness. The saint "dares" to God not for his kindness, but for his trust in the mercy from God, for God doesn't keep in mind the done evil. That's why the daring is reconciled with the humbleness. This is for, even in this daring, the soul is conscious that in everything he has and he receives, he depends on the God's love for people. If a soul reckoned himself ad being good, that soul wouldn't actually be good, and that soul couldn't ask God for anything. That soul would reckon that God owes to give him what he needs.

[225] The "daring", by being united with the prayer, it shows again that it isn't a daring of the man by himself. Daring in prayer means reckoning that you need God, but in the same time trusting His mercy. The prayer is an "eye" towards God, for in prayer you rather see the greatness, and the power, and the kindness of God; the prayer is a "wing" towards God, for without it you won't dare and won't be able to get close to Him; the prayer is affectionate and non-understood "dependency" on God, for you feel that you cannot do anything without Him.

time for another feasting, untold by mouth, but worked within your heart, through the Ghost[226].

And until then, you occupy yourself with the said things, like this: kneels as often as you can and pray, while sitting like so; when you get tired by praying, pass to reading, as it has been said; then, come again to prayer. And again, being you tired of praying, stand up for a little singing; and then come back again to prayer. And getting tired again, turn back to the occupation mentioned before, with temperance; and then give yourself again, as a gift, to the prayer. Work a little too, with your hands, in order to banish the boredom away, as you have heard from the Holy Fathers. But always, in the whole your work according to God, from morning to morning, let the prayer be your main occupation. All the other occupation are to be used, as I've said, due to the tiredness brought by prayer. And when the mercy comes within soul, and the grace of the Ghost makes the prayer gushing up from within heart, like from a spring, then let the mind to occupy itself only with praying and with seeing, by detaching itself from all things and by delighting itself only with the prayer and with the seeing, in the Paradise of the godlike love[227].

The prayer has mastery upon all the good deeds; it gives birth to the repentance's tears; it powerfully helps to the peace of the thoughts, by urging that only God to be reckons as the consummate peace; it is the mother of the love for God; only the prayer cleans up the cogitating power of the soul, by imprinting God in it, the One Who causes the angels' cleanness too; the prayer directs the lusting power of the soul towards God, into cleanness, for by attaching to God and by dialoguing with God Who is the Good by nature, and the endless Beauty, and above-nature[228], He ties the whole lust on Himself; and the anger, God

[226] The prayer is religious service brought to God and therefore it is celebration too. These are three notions connected to one another. It is celebration, for it is stopping from the world's things and it is occupying with the godlike things, which it actually is resting and joy and luminous light. But the fullest celebration is the prayer done within heart and worked there by the Holy Ghost. This is for, then there isn't either the care for uttering the appointed words, and experiencing God it is stronger.

[227] As the Patriarch Kallistos too, likewise the author of this writing tightly united the prayer with the seeing of God, with the soul. One won't be able to totally be absorbed into prayer without feeling the presence of God.

[228] God is by nature the above-nature Good. God isn't a Good submitted to the nature's laws. But He is consummately free and therefore He isn't narrowed by any law. God is properly-said good, namely He is good for He wants to be good, but, in the same time, being good belongs to tames is so much, that the man falls down and prayer to God, and the soul is humbled by falling to God; this is for, nobody wears, while praying, a non-humble and angry thought. That's why, shortly speaking, the pious prayer cleans up and it strengthens all the soul's powers and all the doer and understanding works; and it especially attaches the seeing to God and, consequently, to the godlike love, in a quiet living, according to the things I've said before. And your thought, by turning back within you, let it cogitate and look at that place of the heart where the tear flows from, praying while not being disturbed by breathing through the nose. And let it stay there as much as possible. This is for, it is a very useful thing, one bringing many and ceaseless tears, and it abolishes the mind's slavery, and it produces the understanding peace of the soul, and it occasions the prayer, and it works together with God in order to find out the heart's prayer, through the grace of the-life-maker Ghost, into Christ Jesus, our Lord[229].

You must know, you the seer, who sees the mysterious things and who is delighted with them, that, as God and the man are two, likewise are two, either as genre or as species, the crying and the tears. This is because one differs from another, despite being, both of them, good and given by God, as gifts, and they gain to us the benevolence of God and the inheritance destined by it. The crying has as source the fear of God and the sadness, while the tears have the godlike love and God, as their source. The first one doesn't gladden the nature too much the second ones gladden much and above-nature. The first one is characteristic to the beginners, while the second ones are God's nature. The liberty and the nature are, at God, one and the same; if this freedom had been evil too, it wouldn't have been a full freedom. The evil always forces the evil one. The whole creation is submitted to some laws - in the last analysis, at least to the godlike law. This is because nothing of the created things is the law of its own existence. Only in communion with God, the rational creature is completely free. The lust of such a creature is directed towards good, but the true and full Good is God.

[229] The author of this writing mostly associates the tears to the consummate prayer within heart. The godlike light remains reserved only for the highest spiritual level. But also, the ones who have reached that level, they are advised to manifest some reserve in accepting it. So, we have, in the first place, an apophatism as feeling of God Who is not seen, and then high above, there would be the illumination. This means that the prayer within heart is a prayer penetrated by a great feeling. The fear for the punishment coming from God, for the sins, it seems squeezing the heart of the one who prays, so that is squeezes tears out of his heart. But the cogitation at his sins it must be associated also with the love for the merciful God, with the compassion produced by His mercy. This contributes again, to intensifying the heart's feeling, to mellowing the heart down, and to transforming the heart in a spring of tears.

Five are the works of the quietude: the prayer, or the ceaseless remembrance of Jesus, introduced through breathing, within the heart, and without any thought[231], a fact achieved by usually restraining the belly, the sleep, and the other senses, inside the monastic cell, with the help of the humbleness. Then a little singing and reading of the Godlike Gospels and of the writings of the Holy Fathers and of the heads about prayer, especially those belonging to the New Theologian, to Hesychius, and to Nicephorus; cogitating at the judgment of God, at death, and at the things alike; finally, a little working with the hands. And then it must be done, again, the turning back to prayer, even if this will require some forcing, until the mind will get used to reject the scattering of itself, by thinking at the Lord, and by ceaselessly consenting to the heart's toiling. This is the work of the beginner monks, who want to appease themselves. So, one like this, he needs not to get out from his monastic cell, and to avoid any dialogues and views, except in the case of some big necessity. But, even then, let him do it attentively, by guarding on himself, and as rarely as possible. This is because, not only to the beginners, but also to the advanced ones, these things cause them scattering.

This prayer, when done with taking heed, without thinking at something else, through the words: "Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God", it elevates the mind in an immaterial and totally untold manner, towards the mentioned Lord Himself, and by saying: "have mercy on me", it makes the mind to come back again, to itself, in order ton pray for itself. But the ones who has advanced in love, by being more experienced, he directs himself only towards the Lord, for he trusts and he is convinced about the second thing (the forgiveness). That's why, the Fathers not always teach us the entire prayer, but one teaches us the whole prayer, as John Chrysostom did[232], while another teaches us only "Lord Jesus", as Paul did, who added: "into the Holy Ghost" (1 Cor. 12: 3), speaking about prayer during the time when the heart receives the work of the Holy Ghost, which the heart prays through, too; this is the prayer of the advanced ones, though they haven't reached yet, the consummation, that is the illumination. And Saint John Climacus says: "Strike the enemy with the name of Jesus" and: "Let the remembrance of Christ attach to your breathing"[233], and he adds nothing more. But the beginner too, they are allowed to pray by using all this prayer's words, and some other times to pray, in their mind, by using only a part of this prayer. But let the way of praying not to change too often, in order that not to cause scattering.

[230] Here is being made a difference between crying, as weeping, one rather caused by thinking at sins, and the tears produces rather by the love for God. But these two aren't totally separated, though. In the tears produces by the love for God, the sins aren't forgotten, although God has forgiven them mercifully, and the crying for sins doesn't totally lack the trust in the forgiving mercy of God.

[231] It has been mentioned before, though, about the introducing a thought within heart. But that one was the thought about sins, or about the mercy from God. The thoughts which one mustn't introduce within his heart, they are the thought about the outside things, about food, pleasures, glory, and worries. These ones keep the mind outside. Thinking at sins and at God, it helps the mind to enter the heart and to stay within heart and next to God.

By persevering in applying the mentioned method of the clean prayer, even if not in a clean manner because of the imaginings which the one who prays is accustomed to, and because of his thought which become impediments to him, the one who lives in ascesis reaches the habit of praying unforcedly, and of persevering with his mind within his heart, and not to introduce the mind, forcedly, by inhaling the air, and then the mind to jump off there, but his mind perseveres in there and it stars praying by itself. This is also called as the prayer of the heart[234]. It is preceded by a certain warmth within heart, that banished away the thoughts which impede the mentioned clean prayer to be done consummately. And, by persevering like that, the mind ceaselessly prays within heart. And in such a warmth and prayer, the love for the remembered Lord Jesus it is born within the heart, so that start flowing from within heart, plentifully, sweet tears of the longing for the remembered Jesus.

So, in order somebody to be found worthy for these things, and for all the other things coming after these, which is not now the time to talk about, he must strive, as it has been said, for having the fear of God permanently before his eyes, together with remembering Jesus within his heart and not simply outside his heart. Thus, he removes himself not only from the evil deeds, but also from thinking at passions, and he advances up to being filled up with the entrustment of the love from God, for him. But, in order not to receive the one who, while being in darkness, he pretends to be luminous light, let the believer not to try and see God's light. And when, the mind sees a light without searching for it, let the believer not accept it, but neither reject it, but let him ask the one who has power for teaching him, not only as that one has known according to the Godlike Scripture, but as he happily experienced himself the illumination, and let him give thanks to God. If not, the believer better not to receive that light, but let him rather to run with humbleness, to God, by reckoning himself unworthy of such a view, as we've learned in this regard, with the deed, from the Holy Fathers, even if in some of their writings they present the deceiving and the undeceiving signs.

[234]It is called the prayer of the heart only that prayer that is no longer done forcedly, namely by forcedly introducing the mind within heart. This is because, in this case, the mind cannot stay too much within heart, because of not having the habituation of the steadfastness in the interiorized thinking at God. The prayer of the heart, as the mind's persevering by itself, within heart, and in thinking at God, from within the heart, it therefore requires much skillfulness in order to achieve it.

But, as you heard before all the told things, by mouth, likewise, you will hear about this, at the right time. Because now it isn't the right time. Now you must find out, rather, together with other things and before other things, this: like the one who strives to learn how to shoot arrows, he doesn't strain the bow without receiving a sign, likewise the ones who wants to learn how to appease himself, let him have as sign the ceaseless gentleness of his heart, not disturbing and not being disturbed ever, and for anyything, except the case when it is about the right-faith. And he can easily achieve this, by getting far from all things and keeping his silence as much as he can. And if sometimes it happens to him not to do like that, let him immediately repent and rebuke himself, and let him take heed in the future, in order him to call Jesus, silently and with a clean conscience, putting Him as beginning, as I've said before. And by advancing on the way, let him have the godlike grace resting in his soul, and not only like so, but also consummately resting his soul from the devils and from the passions which were upsetting him before, and by gladdening him with an untold gladness. This is for, even if they bother him again, they no longer influence him, for he is no longer their comrade, and for he no longer wants the pleasure from them. This is for the whole desire of such a believer, it has been directed towards the Lord, the One Who has given the believer, His grace. Such a believer still is being warred, because God allows it, and not because God forsakes him. What is that for? In order him not to get his mind haughty, for the good he has found, but because of being warred, him to keep within himself, ceaselessly, the humbleness, the sole one that not only defeats the haughty enemies, but it is also found worthy of receiving ever-greater gifts.

May us too, be found worthy of these things, from Christ Who has humbled on Himself, for us, and Who gives as gift, to the humble ones, His grace, plentifully, now and always and forever and ever. Amen.

THEOLOGICAL FLORILEGIUM FROM THE WRITINGS OF THE HOLY FATHERS

ABOUT PRAYER AND TAKING HEED[235]

The one who toils on the way of the virtues, he must strive with the whole his power, in order him not to be lowered from the height of his soul, through the upraising of the passions. And this is because, how could the soul, if the soul was nailed down by the body's pleasure, to look at the mind's light kindred with the soul, with a free eye? That's why, before anything, the soul must toil in restraint, which is the safe guard of the righteousness, and he must also strive not to let the leading mind to spent time by thinking at unclean thoughts. It is needed, therefore, the whole zeal of the inward man, in order the mind not to be scattered, but to be nailed on the target of the glory of God. And this is for us to escape the Lord's judgment Who says: "Woe to you, for you are like the whitened tombs, looking beautifully outside, but being full inside with the dead's bones and with all cleanness. Likewise, you show yourself as righteous, to the people, outwardly, and inwardly you are full with hypocrisy and lawlessness" (Mt. 23: 27-28). Therefore, one needs heavy fighting, and this is by the law, with his heart, and with his word, and with his deed, in order not to vainly receive the grace of God, but like the wax takes the shape of the thing imprinted in it, likewise us, let give the inward man a countenance according to the teaching of our Lord Jesus Christ, by fulfilling, with the deed, the word told by Paul. For he said: "You have disrobed yourself of the former man, together with his deeds, and you have dressed yourself up, in the new man, who is renewed with knowledge, according to the image of the One Who has built him up" (Col. 3: 9-10). He calls as former man, all the sins and all the defilements together. "Let us give countenance, he says, to the new man, into the renewal of the life" (Rom. 6: 1) until our death, in order us to become worthy of truly saying: "I am no longer living, but Christ is living within me" (Gal. 3: 20). One needs, therefore, much zeal and non-sleeping care, lest, by not fulfilling something of the things commanded to us, not only to fall off such a great reward, but us to also submit ourselves to such fearsome threats. But, when the devil tries plotting and he is blowing his thought with very perseveringly, like some lit arrows, within the soul living in quietude and loneliness, and the soul suddenly burst in flames and the memories of the things the soul threw away become steadfast and difficult to scatter away, we must escape this plots through watchfulness and by a strainer taking heed, like an athlete overthrowing his enemies' plans by attentively guarding on himself and through the nimbleness of his body.

Also, we must give all the worry in exchange for the prayer and for the calling of the help from above, in order the enemy to be overthrown and in order to deviate the enemy's arrows. So taught Saint Paul, by saying: "Over all things, taking the shield of the faith" and the others (Ephes. 6: 15). This is because, when the soul, by mellowing its perseverance and the straining of the cogitation, he let loose the random memories about some random things, then, because of being the thought carried away, in unrestrained and inexperienced manner, towards these memories, and by occupying himself increasingly more with them, he changes some deceiving imaginings for some other deceiving imaginings, and he often ends in corruption, of some shameless and reckless cogitations.

But this carelessness and scattering of the soul, it must be healed through a tighter and tenser taking heed of the thought, and this one must be forced to always occupy itself with the good things. This is for, the true wiseman, by having his body as safe dwelling place and cogitation chamber for the soul, whether he is in the market, or in assembly, either on the mountain, or at the field, or in the middle of a huge crowd, he steadfastly remains in his natural monastery, by gathering his mind inward and by cogitating at the things appropriate to him. This is because the idle one, even while sitting at home, he can wander in all directions through his external thoughts, and the one who is in the market, but he takes vigil, he is like in wilderness, namely turned only towards himself and towards God, and not receiving through his senses the disturbances coming to the soul through the seen things.

Therefore, the one who gets close to the Body and Blood of Christ, in the memory of the One Who dies and resurrected for us (2 Cor. 5: 15), he must not only to clean himself, of body's and of the thought's defilement (2 Cor. 6: 11), in order him not to eat and drink towards condemnation (1 Cor. 11: 20), but also in order to limpidly prove to himself the will of the One Who died and resurrected for us, by the fact that he is not only cleaned up of all sins, but he also dies to the sin and to the world, and he lives to God (Rom. 6: 11)[236]. Amongst the evil thoughts, some of them won't enter, at all, within our souls, if we fence us up with much zeal; other are born inside the soul and they bud up because of our idleness. If we lay our hand on them early, we will quickly chock them up and bury them. Others, though, they are born and they grow up and they pass into evil deeds and they break down the whole our soul's healthy, when we will reach much idleness. If we do not do the first thing, it will be good to do the second thing, namely to quickly banish away the thought which have penetrated inside our soul, and not allowing them to tarry much, in order they not to make our inward to become evil. And if we have reached with our idleness so far, there is, through God's love for people, a healing of this idleness too, and many medicines have been prepared by God's untold kindness against such wounds too.

I urge you, therefore, as long as you are into body, not to cut your heart loose. This is because, the plowman cannot be confident that a harvest will grow up in his field, because he doesn't know what will be with that harvest before storing that harvest in his barns, likewise the man cannot cut loose his heart as long as he is still breathing. And, as the man doesn't know what passion will he come across, to the last of his breath, likewise the monk isn't allowed to cut loose his heart until he is still breathing; but the monk must always be shouting out towards God, asking for God's Kingdom and mercy. This is because, the cunning one, by surely knowing that the ones who prays without scattering, to God, that one will be able to achieve many things, the enemy strives to scatter that one's mind, using, in order to do that, grounded or groundless reasons. But we, by knowing that, let get used to wage war against our enemy; and when we stay at prayer and when we kneel down, let's not allow, by any means, any thought, to enter, be it white or black, neither from the right, nor from the left, neither written or unwritten, except the request towards God and the illumination and the ray of light towards God, coming to the soul's leading part, from heavens[237].

But we need a lot of struggle and prayers, in order us to be in the undisturbed state of the thought, which is like another heaven within heart, where Christ lives[238], as the Apostle says: "Don't you know that Christ dwells within us?" (2 Cor. 13: 5). If somebody wants to see the state of his mind, let him guard himself from all thought, and then, his mind will see itself like the sky's color and like the sapphire[239]. But the mind won't see the place of God within itself, until the mind elevated itself higher than all the meanings from within things, until the mind doesn't disrobe itself of all passions which tie the mind through meanings to the sensitive things[240]. And the mind will banish away the passions, through virtues, and the simple thoughts through the spiritual views. And this one, again, through the showing of the light itself[241].

[237] Let's not allow any thought enter our soul, during prayer, neither white or black, neither written or unwritten, neither good or bad, neither from some book or heard from somebody. Let's have in mind only the request we address to God.

[238] Thinking at Christ, within heart, it is like a sky canopying over our heart, which our heart looks at, for it sees it occupied with Christ. But the cogitation when troubled by all sorts of thought, it is like a cloudy sky, which Christ isn't seen on, or He only appears for short moments and then disappears again. Properly said, it isn't then a sky; and this is because it no longer is transparent to Christ.

[239] Evagrius, Heads about Love, 18; The Romanian Philokalia, volume I, p. 62.

[240] The mind gains its transparency for God when liberated from all the thought at the things, which narrow the mind and cover its being. When liberated of thought, the mind discovers its limitlessness, its borderless depth, in the Endless God, Who the mind can see only in this depth which is according to God. A narrow mind cannot receive God, for is that had been the case, God would have been narrowed too. And a God narrowed in a scholastic notion, it won't be God any longer. That's why, the mind, when seeing itself like it is, it sees within itself, in the same time, God.

[241] Here is being used the discerning dome by Saint Maximos the Confessor, between the simple thought at the things and the thoughts associated to a certain passion, or to the desire of having those things, of getting sweetened with those things (Heads about Love III, 42-44; The

KALLISTOS THE KATAFYGIOTE

About the Godlike Union and about the Contemplative Life

Introduction

The Author and the Content of the Writing

This writing, translated in the Romanian language, is present in several manuscripts. It seems that it was read a lot, though it has a high theological level.

The writing can be found at the Romanian Academia's Library, bearing the number 1602, comprising 122 pages, in the manuscript number 2022, comprising 113 pages, in the manuscript number 2027, comprising 143 pages, in the manuscript number 2568, from page 33 front to page 270 back, in the manuscript number 3001, from the page 92 front to page 207 back, dating from the end of the Century XVIII and the beginning of the Century XIX[242].

Erhard[243] and Beck[244], by rejecting the opinion that this Kallistos is identical to the Patriarch Kallistos II, they say that the author "seems" that he lived around the end of the Century XVIII and the beginning of the Century XIX. Nicodemus the Romanian Philokalia, II, p. 85). The passions as forms of the egotism are banished away through virtues as forms of self-renunciation, and the simple thoughts at the things, through "contemplations" into Ghost, which see through things the godlike rationalities of the realities exceeding the things' images. But above them there is the seeing of the light of God Himself. We are also mentioning here that, while the passions narrow the soul through their egotistic character, the virtues widen it through their tendency for loving God and the fellow humans.

[242] In the manuscript nor. 2568, on the front of the page no. 2, it starts: "Every creature - out of what is the same nature with its good work – is imparted both with the according resting and sweetness". Likewise in the manuscript no. 1602.

[243] Quoted work, p. 160.

[244] Quoted work, p. 784.

Hagiorite says at his turn, in the preface of his work from the Greek Philokalia, that nothing is known about when and where this author lived.

But the content and the shape of the writing urge us not to reckon as totally improbable the fact that this writing would belong to Patriarch Kallistos. It might be that this writing too, it belongs to Patriarch Kallistos, but it might have been written at a time he was living in one of his withdrawals (καταφυγή), during his long monastic life. Of course, Kallistos the Katafygiote concentrates his writing around the two writings belonging to Patriarch Kallistos, and in "the one hundred heads" belonging to Kallistos and Ignatius. It is about the theme of the "One", which our mind will be united with, if it strives to get out of the division in diverse thoughts, and thus becoming, at its turn, one too. The theme of the "One" is of Platonic origin. But at Kallistos the Katafygiote, through "One" it is understood the godlike subject, One Who all His masterpieces and works are transparent to. The human person's ideal is that of placing himself in connection, through all these masterpieces and manifestations, with the Subject Who makes Himself felt and "seen" through them. This is for this One is alive, and He is full of love. That's why this One is, in the same time, Threefold. This One is, in the same time, simple, because otherwise, if He had been diverse then He would have been composed of parts, parts which would have been, all of them, limited, so that they wouldn't have been able to accomplish, through their union, the One. But His simplicity is endlessly rich. That's why, the mind united with Him, it no longer needs to pass to something else, but the mind finds in Him its eternal resting. This resting is, though, for the "One" is endlessly rich, and He isn't a petrification or a boredom, but He is a "steadfast movement", a ceaseless deepening into love. One can say that this writing is a synthesis between the abstract thinking of Dionysus the Areopagite and the full of enthusiasm feeling of Saint Simeon the New Theologian. Its author anticipated, by describing the fiery feeling of the soul in union with the Person or with the godlike Persons, the full of feeling character of the feminine mysticism from Occident, but he maintained, in the same time, as reason of his feeling, a profound theological consistency.

The "One" is transcendent to creation, and He isn't immanent as at Plotinus, for only Thus He truly is One and source of all unity. But He doesn't remain locked up in His unity, but He gets out, through all His works and masterpieces, towards us, in order to elevate us to the union with Him.

The mind unites with Him and it finds its unity and simplicity, or it finds itself and its resting, by ceasing the movement from an idea to another, form a thing to another, from a passionate attachment to one or another of the created things, for it surpasses itself. This means that only by forgetting about the self, in the love for another subject, our subject find himself again in his fully concentrated unity. This is for he is made for being elevated above himself, through a total and fiery love which he entirely focuses on, as the bird is made for flying.

In the perseverance which the author speaks with, about the abyss of the "One", we could see a resemblance to the thinking of Meister Eckart of Jacob Böhme. But at Kallistos the Katafygiote, this abyss is an abyss of the love, namely of the eternally existing Person, and not that one of an abstract essence; His hiding is the hiding of the indefinite Subject Who, in the same time, can be intuited through all realities.

We reckon that this writing may be considered as the most beautify of all the Philokalist writings, due to its theological profoundness, and due to its fiery feeling.

But, just for that, it is very close to the writing entitle "The Paradise" (in 80 or 83 heads) wrote by Patriarch Kallistos, a writing characterized by the almost equally fiery description of the soul's feeling, a feeling lived in union with God in love.

We have in this dizzying writing, a description of the encounter of the mind with the godlike "One". It is a description having the theological height of the Areopagite's writings, which this writing is influenced by, but this writing is too, a Christianizing of the neo-Platonic philosophy of the "One" (see, for instance, the head no. 43), by more insistently highlighting His personal character, and for the great importance it grants to the feeling of love in relation with Him.

We have in this writing the same highlighting of the absolutely necessary role of the Holy Ghost in the union with God and in the fiery feeling of the love for God in this union. The bridge between the created soul and the transcendent God, it is built up by the Holy Ghost, and only by Him. The Holy Ghost elevates us out of nature, out of our speculations about God, which we do from distance, and the Holy Ghost elevates us to Himself, and, by this, to our true nature (see heads: 74, 75, 81, 82, 84). We have here the affirmation of the same need for making our mind imageless (ανίδεο – heads: 58, 33), simple (heads: 20, 30, 51, 91). The godlike light, seen by hesychasts, it is deepened in endless ascensions (idea taken from Saint Gregory of Nyssa and from Saint Maximos the Confessor). By surpassing everything that is understood, the mind is, in the same time, a supra-luminous darkness, a term taken from Dionysus the Areopagite. The term αείβλυτα (always springing out) mentioned in the two writings of Patriarch Kallistos (heads: 53, 86) can be found here too, both in this form (head no. 72) and in the form as απειρόβλυτος (head no. 49).

Even more than that, itself the "Method in 100 Heads of Kallistos and Ignatius", not only that it uses the same characteristic terms, but it also affirms as supreme ideal - to be reached by the spiritual man – the union of the soul with the "One" (head no. 38). Equally common both to Kallistos the Katafygiote and to the "Method" of Kallistos and Ignatius, it is the idea that the prayer reached at its peak, it has gone out of movement, no longer being possible to fall off this state (Method, head no. 38). The spiritual atmosphere, the impetus of love and of sinking and of eternal resting in the endless abyss of the God's love, they are the same in the writing called "The Paradise", wrote by Patriarch Kallistos, in his writing about prayer, and in the writing belonging to Kallistos the Katafygiote. The only difference would be that this atmosphere and these themes reach, in the writing belonging to Kallistos the Katafygiote, a higher degree, or an ultimate degree of enthusiastic and flaming feeling.

This writing, placed at the end of both the Greek Philokalia and the Byzantine spirituality, it represents not only a magnificent synthesis of the whole spiritual writing from before it, but it is also a peak of the thinking subtlety and of the Byzantium's feeling of intense spirituality.

Of Kallistos the Katafygiote,

Preserved Heads, out of the All-High and of Right-Judgment (Syllogistic) Heads about the Godlike Union and the Contemplative Life

1. Any being finds, naturally, resting and pleasure, in the higher work of his nature. That's why any being rejoices of it and it attaches itself to it, the most. So, the man too, as one having mind, and as one whose life it naturally belongs the cogitation to, he is sweetened and he is imparted with resting, especially when cogitating at the high realities and as the thing about himself, be it these ones called, by somebody, as good, or beautiful. And this truly happens when the man had God within his mind, and when the man cogitates at God's features, for God is the highest being, cogitates with the mind and above-mind, and for God loves the man in the highest and above-mind mode, and for God honors the man with the highest honors and with the above-human-mind His good things; and this is forever.

2. Any kind of birth makes the born one wot be alike the one who gave him birth. This is for the Lord said: "what is born out of body, it is body, and what is born out of Ghost, ghost it is" (Jn. 3: 6). Consequently, if the one born out of Ghost, he is Ghost, it will be obvious that he will be also god, according to the Ghost Who gave him birth, since the Ghost - Whom the one born by Ghost is partaker to - He is true God too. This is for God has His name (θεος) from: to see (θεωρεις). Consequently, the one who doesn't see (who doesn't contemplate), or who hasn't been found worthy ever since his spiritual birth and impartation, or who, by being found worthy of it, he afterwards closes his seeing power because of his lack of skillfulness and he stupidly turns himself away from the godlike rays cogitated with the mind around the Sun of the Righteousness, Who is cogitated with the mind, namely after that man has been made partaker to the seeing power, and now he unhappily deprives himself of its work, despite he tends to holiness.

3. All the existing realities have received their movement from the One Who has created them, according to their rationality and nature, and therefore the mind too. But the mind's movement lasts forever, meaning that is endless and borderless. So, it is against mind's worthiness and nature, to be moving in a limited and bordered manner. And this happens when the mind moves amongst the limited and bordered thought. This is because of being impossible that the object to be limited and bordered, and the mind's movement regarding that object, to advance endlessly. So, the ceaseless movement of the mind needs an endless and borderless object, which the mind to move itself towards, according to its rationality and nature. But there isn't anything truly endless and borderless, except God Who is One by nature and in the proper meaning. So, the mind must stretch towards the endless and actual One, namely towards God, and the mind must look at Him and to move towards Him – for this is characteristic to the mind's nature[245].

[245] The mind, by being always in movement, it actually needs an object which the mind to endlessly occupy itself with. This object must be in itself endless and borderless. As such, that object which the mind must focus on, it must be that One Who has everything in Himself. This is because, if the One had been one of many, He couldn't have been borderless. In that had been the case, the mind should have been eternally passing from one to another and the mind wouldn't have ever found an object according to its borderless movement. So, the mind wouldn't have been able ever to rest within the endless One. Of course, there seems to be a contradiction between resting and the endless movement. But these two states are reconciled when the mind enters the endless One. Then the mind reaches its borderless movement and its resting. The endlessness of the movement it has found the endless which the mind no longer has to pass from, to something else; in Him the mind has found its resting. The mind has reached that "steadfast movement", or that "mobile stability", which Saint Gregory of Nyssa spoke about. This is no longer an actual "object", because of being possessed by understanding, so that it is limited. The infinite "Object" of the mind is actually a subject: He is the supreme godlike Subject. By and large, a subject is truly understood by another subject; only between subjects, there can be accomplished an understanding. This is because a subject can understand himself only through the mediation of another subject, by being helped by that subject to understand himself. The object cannot be understood through himself. And then, the object leaves me into darkness. It doesn't' help me to understand. But in another's subject understanding, I am, in the same time, endlessly advancing, especially in understanding the godlike Subject. I am resting myself into Him, for I no longer have to pass from something to something else; but I still advance into understanding. This is for I will never exhaust Him by understanding Him, and I won't ever get exhausted in my understanding. And by understanding Him, I understand the objects too.

"The One out of Whom". This is for anyone rejoices, naturally, of the one who is like him. So, by being the mind one according to its nature, though the mind is many according to the acts of the understanding, by stretching itself and by moving itself towards God, the One according to His nature, but Who is many according to His work, the mind cannot fully rejoice before penetrating through the Ghost into The One borderless by nature, passing from the many[246]. Only in The One God, therefore, the mind can fully rejoice. This is for each one of the existences rejoices of what is naturally characteristic to itself. But naturally characteristic to the mind, it is to move, to stretch, to reach, and to fully rejoice of God, the Only One Who is One, simply and limitlessly.

5. The whole movement of the created realities, and therefore the mind's too, it hurries up towards stopping and appeasing and it tries to reach to stability and restring in that stability. This is for every created reality asks for its end and resting. But the mind is the only created reality that, by moving itself amongst the created realities, it cannot achieve stopping and appeasing. This is because, what is created, when reaching the end appropriate to it, since it has begun, the endless movement of the mind, it remains, rightly so, as such, and it asks for something which the mind endlessly to move towards. The mind wont' get appeased and the mind won't be able to reach its target, or within mind there won't take place an endless movement, as we've just said before, if the mind locks itself up amongst the bordered and limited realities. But this is far from the mind's nature, which, obviously, it is always moving. So, it isn't characteristic to the mind to find its quietude or stability into the created realities. But where the mind could use from, what is characteristic to the mind, namely to remain steadfast in movement and to appease itself in this meaning and to be at peace and to receive a true feeling of resting, if not from The uncreated and uncircumscribed One[247]? And this One is God,

[246] Even Saint Gregory of Nazianzus and Saint Maximos the Confessor, they said that God is of infinite times above His infinity and above all His infinite features (Saint Maximos, Gnostic Heads, I, 49-50; The Romanian Philokalia, II, p. 140-141). But the author of the present writing specifies that, the fact that God is above His features, it is explained by that that He is The One "out of Whom" these ones are. He is their Subject.

[247] The mind cannot use what is characteristic to itself, namely the mind's endless movement, which must be, in the same time, resting, except into the borderless One, from Whom our mind

Who is One understood in actual meaning, and Who is above the world. So, our mind must reach, through movement, in This and uncircumscribed (borderless) One, in order the mind to find its natural quietude and in order the mind to achieve the resting of understanding[248], as it is due. This is for, no mind reached in That One will be lacking, by any means, the stability into the Ghost, or the wonderful resting, of the endless Who is the end of all realities, or the movement. This is for the mind has reached into the borderless, the limitless, and uncircumscribed, and imageless, and without countenance, and totally simple One. And this is One Who we have been talking about: God.

6. If God makes His angels ghosts - as David says (Ps. 103[249]: 4) -, and if the people born by the Ghost are made ghost by God too, as the Lord said (Jn. 3: 6), then the man too will be angel and born out of Ghost through the manifested impartation with the Him[250]. But the angel's thing is to ceaselessly look at the face of our Father Who is in heavens, as, again, the Lord said (Mt. 18: 10). So, the one who is manifestly imparted with the Ghost, rightly so, he also must look at the face of God, but he also must tend towards what he is looking at[251]. That's why mustn't pass further, namely within Whom our mind rests, or in Who our mind become stabilized, but in the same time the mind moves towards ever-more understanding. Only into Him our mind can be "steadfast through movement", or "it moves in stability".

[248] The "Understanding resting" it means either the resting opposite to the bodily resting, or the meaning of the understanding's resting. This is for into God it is satisfied the mind's thirst for understanding all realities, though advancing, in the same time, in that understanding. In the union with the beloved One, I fully understand Him and I still am always advancing in understanding Him.

[250] Until here, the mind's resting in God has been explained only out of the nature of the mind's endless movement, and out of the One God, now it is being explained out of the Ghost's work within mind. Only the Ghost liberated the man from the law of the gravitation towards the material realities, imposed to the man by his body. Only the Ghost helps the man to overwhelming the impulses towards the lower things. The Ghost is the "dove" and He makes the man flying "dove" and alike to the bodiless Angel. The whole this teaching about God like One, a One differing from the neo-Platonic teaching about the One, by the fact that this One isn't the immanent foundation of all realities, but He is transcendent, "above world and nature" and the elevation at Him it is being done through the Holy Ghost, and not on a natural way. But the preoccupation with the One, it shows that in the Byzantine culture of the time, there was an interest in Neoplatonism, and this explains the founding of the Neoplatonic school in Florence, by Gemist Pleton, after the year 1453.

[251] The face of God is the expression of His Subject and it must be looked at, or contemplated, but in the same time, the one who contemplates must tend towards what he is looking at, the Prophet David too, he teaches us by saying: "Search for the Lord and strengthen yourself; always look at His face" (Ps. 104[252]: 4). Therefore, he doesn't guard what is his own, that one who, by becoming partaker to the Ghost and, by reaching to experience the untold birth out of the Ghost, and by being elevated to the worthiness of the Ghost, after that, because of the impression about the apparent abundance of his glory, he closes his understanding feeling for God and he no longer wants to tend himself towards God and towards the godlike things. And he does that, regardless to the fact that the Savior commands us to remain into Him, for He too remains into us, as David says too: "Come to Him, to be you lightened" (Ps. 33[253]: 5). And truly so, if we do the things which we owe[254] to, and the things consequent to those, we will see in the light of God-the Father, namely into the Holy Ghost, the light from around God, namely the godlike truth, so that we will not longer happily turn back, because of our lack of understanding, from the godlike rays.

7. The mind reaches to see God, on three ways: by moving by itself, by being moved by another, and on the middle way. The moving by itself it is done only by the mind's nature, by using its will through imagination (imagining). The end of this way is the contemplation of the things from around God, which were, to some extent, imagined by the Hellenes' scholars too. The second way is above nature and it takes place only by the will of God and only through the illumination from God. That's why, the mind is, in this case, totally under the power of God and it is kidnapped towards godlike unveilings and it tastes out of the untold mysteries of God, and the mind sees how the future things will be fulfilled. And the way standing in the middle of the two already mentioned ways, it is a joining, to some extent, of both of the previously mentioned ways. For it is done through increasingly more, in order to understand God increasingly better. It is about the same stability and movement in Him.

[252] In KJB we have: Psalm 105: 4. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[254] Tending towards God it belongs to us, it is due to us, though it is being done through the Ghost. This is for, it is characteristic to the mind, to be into the borderless God. But the mind cannot jump up into the transcendent One by its own power, as this can happen according to Neoplatonism, where the One is immanent to the world. Rightly so, Lossky sees as ensured through the transcendence of the One, His personal character, unlike the Neoplatonism where the One is an impersonal essence (Essai sur la théologie mysthique de l'Eglise orientale, Aubier, 1944, chapter: The Divine Darkness).

the mind's will and imagination, it is the same with the mode of the movement by itself. But it is imparted with the way of the movement through another, because the mind is united, through the godlike illumination, with itself, and now the mind sees, beyond its unity, in an untold manner, God. This is for then the mind gets out of all the seen and told realities from around God, no longer seeing the source of the good or the godhead, neither the wisdom or the-power-giver mastery, nor the Providence, neither something else amongst the godlike realities, but as being itself filled up with the spiritual light and with the joy brought by the godlike fire mixed with the love[255].

8. The mind, using its imagination in order to contemplate the unseen realities, it is advised by faith. And when illuminated by grace, the mind received the strengthening of the trust. Finally, when kidnapped by the godlike light, the mind becomes treasury of love towards people, and all the more towards God. Thus, the job and the threefold movement of the mind become consummate, deifying, sure, and steadfast, through faith, hope, and love. And, by reaching in this wide place from the top of the city, as somebody would say, the mind has been placed in safety in the love's stronghold. This is for, as Paul said, "the love suffers all things, it endures all things", for the good of the faith and of the hope. "The love, he says, it never falls" due to its fiery union and for the untold connection with God[256].

[255] The first mode of seeing God is the natural mode. This is actually a contemplation of the God's features, through cogitation, and the cogitation uses, somewhat, the imaginings too. The second mode is above-nature, produced within mind exclusively by the godlike illumination. This one kidnaps the mind to seeing and tasting the godlike mysteries and to know the future things. The third mode is a mix of the two previously mentioned modes. The cataphatic (the affirmative) is combined with the apophatic (the negative). The mind cogitates too, but it is helped by the Holy Ghost to see in the realities known with the mind the realities which exceed the understanding. This mode of seeing God exceeds the intellectual knowledge of God's features, for the man's understanding penetrates to the experience of the full of meanings luminous light, but also above understanding, which irradiates out of God, and it is filled up with the joy produced by the fire of God's love.

[256] In the state of the fait, the soul if far from God, cogitating at God's features. Through hope the soul is on the way, by having something out of God, something that has come to welcome the soul. Through love, the soul is totally in the arms of God.

9. Nothing is, amongst the created realities, consummately one[257]. This is for, it isn't difficult to see that each one differs from another, through some own feature. But, because of being created, no one differs from another, each of them having a beginning and an end, being them under nature, and not being, actually, one in a simple manner. "One" truly is only the Uncreated One, for He is simple, without beginning, without end, and borderless, and, that's why, limitless. And This One is God.

Only by looking towards This One, through impartation with the-life-maker Ghost, the mind receives at its turn, daily, its due growth, its unity, its simplicity, and its state of deification being strengthened[258]. This is for, we know for a fact, that without the One and without looking at Him into the Ghost, we cannot achieve an increasingly-better mind. This is because the mind has become scattered, and weakened, by the much-divided world and by passions, and the mind needs an above-world power and it need looking at the "One" Who is above-nature, for, by being the mind kidnapped out of the divided realities, to get out of passions and out of division and to achieve the godlike image[259]. This is because the world, by seeding into the mind the worshipping of many gods, and the mind - by looking at them and by serving them - to be persuaded to move against its own nature and to be the mind made to lust for all sorts of passions and to lust for lie instead of truth and virtue[260].

[257] Somebody may say that the soul, though created, it still is one. But the soul needs to combine himself with the body. Besides that, the soul is in a dependency on God. So, the soul "gets composed" with God, by nature, without God "to get composed" Himself with the soul, by nature. In the same mode the angel "gets composed" with God. So that, the angel's quality as creature, it doesn't allow either the angel to eminently be one.

[258] The mind's unity and simplicity are maintained and are strengthened, at their turn, only through God, only by looking at God. This is for, by being God One and borderless, the mind that looks at God, it no longer divides itself amongst many objects, and it no longer gets torn in its work. In this meaning, God is the source and the upholder of the soul's unity. This is for in the soul's unity are gathered up not only all the soul's powers and works, but also the God's power is being communicated increasingly more, to the soul, in the communion that the soul has with God.

[259] Looking at The above-nature One, namely at the One Who is above the composed creation, the mind is kidnapped from looking at the composed and multiple realities, or, the mind gets out of the composed realities and it take the "image" of the borderless One, and the mind becomes thus, itself one and borderless, or the mind actualizes these qualities to itself.

[260] The virtue belongs to the mind's unity and the virtue promotes the mind's unity, for the virtues represents the overcoming of passions as forms of the egotisms fighting to each other.

That's why, the Holy Ghost urges us through the Prophet, by saying: "Come to Him, namely to the One, and be illuminated" (Ps. 33[261]: 6); and in another place: "I firstly am God, and I am after, and except Me there is no other God" (Isa. 41: 4; 44: 6); and again: "Listen, Israel, your Lord God is One Lord" (Deut. 6: 4). The living of the one godhead's Hypostases it doesn't divide the one Reign. The Persons truly are Three, but, regardless, God is One, in being, in power, and in will, in work and in all His other existential features. So, serving to God's unity, looking at it and gathering yourself towards it, with the whole your power, by getting out of the many realities, it is God's will and it is improvement of the mind, as it is also a way to find out the truth, and it is fruit of the godlike love and of the deification.

10. If the many divisions are a lie, and the One is the truth, the mind that is elevated into the Ghost towards the One, towards the One Who is above world, towards the One Who is raised above all realities, towards the One out of Whom the many realities are, then the mind will be elevated towards the Truth Himself. And if the mind won't be able to become free of passions if the truth doesn't set the mind free (Jn. 8: 32), it will be also obvious that the mind will become free of passion when goes towards and when it is elevated, in a unique mode, towards the One Who is above world. So, the mind is helped to achieve the dispassion, and the state of deification, and the godlike adoption, mostly by the freedom, and by no means by slavery[262]. That's why "the servant – he says – doesn't' know what his Lord does" (Jn. 15: 15). But, while the nescience is characteristic to the servant, it is obvious that the one who has been imparted with freedom, he knows the Father's mysteries, and he is allowed to ascend, well and beautifully, towards the worthiness of the adoption. This is for, as not knowing it obviously means the opposite of the knowing, likewise the law of the servant is

The truth too, it cannot be but in unity, because ethe division weakens the reality and it makes it non-understood.

[262] The passions show the soul's slavery. The dispassion is the liberty's sign. The dispassion opens the soul for God. And into God there is freedom. God is the borderless width, that gives the soul power to widen himself endlessly, in order not to remain attached to a limited thing, and in order the soul not to attach, to one at the time and unwillingly, to the limited things. By being into God, the soul is open to the whole, the soul is open to the bottomless depth, or to the limited-by-nothing height. Nothing stopes the mind from extending, from growing up in its content, and to embrace the whole.

decidedly opposite to the law of the son. And while the one who doesn't know, he is a servant, the one who knows, he isn't a servant by any means, but he is a free man, or better said, he is a son. Likewise, while the Ghost of the truths sets us free, by itself this fact the Ghost makes the one whom He is within, as sons of God. "As many you bear the Ghost of God, he says, you are sons of God" (Rom. 8: 14)[263]. So, while looking at the One Who is above nature, it means searching for the truth, and the truth gives the freedom as a gift, and the freedom is the sign of the godlike adoption, and if nothing is greater than this grace of the adoption, and if nothing else is reckoned as more appropriate to the rational nature, then it will be very rational and as necessary as one can get, that the mind to tend to, to search for, and to gather itself up, while being carries by the Ghost, with the whole power, towards the One Who is above-world, namely towards God[264].

11. This is for the Holy Ghost says: "Your Lord God, One Lord is" (Deut. 6: 4). By this, the Ghost's godhead elevated the man's mind towards the One from above world. This is because of not being allowed to preach about the One, while we do not turn our mind and our look towards Him. What the Holy Ghost says, He wants to be understood too. And understanding something, it presupposes tuning the mind towards that something[265]. This is because, if it lacks the turning of the mind

[263] The Ghost sets us free from the body's law, from the nature's law, by strengthening our ghost that is free by nature. But the freedom of the one who is born out of the Ghost, it isn't a freedom of an individual who doesn't care about anything, but it is the freedom of the son. The son is free, but he is free in his love for the Father, and he is free to advance in the limitless love of the Father for him, and the son too, he increases in his love; the son is free to mastering upon all things, for all the things belong to his supreme Father.

[264] This isn't a necessity that is accomplished by itself, namely it isn't a natural necessity, but it is a necessity required by the ghost, in order the ghost to grow up and to be accomplished. Likewise, it isn't a nature's rationality, that is imposed by itself, but it is a rationality required by the rationality of the spiritual accomplishment, by the committing of the existence's meaning.

[265] This is what said before. The teaching about the One God, it would remain empty theory, if the Ghost didn't help us in order to elevate us towards Him, in order to reach to experience Him, and in order to have our life into Him. And this is done by the Ghost for He spiritualized the mind, namely the Ghost liberated the mind of passions, or of the passionate attachment to the limited things. One can reach the truth by removing his passions, namely through spiritualization. This is because the addiction took place as a falling into sin, in passions. And this is a falling off truth too. The truth is the unity, and the elevation into unity is a matter of towards what is to be understood, it will lack also what the mind would want to understand. In such a case, preaching about The One it would be absurd (purposeless), as absurd would be the faith in Him too. And if these ones were absurd, then, cogitating The One by turning and raising the mind towards Him, it would be even more absurd.

12. If the created and rational realities tend, by nature, towards the cause and their search for it by turning themselves towards it, and if all the realities have God as their cause, and God is the peak and The One in a simple mode, it will mean that the mind tends, by nature, and it searches for The One Who is the peak and Who is The One in a simple mode, turning itself towards Him as towards its cause.

13. If "out of Him, through Him, and towards Him are all realities" (Rom. 11: 36), and amongst all realities there is the mind, then the mind too, it is out of Him and through Him. End the mind is even in a special way out of Him and through Him, due to its likeness to God. Consequently, the mind, more than all the other realities, it must look at God. And the words "towards Him" show that the mind must search by turning itself towards the showing of The One Who is above the world. So, the mind must look at "The One".

14. The many realities come out of The One, but The One doesn't come out of the many realities. The creation shows the many realities. So, the creation is, obviously, out of The One. And The One is above creation, as Maker and Builder. So, the one who contemplates the creation as he should, he necessarily will conclude out of contemplating the creation, that there is One above-world. This is for the caused realities, they are very many echoes, out of which it can be known The One Who has brought to existence, through His craftsmanship, wisdom, power, kindness, and taking care, all the realities, as he wanted. That's why, Isaias too, he says into the Ghost: "Raise your eyes and see Who has shown you all these things?" (Isa. 48: 26). By saying "all of these" he named the many caused realities, and by saying "Who", he wanted to elevate the mind towards The One out of spiritual and moral effort. So, this elevation of the mind towards the One it requires also the mind's will to turn towards Him.

Whom all these realities are, and Who is, by nature, One in a simple mode.

15. The creation too, it is gathered in a unity, but is also composed, and it has many parts, and it is not without a beginning, since it is created. But, The One Who creates, He is not The One only as One resulting out of many and diverse things, as a symphonic whole having a sole purpose, but also for, by not being created, he is the beginning cause and before beginning, of all the realities. The mind, by raising itself towards the ultimate realities, it necessarily reaches something that is The One as beginning and ordering the seen order, of the making, of the harmony, and of the cohabitation of all the existing realities, in a unity. This is for, otherwise, the creation went backwards, endlessly, and that would be absurd. This is for, everything that moves and becomes, there was a time when it didn't exist; and if it didn't exist, it means it started existing on a moment in time. And if started existing, it means it was set in movement. But then, we must search for the One Who has set everything in movement, and Who has brought everything to existence. That One must also be totally motionless[266]. This is because, if not so, who is the one moving the one who isn't under another power, since he is uncreated? And if he is being moved, he will be changeable too. And if it is so, of course he is simple, lest by being composed, to be changing the one who we have seen that he is unchangeable. This is for the composition is the beginning of the stability[267]. So, at That One there is no composition so that a greater stability could result later on. And

[267] Since something has been composed, its stability has started too, a stability that the movement has brought that thing to; namely, that thing started having its own shape. God, by being non-composed, there mustn't be a precedent movement in order Him to be composed. But the author of the present writing, he combines in a characteristic manner, the speculative logics with experiencing God. He logically proves that God is One above the world, and that our mind tends towards Him as towards The One. But our mind cannot raise at That One, except through the cleaning of passions and this raising consists of an imprinting of His within the mind, through the mind's looking at Him, and through the Holy Ghost. He combines in an original mode, the logics and the mystique. One leans against another. The Orthodox East hasn't separated these two, as the Christian Occident has done it by only keeping the speculation, or the cataphatic, as for instance does Vl. Lossky, by exclusively keeping the mystique or the apophatic (Essai sur la théologie de l'Eglise d'Orient, Paris, 1944). In Occident only at Nicolaus Cusanus we can found this joining, due to the influence the Christian East had upon him.

there isn't such a stability in order there not to be undoing too[268]. And there is no undoing, in order there not to be change and move at the unchangeable and motionless One. He moves, but He isn't moved, and He is necessarily non-composed too, and that's why He is all-simple and absolute the One above world. And the mind stretching towards Him, it goes out of all realities and on all ways, due to the looking at The One Who is above kindness, and due to the desire for The One Who is above all realities, or, better said, the desire for the One out of Whom all the realities are, and towards Whom all the realities tend naturally[269]. And by taking that one place, as it is due, the mind also gets out of passions. This is for the mind that has been elevated even above to kindness[270], it hardly can remain in the shame of the passions. That's why, the Law says: "You will serve only Him" (Deut. 6: 16), namely to The One who is One. So, we must tend towards the One from the top, if we want to fulfill also the law of God and to be us above passions.

16. "Only the Lord, he says, was leading them and there was no foreign god with them" (Deut. 32: 12). Can you see the power of The One and Only? There was no foreign god with them, for the Lord alone was leading them. But the Lord doesn't guide the ones who turn themselves away from Him. When somebody follows someone, that means he turned himself towards that someone. If we don't want, thus, to have with us a foreign god, namely the devil or some addiction, we will have to follow to The One and Only, by turning our mind towards Him, in order to be said about us, rightly so, and to be believed that "The Lord alone guides them and there is not foreign god with them".

[268] At God there is no stability as result of the movement, because, if that had been the case, starting again the movement into Him it would have led to decomposition. At God there is a stability not-produced by movement, in order Him not to be submitted, by moving, to an undoing too. At God the stability is eternal. But it is a stability that masters upon movement. The author has proven thus, in an interesting way, the Aristotle's formula about God as the motionless mover.

[269] The One, in this teaching, He isn't the object of a simple logical and speculative doctrine, but out of Him it irradiates a power that attracts the mind, for the mind by looking at Him, on the basis of that attraction, and the mind detaching itself from the many and limited realities, the mind it becomes, at its turn, one, namely the mind is strengthened too, in unity.

[270] "The above-kindness realities" are the features of God. The mind is elevated even above those, when looking at the Subject Whom those features irradiates out of.

17. So, the many realities are, all of them, out of The One, but they diversely are out of The One, for also the way these realities come out of the first unity, it is a diverse one. This is for some of those are started and created; others are uncreated and lacking a temporal beginning. But to all of them and all the time, their cause is The One Who is above nature. But this is to some of them through creation, and to some others of them through nature[271]. That's why, we don not get closer to all of those on the same way, and we do not impropriate them to ourselves on the same way. But, to the realities which are under mastery and in the state of the creation, we must get closer to them for som4ething else, and not for themselves, as we get closer to the mirror for what the mirror shows as image. Thus, we get closer to creation not in order to get us improved, but in order us to see the Supreme One within it[272]. But, to the without beginning realities and which are out of Him by nature, we get closer to them also for The One Who those realities are out of. To those realities, we truly must get closer for themselves, and to them is close, by nature, the Culminant One. Better said, those realities are, by nature, close to the Supreme and from the top One. That's why we mustn't only to get closer, but we also must grow up into those realities, and we must strive through those realities, towards imitating the Prime and Unique Good, in order us to be imprinted by Him, and thus, through the together-working and with the help of the grace, us to achieve the dignity of the glory of the image of and of the likeness to God[273]. Thus, the realities caused out of creation, when rightly looked at, they raise our mind through that looking at, to mirroring the One, and they unite our mind, by untying it of all things, in a simple mode, with the unitary meaning of The One, if our mind looks at them as it is due. And the realities which have The One as their cause and worker, by nature, for That One gives the mind a shape alike theirs, they have the power of uniting the mind with Himself That One[274].

[271] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Gnostic Heads, I, 50: The Romanian Philokalia, volume II, p. 141. But the present author draws some original conclusions out of that teaching.

[272] More limpidly said, the creation doesn't improve us through itself, but the creation improves us if we see The One through it. The creation cannot elevate us, by itself, above ourselves, since the creation is below us.

[273] It is affirmed our possibility to non-mediately encounter the God's kindness, and His love, and His power, and through them there can take place the imprinting of their godlike Subject, on our mind itself, or on our subject who encounter them. It is often repeated the affirmation that by itself the mind's looking at God, and under the power of God upon our mind, God is imprinted on our mind, giving our mind His image of kindness, of love, of holiness, and of limitless.

Consequently, out of all the realties caused on any way, either through creation, or through nature, the mind can gather itself together in a natural manner, e8ither by doing, or by contemplating, towards The One Who is the unique cause in diverse modes[275]. And if the mind, by using either one or many from the created realities, or out of the realities natural to God, it isn't used for The One, neither in order to bring itself, gathered together, to the First One and to look wholly, unitarily, and simply, only at Him, in a holy impartation and influence of the illuminating Ghost, this is reckoned as a sin of the mind, even if this use leaves the impression of being good. This is because, the ones who use, as it is due, the realities which are from The One, those ones must bring these realities against back to the One. "The whole exit of the luminous showing, started from the Father and come to us, as a good gift, it fills us up like a unifier power and it turns us again upwards, towards the deifying unity and simplicity of God, the One Who gathers all realities together. This is for, out of Him and towards Him are all realities". And if the mind doesn't gather itself together and it doesn't raise towards Him, then the mind will have been deviated from its nature and the use of the things will no longer be done in a due mode.

18. There is a doing that precedes the contemplation and there is a doing succeeding the contemplation. The first one is done bodily, in order to give to the mind that has restrained the body's impulses and that has made the body to behave in good order, power in order the mind freely step in its things, which are the spiritual realities, and there to work well, what is useful to the mind. And the second one, starting from the mind and from the cogitation into Ghost, it gathers the mind together, [274] By looking through the created realities, the mind gets united with the meaning of That One Who has created those realities. But, by uniting itself with the realities which irradiate, by nature, out of The One, the mind gets united with Himself The One, or with the Subject of those energies.

[275] Thus, the mind can gather itself together, driven by its nature, either out of encountering the created things, or out of encountering the uncreated energies, towards The One Who is their cause in diverse modes. Out of things the mind gathers itself together by doing, or through the cleaning of the passions and through virtues, by adopting a right attitude towards the things, with the deed, out of the uncreated energies through the contemplation, or through itself the sight of the mind.

towards the One Who is above mind, and Who is God, and to Who getting the mind closer, the mind actually gets closer to The One. This is for God is One.

Then the mind itself unites with itself, in a unity, and so the mind becomes undivided. This is for The One is causing the godlike unity and the simplicity, when contemplated. This is because it is impossible to the mind, by contemplating The One, not to be, at its turn, one and simple. Likewise, by looking at the divided and composed realities, the mind immediately becomes divided and diverse.

I've called as The One, simply, The One Who is simple by Himself. This is for the mind, by enduring the changes after working, and the mind itself being simple, it is necessarily simple also after working only when seeing The One. And if the mind had seen The One, while the mind had been divided at least in two, which would have been the cause making a part of it to differ from another, which sees The One? If that had been the case, the mind either would have been able to see something else, or it wouldn't have seen anything. And this last thing could have been happened due to three reasons: either because the mind not wanting to see, or due to its bluntness, or because of being made for another work, but not for seeing. But, if somebody supposed that the mind sees something else, behold the mind wouldn't simply see The One, but the mind would see two things, contrary to the rationality. And by seeing two things, the mind couldn't have been one. This is for the mind, as it has been shown, it gets cut in the realties it contemplates. And if the mind hadn't seen, this wouldn't have been because of not wanting, for the rational mind cannot be unworking even for the shortest instant. But neither the mind could have been blunt in this regard and sharp in another regard. In such a case, the mind would have been composed, and not simple; in such a case, the mind would have consisted of some non-resemblant parts, like a part of the mind would have been appointed to seeing and another one would have been appointed to other kind of work. Because this too, it would have been a sign of the composition. But this is totally inappropriate to be said, taking in account the mind's simplicity. For these reasons, when the one and simple mind contemplates The simple One, the mind must be one in working too. And if the mind is one in a simple mode, then the mind must be one in working too. And if not, the mind won't benefit anything, and the mind will work or contemplate vainly. This is because, since the mind is submitted to division, the mind will be the worker of the passions, because of not being carries by the soul's feeling towards the unitary union with The One Who is above mind. And only this union can clarify and clean up the mind's sight, and to elevate it and to direct it towards The One, and by making the mind experiencing the attaching to That One out of Who, through Whom, and into Who, there are all the realties, and towards Who are made and are existing all the realities[276].

19. The godlike and above-mind union, with the soul, it is the highest of the desired good things. But the godlike order required the likeness to God. And for the likeness to God, one needs the mind's work, namely the contemplation (seeing)[277]. For this is characteristic to God too, and from this work (θεωρία) God is called by us with the name Θεός. So, the contemplation scends directly to understanding God[278]. This is for God sends from everywhere, to the seer mind, like some rays, and the seer mind has God as its target. And God is One and above world.

On the other hand, it belongs to the mind's nature to actually become what it sees. This is shown also by the speaker of God voice of Saint Gregory, who says that "the mind sees and it experiences the shininess of God". This is for, what the mind saw, the same the mind experienced, for the mind became alike. "The mind is colored, says Peter from Damascus, according to what it sees". And, like by looking at the divided and diverse realities, the mind becomes divided and diverse, likewise, by being elevated to looking at The Simple and Above-World One,

[276] We have here a beautiful logical analysis demonstrating that only if the mind is simple, it will be able to concentrate wholly towards seeing God The One. If the mind had been composed, a part of it would have seen God, and another part of the mind would have remained addicted to things. But if that had been the case, the part remaining addicted to things, it would have disturbed the part contemplating God too. Or, if only a part of the mind had been contemplating God, the awareness of the mind's division it would have introduced a limitation also into God. If that had been the case, the contemplated One wouldn't have been The One.

[277] The mind's work is the contemplation or the spiritual seeing. It follows to the previous work, that one of the doing, directed upon the body, in order to clean the body of passions.

[278] Like the sensitive things can be seen for they send some kind of rays to the sensitive eye, likewise God is seen by the mind, for God sends some kind of intelligible (possible to understand) rays, to the mind. Therefore, any kind of contemplation about God, even if seems purely intellectual, it still establishes some kind of contact between God and mind.

the mind becomes one, as I said before[279]. And if, by reaching into The One, the mind sees The Without Beginning, Borderless, Shapeless, and Simple One – for The One is such -, the mind will become, at its turn, without beginning, borderless, shapeless, and simple, according to its work[280]. And the mind, by experiencing these things, and by being changed thus, it is in a likeness with the godhead, as much as it is this possible. And thus, the mind ascends to the highest amongst the desired good things, to the above-mind and untold union with God. But, in order to do that, the mind must strain itself, with the whole its power, towards hurrying up and towards desiring into Ghost, to reach the contemplation and the seeing of The One Who is above the world.

20. When the mind is divided amongst many realties, or at least between two, it is obvious that the mind cannot see The Simple One, and that's why the mind is bordered, limited, and darkened. This is because thus are the realities which aren't totally simple. But when the mind reaches to a touchless touching with The True One, knowing Him through a sight understanding into the Ghost, and without involving the eyer, the mind becomes without beginning, endless, borderless, imageless and shapeless, it is dressed up with the not-speaking, and it gets accustomed to the silence of the awe, it is filled up with joy, and it experiences the untold realities. But do not reckon that I say that the mind becomes without beginning, endless, and borderless, according to its being, but the mind becomes like that according to its work, for what is changes, it is not the being of the mind, but it is the mind's work. This is because, if the mind had been changed according to its being, when seeing and experiencing the godhead, or when being deified towards seeing God, the mind would have been itself God, according to the being. But, something like that cannot be even someone amongst angels, but like that is the only, the supreme, and the one God Who is God according to His Being. And, consequently, it is absurd to say that the mind is deified according to its being, then we only could say that the mind experiences the deification through itself the work of seeing. So, it isn't characteristic to the mind's nature that its being to be transformed, but only the mind's work is transformed. Besides, if the mind is naturally transformed, as it was said, according to the realities it contemplates, but the mind doesn't contemplate, by any means, the godlike Being, but only the godlike work, the mind won't be transformed according to its being, but according to its work[281].

[279] The fact that the spiritual contemplation or seeing of God, it implies the coming of some rays from God to the mind, it has as consequence the fact that the mind - or the subject – it is imprinted with the image of God, namely the mind becomes in His likeness. Thus, the likeness of the man to God it cannot be done without contemplating God.

[280] The seer of God, work of the mind, it actually no longer is its work, but it is the work of God within the mind, it is His active ray within the mind. But this work becomes so characteristic to the mind, that the mind lives it like its own. So, we must understand that the seer lives this work as not-begun, borderless, simple, and shapeless.

21. Shining[282] all the realities out of The One Who is above the world, and they do not detach themselves, by any means, from That One Whom they have taken their being from, but as they have been created by That One, likewise they are uphold and consummate by Him, and there isn't anything in any of them which not to come like a flowing and like a fragrance, out of That truly One Maker[283]. And all the partakers to existence realities, they almost speak, by unveiling not The One Who is above the world (for This One is above any contemplation of understanding), but a certain ray of The One Who is above the world. That's why, given that all the realities shout out on The One, and all realities tend towards The One, and The One Who is above the world He shows Himself through all realities, it is absolutely needed the mind to be guided, advised, and brought to The One Who is above the world. And this is done, on one hand, by being the mind forced by the urge of many creatures, and on the other hand, by the fact that Himself The Untold Creator says: "I am the life" (Jn. 11: 25); and: "This is the eternal life, they to know You The One and true God" (Jn. 17: 3); and in another place: "Search for the Lord and your soul will live" (Ps. 86[284]: 33). This is for the sight comes from searching and the life comes from seeing[285]. He would want to be seen by the mind, in order the mind to get gladdened, to get illuminated, and rejoice, as David says: "Into You there is the dwelling place of all the ones who gladden themselves" (Ps. 86[286]: 7); and: "Into Your light we will see light" (Ps. 35[287]: 9). He has made, on one hand, the mind to be seer, and on the other hand, He has sown all His features in all existing realities, so that through them, as through some openings, to show Himself to the mind, in a light of the understanding, conquering the mind, illuminating the mind, and attracting the mind towards Himself[288].

[281] The Eastern discerning between the being and the work of God, it allows this teaching to speak about a deification of the mind according to the work, and not according to the being. The scholastic theology, when speaking about a contemplation of God's being, by the mind, in the future life, it should reach the conclusion of a deification of the mind according to the mind's being, and that means a pantheism.

[282] All the things are shiny for the come from The One Who is luminous light. Rightly so, the Romanian people call the world as "lume", namely luminous light. The physical realities have the luminous light as their ultimate essence. The persons illuminate when the sincerely open themselves to others, so that they are too - in their actualization, as factors of conscious relation - luminous lights. But the physical things are luminous for they have a meaning too, a logos out of the godlike Logos Who is the supreme meaning of all realities. And the persons are luminous, for they are living within their conscience's light, and for they are searching for their own meanings in all realities.

[283] None of the created realties stands by itself, but all of them are uphold by the Maker, through a work irradiating out of Him (απόρροια), and all of them persist and advance towards their own target, and towards a general target, not through a static connection with Him, but through a power coming out of Him in a continuous irradiation, like the rays of a luminous light source are irradiating continuously.

22. God Who is the Trinitarian One Good, what He did, He did it because He wanted. But God wants the highest good. This is for the kindness is His nature. So, for He has created the mind as seer of Him, and of His realities, and this gathers the seer mind towards The One, it is a thing wanted by God that, the mind to contemplate Him (to see Him). And this is for He is through Himself the supreme Good. This is for God is One in a proper and simple sense, and the fact that the mind searches for

[285] The seeing transforms the life of the one who sees, for it places the one who sees in connection with a seen content. That's why, when it is seen a source of healthy life, one above the passing life, this source nourishes the life and it elevates the life on an imperishable level. The view, or what is seen, it has an ontological effect – we could say. I do not change myself into life, through seeing, only by following the example of a superior life seen by me, or only for I am influenced by a bad example seen by me. But, out of the source I am seeing, it comes within me a current (απόρροια) of power, in the good or the bad meaning of the word.

[286] In KJB we have: Psalm 87: 7: "As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there: all my springs are in thee."/ in ROB we have: Psalm 86: 6: "For into You is the dwelling place of everybody who gladden themselves".

[287] In KJB we have: Psalm 36: 9. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[288] The Word of God, as Rationality-Subject, He has given to the rationality-subject of the man, His rationalities-objects, materialized in things, in order there to be a common content for the dialogue with the human subject. They are equally many words of the Word-Person, towards the human persons, in order the human person to answer Him, through these ones. The things are the eyes which God looks at us through. The world is like a sift crossed through by eyes, which God-the Word looks at us through, and we too, look at Him.

Him and unitarily gathers itself towards Him, it is, like it has been shown, the highest good too[289].

23. If the love usually is one and not-undoable, according to the teaching of the wisemen of God, then One will be the beloved One too. This is because, if the beloved realities had been at least two in number, there would have been two loves too, or the one love would have been divided in two, and it wouldn't have been any longer called as one and undivided. But, since we say that, by and large, the love is one and not-undone, we must understand that the beloved One is One too[290]. But the One Who is loved, He is before the love for Him, and until somebody doesn't have something out of the beloved One, that somebody cannot have either the love for Him[291]. And the love means that we must extensively love God, as we are required by the natural and written law of God. The natural law urges our loving of good mind, to search for the greatest good, which is God; and the written law commands us: "You will love your Lord God, with the whole your soul, with the whole your heart, and whit the whole your thought" (Deut. 6: 5); and: "Your Lord God One Lord He is" (Deut. 6: 4). So, One is the worthy of Love One: He is the Trinitarian Unit. And this precedes the mind in the mind's love for God in Trinity[292]. So, the mind must want to [289] God is in Himself, or for Himself, the highest Good. But the mind that is gathered, by seeing, into Him, the mind receiving God within itself, that mind becomes too, by participation, the highest good.

[290] The love cannot be divided. Everything that belongs to the love is concentrated into love. That's why the love is wholly directly towards the beloved one. For this reason, even if the beloved ones are two, the love is directed wholly towards each one of them, and thus the love unites them. And the love suffers when seeing them as wanting to remain divided. The love wants to see the beloved ones as united, in order itself not to be divided. In God this desire of the love is being accomplished. Into God, the loves see all people united, for God is One and in Him everybody have their origin and support. By loving The One God, the love is satisfied in its not-undone fullness. In this case, the love is no longer exposed, to any sufferance.

[291] The beloved One exists before our love for Him existed. Better said, if there is a love amongst us, there must existed somebody worthy to be loved, before us coming to existence, or before us being capable of loving Him. You must be aware of the beloved One and you must have something out of Him, or you must feel within yourself the quality that makes Him worthy of love, in order you to love Him. If our subject feels the need for loving and for loving in a culminant degree, it will mean that this culminant love existed before any human subject - who feels the need for love – existed, namely it existed before any human love.

[292] If the one who loves must receive within himself something out of the one Whom he loves, before loving Him, in order that one to be able to love Him, the loved One has to communicate something out of His love to the ones into whom He wants to awaken the love for Him. That means that within the beloved One there must be a love, for Him to communicate out of that extend itself towards The One Who is above the world, so that by finding Him and by seeing Him, the mind's love to be kindle for Him, and the man to be able to become fulfiller of the law and of the commandment, by loving, according to the things we've just said, his Lord God.

24. It is impossible to the mind that has ascended towards The One Who is above understanding, not to be filled up with love for Him. This is for the mind encounters an untold and non-comprisable beauty, starting from within That One as from an all-upholding root. That's why, when the mind is full with the godlike illuminations, so that the mind is like a fishing net on the brink of getting torn apart because of the load of fish, and the mind is overwhelmed with awe by watching at that above-mind beauty. And, the mind is even drunk as of wine, and the mind gets out of itself, and it experiences a bewilderment above understanding, because of not being able to look at that above-beauty showing of the unusual beauty. For this reason, the mind is kept, to say so, in the chains of the love and the mind feels itself burning as of a great thirst[293].

This is for This One is and above-understanding One, but He is One preached by all realities as their Cause existing from before, as the beginning, as the end, and as the Upholder of all realities. He has brought to existence the beauties and the good things of all the beautiful and good realities, through a springing out, out of His power, of a making of beauty and good things power, while Himself remaining, endlessly and for infinite times, above all beauty and all kindness, and being Him One above world and without resemblance. Only Him is worthy to be loved, and He is above everything that is worthy to be loved, for only Him is - in an actual meaning – Good and Beautiful, and above anything that is good and beautiful[294]. Only Him is truly love, to the one whose love He desires. But in order to have that love in Himself, before the man existed, He must be in a communion. Thus, God as the supreme source of love and as the supreme Subject worthy to be loved, He must be a God in several Persons Who to still be united through Their love.

[293] Other antinomies of the love: the love makes free the one who has it, but the love still keeps him as in chains, for that one cannot forsaken the love; the love satisfies in a consummate manner, but it still persists in it a ceaseless thirst, due to a longing for even more love, a such a big thirst, that the one who loves he seems to be burning, because of love.

[294] God fills the soul up, when He is seen as One, with so much joy and light, for His unity isn't an abstract, or mathematical, unity, but it is the fulness of life containing all the realities which worthy of being loved, through the law of the love and of the order, as the Cause od all realities. And this is all the more, as He exceeds all the realities worthy of being loved, through the overwhelming beauty and kindness and He truly is One above world, as the only One truly existing and causing all the existing realities.

Let's aspire, therefore, through the good zeal, to reach into Ghost to the finding and to the knowledge of The One Who only Him is One, from Who are the beginning of all the realities, and into Who there are the borders of all realities. By doing so, it surely will be opened to us, the gate of the godlike love through the grace of Christ, and we will enter the resting of our Lord (Hebr. 4: 3), in much happiness and gladness, and we will know the joy of being imparted with The One, and we will taste the godlike sweetness, by becoming us, at our turn, one too, and by no longer being torn apart and divided, according to the Savior's prayer towards the Father: "for they to be one, as We are one" (Jn. 17: 22). Then we will be the full guards of the commandment that says: "You will love your Lord God with the whole your soul, and your neighbor as on yourself" (Deut. 19: 18). Then we will have reached the consummation possible to the man. This is for "the end of the law if the love" (Rom. 13: 10). Of this consists not only the whole law and the Prophets (Mt. 22: 10), but also the ones who are consummate into Christ.

25. All realities being naturally united into the Ghost, the division means a falling off Ghost. That's why, also the mind when is divided in its work, it is outside the living into Him according to the grace. And the mind experiences this by looking at diverse things. This is because the mind cannot have the non-division while looking at diverse things. And this is because, if somebody supposed this as possible, he wouldn't be able to easily explain why the quiet mind it differs from the disturbed mind. If that had been the case, the mind of the ones who are carried by God it would have been shown like the one troubled by the passion's disorder, and that is absurd. So, the mind becoming, according to the work, like what it receives, necessarily, when looking at the composed things, the mind becomes diverse too, and, by falling off simplicity, the mind are above all the world's beauties and good things. Out of God, as the only One Who truly is One, blindingly irradiates all the beauties, all the lights, all the meanings, and all the gifts.

won't be able, any longer, to keep its non-division. And while divided, the mind is less clean of sin than anything, since itself the fact of being divided is reckoned as sin by the ones who can understand these aspects. If, consequently, the understanding power asks the mind for tasting – by looking towards the supreme and from above world One, and in an understanding feeling, and unitarily – the above-nature Good, while living in division, the mind falls off grace.

That's why, we must attach ourselves to The One Who is above the world, and to look only at Him, with the whole our soul, in order us to get rid of division and estrangement. But, not only that, but even if the mind looks at a sole thing, if that thing is a created one, then the mind won't be able to become non-divided. This is because the created one cannot be actually called as simple, since it is limited, composed, and circumscribed; and that's why, no one has the right to be called, simply, One. And the mind focusing its look toward a limited thing, it won't have its work simple and unique. This is for the mind's look will be limited and circumscribed and composed, as it is the thing contemplated by the mind[295]. Consequently, it will [295] No only when looking towards many things, it is the mind divided and therefore disturbed, but also when looking towards a sole thing, but a created one. This is because a created thing, by being limited, it cannot absorb the whole mind in looking at it, but there remain within mind great reserves not engaged in that looking, reserves which protest against the mind's engaging against the mind's preoccupation with that sole thing, and that causes within man a tearing apart. This is a tearing apart experienced by any of us, almost permanently. In no thing we can find the whole. That's why, with another part of our being, we crave for something else. We are especially not finding the whole, when we consider anything as standing by itself. In such a case the thing still remains unexplained. The thing is potentially composed, by the fact that the thing is connected to the ultimate ground of all things: to God. Only God is explainable through Himself, for He is and He comprise everything. But each thing shows itself as composed, by the fact too, that it is limited. This is because any limit it involved the awareness about something existing beyond that limit (Simeon Frank, La connaissance de l'être). That's why nothing is, in a simple manner, One. This is because by not-comprising all the realities, it presupposes that beyond itself, and next to itself, there are other realities.

But any sort of immanent foundation of the whole, in a pantheistic sense, it cannot be The true One. This kind of one, it is forced by a law superior to it, to diversify, so that it has within itself the multiplicity in a potential manner. That one is nature, and it is not a subject. That one is identical to what comes out of itself. But it is not like that, in the case of the godlike Subject, and therefore neither is like that in the case of the human subject who is created in God's image. The divine energies aren't one with the divine being, and, on the other hand, neither are they one with the created world. The world is created through energies, and not through an emanation out of God. The danger of the pantheism stalks the Occidental theology, that doesn't' discern between uncreated energies and creation. The human subject can remain or he can become, at its turn, one, for he enjoys some kind of "transcendence" from nature. But it is a fall off the godlike grace that was making it, before, as simple, without beginning, and uncircumscribed. And it will be outside The hidden and above-understanding One[296]. That's why, the mind will be deprived of its glory, that is the joy for being the unique and without beginning origin, of the work, the joy for limitlessness, for simplicity, for having reached imageless and unitary. And the mind won't reach to receive within itself the imprinting of the above-nature and all-untold beauty. Therefore, it is due that the mind to search for and to tend towards The One Who is without beginning, simple, limitless, and truly One, and from there, the mind to hurry up to become illuminated and to join with the original unity, which gathers all realities together and, consequently, the mind will be united with itself. By this, not only that the mind will be loved by The All-Good One, as one that has become, as much as it is possible to the mind, alike the limitless and the simplicity of The One Who is imageless and shapeless, but the mind will even be able to love the godlike and above-nature beauty, for the mind will be, as I said, elevated towards its likeness[297]. This is for, if in the one who is alike it usually is born a disposition that love the alike realities, it will be obvious that the mind will be love and it will love God, and this is for what is alike, it is alike to someone who is alike it too, and as the likeness has its complement corresponding to it, likewise the one who loves is, at his turn, loved. And between created transcendence, and not a creator one. But the human subject can be considered as participating to transcendence, for it tend to raise above the created world and for the human subject can find his accomplishment only in the uncreated world. The human subject consciously actualized his limitlessness, and he can live in the limitlessness of the divine Subject, for the human subject has become in His likeness, by receiving His uncreated energy, and by being capable of receiving that energy.

[296] No longer being in connection with The One, by sight, the mind will be outside the grace, or outside the transforming ray coming from Him. The mind won't be actualized in its simplicity, and it won't receive in that simplicity the endless richness of The One, because of not having the grace of The One Who is truly One, or the connection with Him, and Who comprised within Himself all the realities.

[297] Only the mind that unites itself with the godlike One, it actually united, through its works, with itself too, becoming one in work, as it is one in being. Only that mind is aware of its limitless unity and it lives that unity. Only by living its limitless unity in working, of its abyssally rich unity, the mind lives the infinitely rich unity of God. But this is valid also vice versa, namely, only by living in intimate relation with the divine Subject, the mind will live the indefinite reality of its own subject.

God and the human soul, there isn't a greater communion that this one[298].

26. The mind will ascend above its nature when it consummately ascends at what is above the nature, the mind becoming imageless and shapeless and entirely deified, without beginning and endless, and, to say so, above its own unity[299]. And when the mind keeps within itself, its understanding, even if still occupied itself with the spiritual and above-senses realities, the mind will move naturally and it will still remain in its nature. And what is above-nature, it exceeds by far what it is according to the nature, and it is far higher. That's why, we must love forcing ourselves to ascend to what is above nature, for that is better, according to the commandment that says: "Crave for the best amongst the gifts" (1 Cor. 12: 31). And the mind, while being in what is above the nature, it will be into God. This is for God is outside any nature, He being the All-Old (All-Original) and simply The One. That's why the mind must tend towards the All-Old (All-Original) and Simple One, and the mind must strive to look towards Him, in order to be elevated for, while being in The One Who is above the nature, in a manner that is above the mind's natural work, to reach a state that is better than the mind's state according to its own nature[300].

[298] "There isn't a greater communion between God and soul". It is about the affection awakened by God withing the man's soul, and vice versa. This affection is not only a thought one, but it is also produced by each one's answering the desire of the another. Of course, God accepts this affection produced by the loving answer of the human soul, only because He wants. The mind's gathering together, from all realities, into God, it is a deed of the love too, it is an affectionate answer of the man to God's desire, and it isn't only an intellectual movement.

[299] The mind crossed into an act of total love for God, beyond itself. And for the mind is the highest in the created order, by ascending above itself, the mind is elevated to the divine transcendence. That's why the mind is made for transcendence, namely it implies in itself the relation with the transcendence. But because only the created realities are to the extent of the mind's understanding, by being elevated into God, the mind is elevated to what is above understanding. This is for the plan of the understanding coincides, in a certain way, to the created or the immanent plan. But this entrance into the transcendence plan it is an experience of the infinite and above-world richness, that one hidden in the godlike One.

[300] The elevation of the mind above its own nature, in the divine and transcendent One, it means ascending above the mind's natural work; it means that God seed His work within the human mind, namely that God elevates the mind through His work, though the mind has impropriated this state also through its own experience. God's transcendence, in the Christian teaching, it doesn't mean locking God in a plan that is inaccessible to the creature, but it simply indicates that God is from another plan than the created, natural, immanent, and submitted to the natural laws plan. It means that there is a possibility for the creature to be elevated above

27. Each one of the existing creatures, it enjoys its own things, and it naturally rests itself in those things. But all these creatures preexisted before, according to their cause, in the All-Original Cause. That's why, the mind will natural reach the true joys and it will have the imperishable happiness and it will endlessly rest itself, when, by crossing through and by leaving all realities behind itself, the mind will stretch itself towards that original, unique, and totally-first cause, and the mind will reach, through an understanding turning, there where all beginnings, all middles, and all ends (targets), of all realities, have come to existence; to the cause in which they have their ground from before, and which all realities are being kept through, and which are brought towards their own target through, the realities which are being consummated; to the cause which they achieve the good experience for, the realities which are imparted with this good suffering[301], and the cause which the mind too, it has been built up by, like it is. This is for, in some mode, while the mind turns towards the cause of all realities, the mind actually turns towards itself, for that cause is the mind's prototype (model)[302].

Actually, each one loves himself naturally, and especially the mind is the one experiencing this love[303]. But by being supra-luminous image of the non-comprised beauty of The One Who is above understanding, the mind looks - through its turning - at its cause, with love, for, as it was said, by looking nature's plan; this is for there is a plan which the creature can be elevated on. And for this plan is the plan of the sovereign will and freedom, and of the absolute power upon any law, in manifesting the good, the conscious creature cannot be elevated on that plan, except by the work of the transcendent God. God's transcendence is an active transcendence, capable of and desiring to work upon the plan of the created nature, in order to elevate the created nature on the plan of God's absolute love and freedom.

By being elevated on this plan, the human subject becomes better than he is according to his nature. Thus, the human subject reaches the plenitude of exercising the absolute freedom, unlike on the plan of his created nature where he cannot exercise it plenary.

[301] The good suffering is the suffering of the happiness, and of the illumination, and of the love. This is for all of these are produced within us by God. Even in the purely earthly live, we cannot achieve the happiness only as a fruit of our own action, but also as a fruit of the love given us, as a gift, by another.

[302] Only for the mind, by gathering itself into God, it finds itself, helped by its cause and model Who works within the human mind efficiently, and the mind, by exceeding itself, it experiences, paradoxically, in the same time, the fullest happiness or the best suffering. And by this, though reached outside itself, it accomplishes its natural desire for full happiness.

there it sees itself and it loves on itself above anything[304]. But also differently: the ones having their being from somebody, they naturally feel an impulse of love towards that somebody whom they have come to existence from, and vice-versa, the parents are mastered by love for the children born out of them. That's why, within the one who turns himself towards The One Who is the everybody's cause, it springs out a great pleasure. This is for that one turns, as I said, in the same time, towards That One and towards himself. And this is for in That One existed from before, in the virtue of the cause, all the realities, so also the mind, as one amongst all, it is in The One Who is above understanding, as in the cause and the model of all realities.

28. Like all the beings are out of the One Who is above-being, out of the One Who is above-nature it is all the nature, out of the non-temporal and incomposite One are all the temporary and composed realities, and out of the uncreated One are all the created realities, likewise the imageless One has made on Himself all the images, and out of the One Who is above-world are all the shown many realties. So, the one who doesn't occupy himself with The Imageless One and who doesn't look at Him, by somehow hanging on Him, but he looks towards something else from amongst the realities seen in image and creation, that one gives primacy to the realities which are incomparably lower than The One Who sits above, and so the human mind will be almost worshipping idols. This is because what somebody occupies himself with, what he aspires to, that something conquers him too. And what conquers the man, that enslaves him too. And thus, a man like this, he ends serving the creation instead of serving the Creator. This is for each one's mind is enslaved by and it served to what he occupies himself with. And that is the things the mind loves. If, therefore, the occupation with something else and the looking at something else than The One Who is simple and imageless, it brings so much sliding away, we must direct our zeal towards The One Who is simple and imageless, in order to know Him through our understanding turning and tending, and in order us to be partakers to the treasures of all knowledge (2 Pt. 2: 9). This is for, the ones who have united themselves with Him, they are imparted with the resting or with the stopping of all contemplation, and with the stopping of all cogitation, and with the above-mind silence, and with the impossible to explain gladness, out of much awe[305].

[304] Thus, it is reconciled the love for the self with the self-exceeding. In its cause, the mind loves both God and itself. Besides, generally, by loving on another, any subject finds in this his own happiness. The difference from egotism is that my subject doesn't start loving another subject with the intention of finding my own happiness. My happiness will come to me without I, thinking at it, even for a moment.

29. If all the existing realities desire their existence, and everybody's existence is, according to the cause, in One Who is above existence, consequently, all the existing realities, and especially the rational ones, if the move straight and as it is due, by wanting their existence, they will actually want The One Who is above existence[306]. So, the mind that doesn't tend towards The One Who is above existence, neither it desires Him, that mind wrongly and sinfully uses its movement and it fall off its worthiness, for the mind's worthiness consists of knowing The One Who is above existence and it consists also of all-godlike and above-mind union with Him, as consists of loving Him too.

30. The causes abundantly have the beauties of the realities they cause. And everybody's cause, by and large, it is The One Who is above being. So, if the mind attaches itself to something amongst the realities which are below The One Who is above being, as a good reality or worthy of mind's attention, that mind will miss, without any doubt, its target. That mind will be loving of good, but it won't move towards the prime and own and above-being One, out of Whom all the good realities are through impartation, but that mind will move, because of its carelessness and nescience, towards the realities which are imparted with goodness. But the mind that searches successfully, it directs the sight of its understanding towards The One Who is above being, by limpidly knowing that thus it will abundantly achieve what it wants, by reaching within its cause through that understanding seeing. Such a mind will know that nobody gives the good things it has, or any other good thing, except The One Who is above nature. This is for, even if the mind reckons that some of those come out of an own power, those ones do not use to always remain in the loving mind. Only the Holy Ghost has been entrusted with doing that, and to work the good things as He wishes, and in whom He wants, for He is Lord of the mastery nature and Person of the Unity in Three Hypostases. So, the mind must turn towards The One Who is above nature. That is for, at Him, there is no only the spring of all good things, but at Him is also the unimpeded sharing of the gifts.

[305] In the union with The One it ceases the contemplation, or the spiritual seeing. And it even ceases any effort for understanding. This is for it is no longer needed the passing to a greater understanding, to understanding some higher reality. It is a stability in The Same endless or borderless One; it is a stability above any understanding; and therefore, it is an understanding higher than which, there is no other understanding.

[306] The existence of all realities has its origin in The One Who is above existence, in The One Who is transcendent to the creation that is multiple and composed by nature. ON the other hand, all the existent realities want to exist longer and eternally. Consequently, all of them search for strengthening their existence also in the surplus of existence into the One Who is above existence. If they do not search for in in Him, they will suffer a weakening of their existence.

31. All the existing realities naturally desire the good. And the true good is One, despite being many things called as being good. This is for the good in a simple way, and, to say so, the consummate good, you won't ever find it in the many things, but you will find in those things only a good that is called like that in the virtue of some impartation with the good, for they participate to the good coming out of The One Who is above nature; so that those things reckoned as good, they do not have the good by themselves. Only That One Who is above nature good and simple and above-kindness, and spring of all-kindness and ultimate giver of the realities belonging to Him, and Who naturally turn all realities back within Himself. He is the spring of all being, existence, skillfulness, power, movement, and kindness. Simply speaking, all the existing realities and all the realities contemplated around them, they have their origin, by creation, in The One Who is above being. That's why, the mind that is carried towards something else and not towards The One Who is simple and above being, that mind is moving in a wrong direction. That mind might be moving towards good, but not towards the simple and actual good, neither towards The One Who does the good realities and the better realities and the other realities which need the good and which need better, through an overwhelming outpouring of benefaction.

32. So, the mind of the many, by laying, because of their lack of understanding, in division, and by being torn apart b y many things, that mind doesn't know the Good, namely the One Who is simple, and that mind doesn't search for Him, neither it occupies itself with Him. About those ones, David says into the Ghost: "Many say: who will shown us the good things"" (Ps. 4: 6). But not the Good. And that is rightly so. By taking care of an by toiling for many things, they have forgotten that "only one things is needed" (Lk. 10: 42). This thing, of the part shown by the Word of God, as the good One, they overlooked it, or, by disregarding it, they have lost it, without thinking, at least, that it deserved to be searched for, above all things. And the ones who let themselves be advised by David, as by a pedagogue, and who reckoned that they must step on his tracks, they say: "It has been marked over us the light of Your face, Lord" (Ps. 4[307]: 6), namely the knowledge of Yor one glory it has imprinted upon us as in a mirror. Thus, the numerous people rejoice of the many good things. And the ones who live spiritually, they are illuminated by the knowledge of The One and simple Good, being they illuminated in an above-world manner[308].

33. Like the water of a river is bigger when flowing united, than when it is divided in many creeks, likewise the sight of the mind and its movement and its desire, are stronger when the mind focuses unitarily and without division, towards only one thing, and when the mind isn't divided in many and many sorts. And this happens when the mind extends, and it searches for, and it looks at The One Who is simple and above world. This is for One Who is all-simple and above-world, He truly has the power of gathering the mind together. And only when the mind is found worthy of seeing This One, it is impossible the mind not to take His shape – as much as this is possible to the human mind – like an image, and not to become unitary, and simple, and colorless, and imageless[309], and without any quality, and impossible to reach, and borderless, and endless, and without countenance, and simply one above the world, illuminated by the rays of the godlike love[310], and above the world, and crowned with the unveiling of the mysterious knowledge, of the silence, and of the non-understanding which is above word and understanding[311], by being delighted with a spiritual joy and with a heavenly gladness. This is for the mind that has reached there, it has been transfigured in a more godlike mind[312], and it has been dressed up in a godlike shape, by being spiritually imprinted by The One Who is simple, and imageless, and One, and all the other things we said previously. And if this doesn't happen, and if the mind doesn't experience such a godlike transformation, it means that the mind hasn't reached yet, the touching and the imprinting of The One Who is above the world. This is for God is unifier unity and Mind above understanding. That's why, the mind received the His above-world imprinting, when, in the same time with the said things, the mind becomes itself a unity above understanding, experiencing this through the godlike imprinting[313].

[307] In KJB we have: "There be many that say, Who will shew us any good? Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us."; in ROB we have: "Many say: "Who will show us the good things?" But it has been marked over us the light of Your face, Lord!". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[308] Here is affirmed an opposition between the people of the many, who rejoice the many pleasures, but all those pleasures being little satisfying, and the few people who detaches themselves from those pleasure and who focus themselves in the endless joy for The One Who is endlessly rich.

[309] On the other hand, by looking at the borderless One, the mind regains, at its turn, its own limitless, and in this sense the mind takes His image (εικών), which means, in the same time, being free of any define, contoured, or with edges around, image (απεριόριστος). The author says further on: "impossible to reach", in the sense that not thing can reach that and no person can disturb of catch that.

34. The Trinity of the godhead above being, it is joined in an above-nature unity. This is for God is a threefold hypostatical unit. That's why the soul cannot reach the likeness kindred to God, as an image of God, except by remaining threefold, it becomes one with itself in an above-nature mode. And through the three parts of the soul, I do not mean the rational part, and the anger, and the lust. This is because the three parts of the soul do not consist, actually, of the three parts I've just mentioned. To the rational soul aren't too characteristic, the lust and the anger. All of these are taken from the irrational part and are added to the soul for the bodily living from here, themselves actually being irrational and darkened. And the soul is rational and the soul's nature is full of understanding light. We must say

[310] The love illuminates a person's face from within that person, but it also shows, in the same time, that person's limitlessness, or that person's infinite depth.

[311] This lack of understanding isn't, actually, an absence of the understanding, but it is an understanding above understanding. That's why the one having it, he keeps his silence, for he realizes that he cannot express it. This kind of understanding illuminates the face of the one who possesses it, more than any other understanding illuminated it.

[312] On any new level of the union with God, the mind becomes more godlike, not by its being, but by the richer godlike work whose subject the mind has become, through the dwelling of God, with His work, in the subject of the one who looks at God.

[313] By imprinting Himself, into the human mind, The One Who is imageless and above understanding, the mind itself becomes one and above-understanding.

that characteristic to the soul are those realities which the soul cannot fulfill its work without. But the soul can work without anger and without lust; and this is valid especially when the soul truly works, namely when the soul works without lust and anger. So, these ones aren't really part of the soul, but, as I said, they are powers of the animal and from below side, of the life, and they stay besides the soul.

That's why, the rational soul, by looking, with understanding, at the realities from above, and by being the soul imprinted with the realities known with the mind, and by extending himself, and, to say so, by jumping over himself, the soul throws somewhere far, as vain trifle, the lust and the anger, because of not having what to use these one for, there where is only simplicity, lack of image, and of shape, and of color, all the other realities requiring an untied and totally simple mind.

The soul is threefold according to its simplicity, for the soul is mind using the word (rationality) and the ghost, which are characteristic to the soul, and it harm less than all things, the soul's simplicity[314]. This is because neither the Trinity of the one godhead, whose image is the soul, is an impediment to His unity and simplicity, but the godhead is a totally simple and above being unity and, still, no less a steadfast Trinity. Thus, the soul, or the mind (this is for the soul is mind and wholly mind), the word (the rationality), and the ghost, made on an above-nature manner, they show us the actual countenance of the one godhead in three Hypostases. And this cannot come from somewhere else except out of looking as and of contemplating the above-nature trinitarian unity[315]. This is for this one is the one Who has made the soul too, thus, and Who brings the soul back to this state after the soul has fallen. This is because without focusing and looking at the Trinity, this is impossible to happen to the soul. And if this doesn't happen to the soul and [314] Rightly so, the Holy Fathers know about two trinities of the soul: one consisting of rationality, anger, and lust, and one consisting of mind, rationality or word, and ghost. In the fist trinity, the soul's parts are less united. That's why sometimes the Holy Fathers consider the soul as differing from anger and lust. In the second trinity, the parts are so united that one cannot be cogitated as working without the other two parts. Here the trinity doesn't weaken the unity. The Holy Fathers consider the last-mentioned trinity as image of the Holy Trinity.

[315] Only by this, the soul is one and threefold, or the image of the Holy Trinity, for the soul have been created for looking not at a unipersonal God, but of a God One in being but threefold in Persons. Even if the soul doesn't consciously look at God as Trinity, the soul still is tied to God as Trinity. The Trinity is being imprinting, starting from creation, ceaselessly, His image within the man's soul.

the soul doesn't come to resemblance, we prove ourselves lacking this (trinitarian) mode of being.

We say these things about the contemplative work and about truth, which are especially worthy of all zeal and without which it is impossible to us to ascend to the dispassionate state[316]. This is for like the good requires us the doing in order us to reach dispassionate, likewise the truth requires us contemplation in order us to reach godlike at our image, by serving God in all things and by wanting to become gods through work, and to be us, as much as it is possible, in the likeness of the prime model[317]. And if we need to become one, in order us to resemble the unity of the above-world model, and this unity is achieved within us by looking at, by contemplating at, by tending to, and by the understanding turning towards The One Who is above the world, and by steadfastly looking at This One, we must forces ourselves on all ways to look towards The One Who is above the world and above understanding and to attach ourselves to Him, wholly and with the whole zeal, with the whole our heart and with the whole our soul, and to nourish, within ourselves, the love for the One Who is above the world and above simplicity, so that His itself the love for Him to become to us simple wings in our understanding ascension towards Him. On this way, we will always be as in heavens, in a unitary and imageless state, together with the Lord (1 Tess. 5: 17), with The true Trinitarian One, and praising with our mind, with our word, and with our ghost, the Trinity, amazed, overwhelmed, and united with The One, unitarily and above-union.

35. The sensitive unity is the beginning of all numeric multitude. And the above-world unity is the beginning of all the seen and thought multitude and of all existing realities. As, therefore, every number has its beginning from unit, likewise all

[316] Here is don a connection between image and dispassion. The trinitarian image of God within man, re-actualized by contemplating the Trinitarian God, it coincides to the soul's coming back to dispassion. This is because ethe image is disturbed through the passionate attachment to the material things, through anger and lust, or through the weakening of the seer work, a work characteristic to the mind.

[317] After the author said, in the previous phrase, that one reaches the dispassion through contemplation, now he says that one reaches the dispassion through doing, and that through contemplation one reached to deification. But this contradiction could be solved, if we take in account the fact that before starting advancing towards deification, through contemplation, we must have achieved through doing, the dispassion.

the existing realities start from The One Who is above the world, either in His quality as their natural cause, or as their Maker[318]. But the numeric unit, because of being submitted to the senses, it is placed the first one to the ones following to it by nature. This is for, by being the beginning of the counted realities, when counting, the feeling places the unit as first. But with the above-world unit, because that unit being above-mind, it happened inversely. This is because this unity, though it is, by nature, before all realities, the mind places it after all realities. This is for no mind could start from The One Who is above world, and then to advance from Him to the many realities. But, on the opposite, from the many realities the mind ascends and is gathered together at That One. There the senses need the number one in order the senses to advance to the many realities; otherwise, it is impossible to count or to advance as it wants. But here, the mind needs the many realities, in order the mind to be able to ascend to The One Who is above the world, and in order the mind to be gathered within itself, by not being possible to ascend on any other way towards imagining The One Who is above the world.

Thus, the mind, by using the appropriate order and way, it starts from the many realities and it ends to The One Who is above the world, and Who is the top. This is for the one known with the sense, it is easily to comprise and to limits the sense places it naturally and through affirmation, as first, like its nature requires it. But the above-world unit, searched for with the mind, by being that unit above understanding and by escaping the understanding, it cannot be affirmed as the first, according to its nature, so that the mind could start with it, but, rather, by being above nature, the mind finds it in an above-nature mode, not at the beginning, but at the end, after crossing through and, to say so, after counting the many realities[319].

[318] The godlike One is the natural cause of all His uncreated energies and the maker (creator) cause of the creatures.

[319] Here isn't about the procedure of the logical thinking. This one can affirm The One Whom all the realities came from in the beginning. That is the so-called deductive, scholastic thinking. It isn't either about an inductive thinking, raising from concrete and individual to abstract or general. But it is about really experiencing The godlike One, and experience that, though real, it still is experiencing The One Whom all realities are within. One reaches this experience through spiritual growth, and that one must cross through many, and to detach itself from them, through dispassion. That's why, This One is found in a supra-natural, spiritual mode. This way has been granted priority in the Christian East. It has been absolutely required this mode too.

This is for, the mind has the understanding by nature, and The One Who is above world, He is in Himself not-understood and unapproachable; the mind tends by habituation towards the many realities, even unwillingly, given that, on one hand, the mind cannot stop cogitating, and on the other hand, the mind doesn't have power to catch The One Who is above the world and on top. But, by looking at the many realities, the mind sees in each of them something that can be understood with the mind, but that something is seen not as standing by itself, but as belonging to a certain one. Then, by gathering out of each seen thing the meaning which that thing is transparent to, and by ascertaining through contemplation that these ones dialogue with one another, and they do not oppose to one another and they are like some flowers grown out of the same root, the mind advances from the many realities towards The One Who is on top, out of Who all the many realities are; and so, the mind is naturally gathered from the natural existences to an above-being order, in which the mind sees the One Who is above-nature and above-being, through the realities according to the nature. And by seeing, in an untold manner, the spring gushing up and making all the good things and all the beauties, and by being delighted with The One Who is above being, the mind no longer turns willingly towards the many realities, though these ones too, are existing and good and partaker to the good part[320].

This is for, being the mind naturally loving the good and the beauty, the mind doesn't willingly leave The One Who is above all realities, except the mind is forced to do that by some circumstance. But, because the way to be of the existing realities it is different, the mind looks at them differently, and the mind ascends through them to The One Who is above world and nature. In my opinion, the mind must advance in stages, on the path leading to The One Who is above nature and world, in order to, by climbing as on a ladder, the mind to advance in the safest mode, and to know if there is any shortcoming in itself, or in what the mind must be, and if the mind delights itself with that shortcoming; and if yes, the mind must realize what is wrong and what it separated it from the godlike feast; and what should the mind do, in order to get back to where the mind has rolled down from. In this way, the mind will know both the mist of the passions and the transparence of the clean heart, and it will mirror the knowledge of the truth, by seeing the truth as the truth actually is, and the mind will be made partaker to heavenly views, and it will receive a godlike feeling and it won't pass unnoticed to itself, its own increase or decrease. Everywhere, the mind will know many wonderful things and the mind will understand what the purpose of the appeasement and of the locking up in the monastic cell is.

But about these latter things, we want to speak right here: All the existing realities are divided in created ones known with the senses, in created ones known with the mind, and in uncreated and know with the mind (intelligible). And above all realities, there is The One Who is uncreated and Who is above mind and being. By passing, the mind's eye, from one to another, amongst the first realities, and by deeply looking within them, after the mind has chosen to appease itself through ascesis, the mind ascends from the doing into loneliness, of the due things, as from some level, at the contemplation (the looking at) of The One Who is truly existent, and to the occupation with Him, as also at the delectation with the heavenly realities, at the happy living into the truth's rays, and to the endless enriching with the eternal realities and at the wonderful sweetening with them. And, it might be, that through the together-working of the grace, and by advancing in time, the mind will even be kidnapped from earth and, by getting steadfast through habituation in the light of the understanding, the mind will reach insensitive to the realities from here, for the mind gets under the mastery of The One Who is above-mind, and the mind will be imprinted by The One Who is incomparable and above all good.

This holy ladder, which is divided in five, and on which we climb exactly like on some steps towards the ultimate target, it doesn't have a spatial distance between steps, but it has a difference, namely an order of the quality characteristic to each step. As existence, the creatures submitted to the senses and the creatures known with the mind, they are likewise. But the last ones exceed, to a large extent, the first ones, like the mind exceeds the feeling, through its feature. And again, the uncreated realities which are known with the mind (intelligible) they exceed, to a large extent, the creatures known with the mind (intelligible). But both these two levels are amongst the existing realities, and that's why, the uncreated ones which are known with the mind as existing and as subordinated to The Uncreated One, they are above-mind[321]. From here, it is obvious that the highest seeing and contemplation of the mind, it is that one through which the mind rests within the One Who exceeds all realities, after the mind passed further from doing and it has reached the hidden of that ultimate top, which is placed above all realities; and therefore, the humblest seeing and contemplation of the mind is that one moving amongst the realities submitted to the senses, or better said, that one belonging to the doer man[322].

So, by being the mind, by nature, lover of good (beauty), it must desire what is, in all regards, better (more beautiful), not only in order to have that, but in order to suffer the transfiguration in better, or above-mind, as it is due, for, as It was said, the change received by the mind is according to what the mind sees or it delights itself with. But, because the fickleness intertwined with the mind's nature, it won't leave the mind as long as it is the day today (Hebr. 3: 12) and, as they say, until the shadows keep moving (Song of Songs 2: 17), namely until we won't pass away from the present life, which it shows as in a mirror, in riddle and overshadowed, the truth, it is necessary, when we fall off the contemplation and the seeing of The Uncreated One, The One Who is above-mind, for force ourselves to stop at the uncreated realities which can be known with the mind, and which are the closest to Him, in order our [321] The uncreated intelligible realities, or the uncreated realties known with the mind, as there are the uncreated godlike energies and features, as there are: the kindness, the righteousness etc., they have in common with the intelligible ones, as for instance with the angels, or with the soul, the fact that they can be known with the mind (intelligible) and they can be experienced and, as such, they belong to the realities which can be reckoned as existing. As such, they too are subordinated to God as being, as One Who is threefold in Persons, and Who is above-existence, and as such He is above-mind, or above-understanding.

[322] Here is mentioned also the mind's resting into The One Who is above-mind, and above-seeing, and above-contemplation, after in another place the author reckoned this resting as above seeing and contemplation. But the terms expressing the living on those spiritual heights, they always are insufficient. That's why one can use them in both situations. Everything depends on what these terms are understood like. The fact is, that the author admits the conscience of a resting within The One Who is threefold in Persons, without meaning through this that God's being can be understood or contemplated.

turning back to The Uncreated and above-world One, to be easier to us[323]. And if the thicker mist falls over the mind, darkening the mind's understanding and bringing the mind's contemplation to idleness, we must go back to prayers accompanied by the doing out of the humble heart, in order us to be delivered from darkness through the power of the prayer and through tears, and thus, us to build up again some foundation out of the creatures submitted to the senses[324]. On this way, by dwelling the understanding light within heart, through a spiritual work, with the spring of the Ghost's Hypostasis, and the mind skillfully taking the mastery upon the doing, the mind climbs as on a mountain peak and as to an observation heigh point, where the mind can contemplate from, the realities which remain to the many not only as unseen, but also as unsearched for and not-understood. This is because, without that, nobody will see either himself or God, not even passingly. Speaking now about this doing, it may not be totally besides our purpose.

33. Three are the inwards things which the soul must have in sight, on the stage of the doing: the power of the rationality, the anger, and the lust; and there are three things from outside too: the desire for glory, for pleasure, and for more. These two trinities are healed by the soul by looking at the Jesus Christ's living into body, through the four general virtues, namely through: wisdom, righteousness, temperance, and manhood – and with the grace of Lord Jesus[325].

By this the mind is given the power to ascend in a non-darkened manner, and to look at the godlike realities and to contemplate God. When Lord Jesus was taken into wilderness by the Ghost, having to defeat the devil, He healed the lusting

[323] The true aspiration of the mind, or of the human subject, it is that of reaching within the godlike Subject. Only in His love the mind can find its resting, like a relative resting can be found by the human subject only in the ambience of a loving person. Any of our preoccupations with impersonal goods and values, it is a falling into a state lacking the true satisfaction.

[324] The doing doesn't' consist only of actual good deeds, but also of everything that helps to our cleaning up: prayer, tears, fear of eternal punishments, restraint, patience, humbleness etc. But in all of these, there is also an attitude of differently understanding the things, of differently using the things, or better said, a detachment from considering the things as the ultimate reality.

[325] Unlike the philosophical, natural morals, which reckon that the four cardinal virtues can be gained by the man by his powers, here they are placed in connection with Christ. Only by looking at Christ and by receiving the help from the grace, those virtues can be fully achieved.

part of the soul, through fasting; and He healed the rational part, through taking vigil and quiet prayer; and He healed the anger by resisting it in word; and He healed the love for pleasure, for glory, and for money, because, when getting hungry, He didn't ask, as the devil suggested Him, the stones to be transformed in breads, neither did He throw Himself off the temple roof, with the intention of being extolled by multitude that He wasn't harmed by falling, and neither He let Himself to be convinced to worship that one, after that one promised Him that He will be presented the richness of all kingdoms. But, by angrily, but wisely and rightfully and temperately and manly resisting satan, He rejected that one, teaching us too, how to defeat any devil's attack[326].

One can see and he can know the same thing in the Savior's cross too. We see the Savior, when the time was coming closer, that He was praying, getting away from His disciples (Mt. 26: 26). This brings the healing to the rational part. He took vigil and He endured the sufferings of the cross. This heals the lusting part. He didn't answer back, He didn't quarrel, He didn't shout out, not even when He was rebuked, but He prayer for the ones who were tormenting Him. This is for it depend on the good use of the anger to topple the devil over, by resisting him with the word. But He answered the people who were tormenting Him - because of they being also tormented by satan – by keeping His silence, and with the long-suffering, and by praying for them. He was spit at, He was slapped on His face, and He endured mockery. This is for healing the love for glory. He was given to drink with vinegar, He was nourished with gall, He was crucified, and He was pierced with the lance. This is medicine for healing the love for pleasure. He was nailed on the cross, naked, He was sleeping outside, He didn't have a dwelling place, He was disregarded by everybody because of being poor and beggar. And this heals the love for money.

The Savior showed, therefore, twice, the medicine for healing the passions, inside and outside: when He started to show Himself to the world, with the body, and when He left the world. That's why, the one who looks at Him, and at His teaching and cross, and who becomes - as much as this is possible to the human being – Christ's follower, wisely, and righteously, and with temperance, and manly, that human being will stop at his turn, as Christ did, the passions' work directed towards evil, and by that, he will be able to stop all the other bad things. He will be able to use those virtues as it is due, and after that he will use all the things appropriately, and he will be a true doer man, and as ready as possible in order to look at God and to occupy himself with God, in focusing his understanding.

[326] The anger mustn't be totally abolished, but it must be used appropriately, through the four cardinal virtues, as Lord Jesus Christ did. By using the anger in this way, we can defeat diverse passions. Thus, we make out of anger too, a positive power, as God wanted it when endowing us with it, and we can abolish the passions' temptations, or even the passion themselves, from within us.

Thus, the mind, by starting with the many creatures submitted to the senses and by seeing their good composition, and by understanding then the creatures which can be known with the mind (intelligible) and by moving itself to the uncreated realities which can be known with the mind (intelligible), the mind has climbed, as on a ladder, all the four steps[327]. And to these ones it follows the non-speaking, the silence, and the godlike awe, and, in short, the looking at and the contemplation of The One Who is above-world, and the above-understanding union. This is the crown of the silence, the highest and the most consummate good thing, as much as it is possible in this life, it is the end of the truth, it is the fruit of the faith, it is the shiny ray of the hoped glory, it is the foundation of the love, it is the balance of the mind, it is the steadfastness replacing the ceaseless mind's movement[328], the not-understood resting, the unitary state, the earnest of the future age, the source of a [327] By looking at the seen things, without passion, we climb on the first step; by looking at the intelligible creatures (angels, soul, their value), we climb on the second step; by passing from these ones to experiencing the uncreated intelligible realities, namely the godlike uncreated energies and features, we climb on the third step; finally, by resting ourselves into God Who is the Maker of the realities from the first two steps and the spring of the realities from the third step, the mind has ascended on the fourth step.

[328] The ascension towards The One it wasn't only an intellectual ascension, but it was also one through doing, through praying, through strengthening our love for God as the Unique and All-Comprising Good. The state lived in union with God, it is, on one hand, a state of supreme focusing and quietude, and on the other hand, it is a state of endless joy. It is a state of supreme quietude for nothing attracts the soul towards something else, any longer, and the mind is in this state rejoicing of the limitless depth of the whole and of the endless love. But just because of being this Good endless, the soul never ends tasting Him and the soul never gets satisfied. This stability is, in the same time, therefore, a ceaseless movement. The idea of the stability while always be in movement, or of the eternally stable movement, formulated by Saint Gregory of Nyssa, it is opposite to the Origenistic idea about the boredom of the soul that has reached within God and the soul's coming out from Him, of falling from Him, in order to have another adventure. "The mind's balance" it is the equilibrium achieved by the mind out of knowing all things and the rejoicing of all things within The One.

unimaginable joy, the chamber of the peace, the quenching of the bodily cogitations, the turning back from the present age, the becoming addicted to the future age, the detachment from the passionate life, the inward growing up of the dispassion, the soul's gladness, the gathering together, the resting and the guarding of the soul's movements and powers and, saying all in one, the godlike knowledge and dispassion.

If the mind gets scattered again, due to our drowsiness, or due to some external circumstance, we must take care to bring the mind back again to its own good, namely to the contemplation, by rejecting the passion that constituted an impediment and that deviates the mind from its purpose. We must take heed how far the mind is from its highest good and why is that. We must see: is it the look directed towards the creatures submitted to the senses, or towards the creature known with the mind (intelligible), or towards the uncreated realties known with the mind (intelligible)? Or, is it the mind separated from The One Who is above-nature, the Only One Who is true and above any other one, because the mind having vain thoughts or a certain need? And, by knowing this, let's remove the impediment staying in the middle, in order the mind to turn back again, unitarily, as itself the order requires it, to the contemplation and to seeing The One Who is above-world. This is because, by being the mind outside The One Who is above-world, uncreated, and above-mind, the mind will linger in division and it will have not reached the actual good, even if the mind moves well. This is for the Good from the top is The One Who is above-mind and above-being, uncreated and simple. And That One is the highest end Whom the mind tends towards. One must search for The One Who is above-mind, one must contemplate The One Who is imageless, and one must reach at The One Who is non-comprised, in order to reach the unitary inheritance of The One, of the supreme God, with the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ and of the-life-maker Ghost Whom being us illuminated through, to be us found worthy of receiving the gift of the contemplation and us to become gods by work, and deified through the gift from God.

37. Once the mind elevated on the land of the godlike hidden, the mind naturally keeps it silence, for being united with the simplicity, and therefore being unitarily united with The One Who is above-understanding and illuminating for being imparted with the Ghost[329]. This is for, what could the mind have to say, once it has reached above its understanding powers, and once being outside any meaning and totally emptied, as being above-understanding[330]? This is for, the mind still needs the word in order to speak, and therefore it is obvious that the mind still understands. This is for any word comes consequently to a meaning. And if the mind still understands something, how could the mind be in the land of the hidden? For that isn't an actual hidden, and what isn't seen by any other organ, it still can be seen by the mind. For, thus, many realities would have been called as hidden, because very many of them, or, to say so, all the realties seen by the mind, the mind sees them by knowing them through the mediation of another organ that sees them. Consequently, the hidden realities could have been almost endless in number, and that is absurd. But only one is the actual hidden, which the mind ascends to, after crossing through all realities, as at The One Whom all the realities are form, either seen, or cogitated. So, the mind too, by ascending at Him as at The One Who is above all realities, either seen, or said, or cogitated, the mind gets out of understanding, out of seeing, and out of speaking. And we can even say that the mind hasn't ascended there yet, neither the mind has reached into the godlike hidden, as long as the mind still is able to speak. This is for the mind still is able to understand, as long as it speaks. But the hidden is impossible to understand, because of being above-word[331].

[329] Once reached in the hidden intimacy of God's love, the mind keeps is silence. This is for, that simplicity, more than full of all the good things, it cannot be described by our words, because our words can only catch small pieces of it, and our words, regardless how much we would use, are insufficient to express this infinite fullness of the godlike simplicity. The infinite simplicity requires to be lived with our endless simplicity, in its impenetrable intensity, and by no means trying us to break is in small pieces, which cannot either separately or together to express it in its fullness. This is because, who could describe the love lived while being held to the bosom of the beloved one.

[330] The mind is there as emptied of meanings, of notions, and not because it would have become totally depleted of those, but because the mind has exceeded all of them, or the mind is above all of them. All the meanings have become unseen through overwhelming. What the shards will be good at, if somebody has the unbroken vessel? But the vessel implies all the shards, but also it implies endlessly more than the sum of the shards: it comprises the shards' harmony, the shininess of this harmony when in sun rays, and the capacity of the vessel of holding a content.

[331] This is a logical demonstrating, to say so, of the fact that the godlike hidden isn't a hidden only to the sensitive sight, but it is so also to the mind's understanding. This is for, otherwise, the hidden no longer would have been one, but many. This is because many are the realities

38. While the words usually make the mind to thrive and to advance, they elevate the mind, in this advancing, where the word becomes insufficient, namely all the way up to the work that is being done in silence. And, if the mind always had used words and if the soul always had needed words, I wouldn't have ben able to tell you what would have been the advancing of the mind by speaking. But the speaking isn't useful only for doing, but it is useful also for contemplation, for the mind ascends from the words about the realities which have an image, to The One Who is imageless, The One Who is simple and above word, unattached to anything, and actual, where any word appears to be meaningless, or, rightly speaking, the words are even an impediment[332].

This is because the words are used as long as it is done a passing from a meaning to another meaning. But The One Who is simple, detached from all realities (absolute), borderless, and imageless, The One Who is simple and pure and above-word, how could He need the word in order to be done the passing from Him to somewhere else?[333] Or, how could have been God unseen by the sensitive eyes, but know with the mind. This is a proving of the apophatic theology. But this isn't only an intellectual renunciation to expressing what is above-understanding, but it is a positive experience of union with The One. This is for the mind is "illuminated by The One", or by the Holy Ghost, in this union. As such, the mind knows about this union, but the mind also knows that that union is above understanding. The mind knows the "that" of the union, but the mind doesn't know the "how" of that union.

[332] This is an argumentation by reducing to absurd. If the mind had always needed words, the mind wouldn't have actually needed the words, for, if that had been the case, the words wouldn't have helped the mind to advance beyond words, because of keeping the mind within their limited realm. A resembling example: if a plane hadn't tended during the whole flight to the landing strip, that plane wouldn't have ever flown. The words help the mind to ascend beyond words' realm. This is the use of the cataphatic or affirmative theology, for the apophatic theology, or of the silence.

[333] A word follows to another word, for we pass from a meaning to another. By stringing the words, it is shown the connection of a word with another word, or the dependence of an affirmed meaning, on another meaning that must be affirmed, and therefore it shows the dependence of the things on one another. But the mind that reached within God, where that mind would pass beyond Him, by using a word or many words? God doesn't need to be explained through other words, namely through other realities, for all realities are inferior to Him, so that they cannot explain Him. By using words, we only can show God as connected to other realities. But God is absolute, namely detached from all realities (απόλυτος, ασχετοσ). Of course, we can speak about God, when showing His descent amongst people, and His savior deeds done for us; or when the one who experienced Him, he wants to express something of that experience, to other people. Or, we can speak about God, even when we haven't reached to experience Him, an experience surpassing the meanings and the words, but we still speculate about Him by using our rationality. But the happiness of the man who has reached within God Himself, it cannot be described, and also that man doesn't need to describe to himself. One encompassed? This is because, the words it usually encompasses something. But The One is non-comprised, because He is borderless and shapeless. And if the word isn't appropriate for The One Who is hidden and above-mind, because That One is non-comprised and shapeless, it will be obvious that the most appropriate is the silence. Therefore, the advanced ones, they must reach from speaking to silence, for they have advanced to the simple, imageless, and shapeless contemplation.

39. The words are used for the known things, while the hidden is unknown, so that the hidden is outside the word. And if the knowledge of the hidden is above-knowledge, and what is above-knowledge it doesn't need knowledge, the less it will need the word. So, the mind that has ascended to The One Who is hidden and simple, it keeps its silence naturally. And while the mind doesn't keep its silence naturally and without being forced to that[334], that mind still hasn't ascended to The One Who is hidden and more than simple.

40. As the people toiling with the quietude, by sometimes getting out of their monastic cell, they know by their own deed itself, the difference between staying inside and getting out, likewise the ones who, by being close to the glory of God, through contemplation, they experience the silence, but sometimes they start speaking again, so that they know themselves what state there are in, when the silence falls upon them by nature and not by will, and how they are when tending towards speaking. When the silence comes upon them, they desire that they wouldn't have ever been given the speaking, and they want to remain in that state. This is for, they are like some angels on earth, and united with the truth: unitarily, imageless, without bodily seeing, shapelessly, and simply, through mind's sights, which do not pass from a reality to another, they having within themselves only the overwhelming and the awe, without understanding anything, batter said: looking, without bodily sight, at the godlike and without beginning illuminations. And cannot speak about God in a fully adequate manner, also because God is "shapeless". The shape as defined in itself, it can be described to others, while the shapelessness cannot be described; if we tried to ascribe a shape to the imageless One, it would limit Him.

[334] The silence of the one who has reached the union with The One Who is endless, it isn't imposed by the will, it isn't intentional and aiming to make a good impression, but it is imposed naturally, non-forcedly, by itself the lived infinite of The One.

when the mind descends from there, as one that is changeable, they start speaking and they pass with their understanding from a reality to another, through many and diverse crossings. And in order the state of silence to come back to them, which is much higher than the state of the speaking, they embrace the quietude and they guard their senses against the realities submitted to the senses, and they use their whole skillfulness, in order to avoid not only the speaking, but even the understanding itself, in order they to be able to say, together with David: "I got muted and I got humbled and I kept my silence about the good things" (Ps. 38[335]: 3). Therefore, speaking even the good things, it is inferior to the silence[336].

41. The godhead isn't unveiled, but the godhead isn't either totally hidden. For the godhead exists, the godhead is an unveiled fact, and even a very clear fact. But what is this "is", it is a hidden aspect. And we must know that "what is", it very much differs from "that is". "That is" is shown out of work, but "what is" is shown out of being. The las aspect wasn't allowed to be known even to angels. This is for God is endlessly endless, and above all existing realities[337], and He is above all the mind and the understanding. So, when the mind occupies itself with the realties showing that God is, the mind has many to tell and it can philosophize very beautifully. The man can be name then as philosopher and theologian. But after the mind has ascended higher, due to the knowledge that God is, and the mind has been engulfed by the godlike hidden and crossed by the imprinting of the work of what the mind is, and the mind has become, by

[336] In the Greek text: της μετα λογου σιγης = the silence in word. The silence isn't the muteness of the total darkness, of the absence of the conscience and of all knowledge. It is a silence that speaks, that says more than the words could say, but one that can be manifested also through words. It is a silence that comprises the non-comprisable One, in words, namely, it is a silence comprising more than all words can comprise. The one seeing this non-comprisable reality, he keeps his silence, because of not being able to express the non-comprisable, but this silence irradiates out of him, for it irradiates out of him the living of the non-comprisable. This silence irradiates through words too.

[337] υπερ παν ειναι – God is above any existing reality, and He is, by and large. This is for, is it means noticeable by the realities rejoicing of existence, it means being in the context of the existing realities, it means depending on all realities, and, in the last analysis, it means depending on God Who all realities depend on. We fully are here in Areopagite's terminology. But the author of the present writing, he always brings a new interpretation, as we can see in his following affirmations. A German philosopher or theologian, he would translate the distinction between "that is" and "what is", by using the terms "das Dass" and "das Was".

grace, imageless, without the possibility to be touched[338], and without eyes, so that any word that one can say about God, it ceases, and the unified mind remains motionless[339], once the mind has entered The One Who is non-understood. Then the mind surrenders, wholly, to The One Who is beyond all realities, where there is no word, neither meaning, and where the diversity of the thinking can no longer advance from, but where there is the simplicity, the non-comprising, the silence, and the awe. There the mind sees The One Who is imageless, endless, and borderless, and the mind rejoices unusually and wonderfully of seeing The One Who is unseen. And by seeing the imageless image[340], the mind becomes, rightly so, at its turn, detached from all realities (absolute) and imageless[341]. And to say it shortly, the mind is contaminated, like the realties contemplated by the mind in an unseen manner and looked at without bodily eyes, by the above-nature godlike beauty, and the mind extolls God, within itself, for God has created the mind thus.

42. God is named as The One, not only for He is simple, being above any composition, but also for He actually exists amongst all the realties said as existing, but which have their existence from Him. This is because what doesn't exist in an actual and simple sense, neither is that, as One in an actual and [338] The mind that has reached that mysterious experience, it is beyond any contact, and nothing can touch it (ανεπαφος), not even spiritually. This is for the mind lives the godlike reality that overwhelms the feeling of any touching coming from something else. The mind lives the reality of God not only above understanding, but also above any somehow thickened feeling, being noticed through a feeling above-feeling. It is a supreme experience of subtlety and finesse. The mind doesn't feel itself as touched even by things, and the persons experience in an accentuate manner, the mysterious transcendence of the mind. These descriptions are on the level of the ones belonging to Meister Eckart, but still not stained by any pantheistic shadow.

[339] The mind's effort of understanding, it comes to an end, and, in this sense, the mind remains motionless, though the mind still is, otherwise, in a ceaseless movement of awe, towards the godlike infinity.

[340] Το ανείδεον ειδοσ. God is the actual One, imageless, without contour, but on the other hand, this limitless of His richness, of His power, and of His love, it still is an "image".

[341] The mind, by looking at the imageless image of God, it is imprinted, at its turn, by that imageless image, namely by the "image" of the limitlessness and of the infinity, in the joy and the richness received, by the mind, from God. By this, the mind becomes, at its turn, absolute and detached from all realities, as God Himself is. This is because the mind no longer feels anything of the created realities. The mind no longer feels either the relation with God, as a relation of dependency, for, by being filled up with God, the mind lives His sovereignty and absoluteness. On the other hand, even understanding God, while the mind is detached from any relation, as God is (in an absolute state), it belongs to the mind's nature.

simple sense[342]. Al so, He is called as One for He is the same everywhere, in a non-comprisable manner, and for He alone is unlike any other reality and for He is outside any reality; then, God is called so, for He is eternal, and without beginning, and ceaseless, and for He is equally sending to all realities, in an all-clean mode, the godlike ray of His Providence, even if not all the realities receive His Providence in the same manner. Finally, God is called like that, for He makes Himself know to everybody, without being Him submitted to the relation, and requiring a mind that isn't submitted to variety, an imageless mind, a shapeless mind, a colorless mind, a mind that has gone out from the touching with all existing realities, and simply, a mind detached from all realities, elevated to the infinity of the endlessness, above time, above place, and above nature, and above the natural realities, in order to make Himself somewhat seen by them, unitarily, and above the understanding union[343].

43. Because the spiritual union accomplished between God and mind, it is above understanding, it is said that the mind is above its nature, during those moments, by perceiving The One Who is hidden and above-nature, through an understanding feeling, in a manner detached from all realities (in an absolute manner). Despite all these, what the mind experiences it is appropriate to the mind's nature as cleaned up by grace[344]. This is for, the understanding id sot the mind what [342] It is made here the connection between the fact that God is One in a simple mode, and the fact that God is the only one existing in an actual mode. In addition to that, God is the only One existing in a simple mode, for, when speaking about Him, we do not need to mention anything else, in order to determine His existence, as it is in the case o all the other realities.

[343] Because God exists in a simple mode, not needing, in order to exist, a relation with other realities, the mind must, at its turn, to reach such a state, in order to be able to understand God's existence.

[344] In a mode detached from all realities (in an absolute mode – απολυτως). In the feeling, which God is noticed through, on that spiritual height, it is not implied the feeling of anything else, and the mind is not determined by anything else. This is for the mind is elevated, then, above its nature, and he mind feels God not through its natural feeling, and the mind feels God not through its natural feeling, but through a godlike work which the mind is imparted with, as with a feeling. Although, what the mind feels out of God, it is somehow accommodated to the human mind. The feeling which the mind is imparted with, out of God, it has become a feeling appropriated to the man. Although the mind is extended beyond itself, it still isn't confounded to God. This is shown especially by the fact that the mind still remains aware of itself. Although the mind is extended beyond itself, it still sees itself that state of being extended beyond itself. This is explained by the author of the present writing, in the following rows, by using the example of the eyes seeing into darkness.

seeing is to the eye. Let's use an example: He who looks into darkness, on one hand he doesn't see anything, but on the other hand he sees that that darkness is one, and he also sees that he doesn't see; and this is because, if he covered his eyes, he still would reckon that there is light around him, or that there are some things around him, but thus, by seeing, he clearly sees that he doesn't see. In other words, the crossing through the darkness, of the seer power, and the seeing of the realities hidden into that darkness, it is above the eyes' nature, but not is such the fact of seeing that it doesn't see. Likewise, it is the mind: by being elevated into the godlike hidden, and by being elevated beyond understanding, the mind doesn't see anything. Because, how could the mind see something? But the mind sees that it doesn't see anything, and that it doesn't see The One Who is hidden like in a mist, The One Whom all existing realities come out of, either seen or thought, either part of the creation, or uncreated and eternal. If the mind hadn't seen this, it wouldn't have seen itself extended beyond itself. But, because of seeing this, the mind sees as clearly as possible that it doesn't see, and what the mind doesn't see is above-seeing[345], and impossible to be seen. Entering and seeing inside the one hidden, that one hidden that is above-mind, it exceeds the mind's nature. But looking at the godlike darkness of that hidden, that is, above-all, in an untold mystery, and seeing that it doesn't see in that darkness, it is characteristic to the clean mind that sees into Ghost.

This is because the mind doesn't have the understanding seeing locked up and unworking, when the mind sees that it doesn't see except in a simple mode the One Who is the Godlike One hidden into hiding. This would be the sign of the nescience[346]. A contrary, when it sees more clearly, then it ascends above-mind and it contemplates (sees) its non-seeing, by looking into the hidden of the All-Simple One. This is for the mind sees limpidly that This Hidden One is The One Whom all the realities are coming from. But what This One is, the mind cannot see it[347].

[345] The mind sees that it doesn't see. But the mind sees not only that it doesn't see, but the mind still feels that The One Whom it doesn't see, That One is Somebody. The mind is aware of the existence of The One Whom the mind doesn't see, namely the mind is aware of God. And the mind is too, aware of not seeing Him. So, the mind doesn't' see for it is above the act of seeing. Namely, by not seeing, the mind knows more than when seeing, and the mind knows more intensely The One Whom the mind doesn't see. And the mind is more aware of its helplessness of seeing Him, namely the mind is more aware of itself and if its limitations. In order to know about this non-seeing, the mind need a conscience, or it needs a more intense sight that its own. This paradox comes from Socrates who said: "I know that I do not know anything". Saint Gregory of Nyssa introduced a dynamism in this paradox. He said (The Life of Moses): "To the extent that the mind ascends, it ascends in knowing that it doesn't know". The author of the present writing brought a new specification: "I see that I do not see The One Who is in darkness".

And the reason why they say that the mind is in the realities which are above its nature, it is because the mind looks into the all-simple hiding of God. But this is something appropriate to the mind's nature when the mind reaches to be clean. This is for, one can say that it is appropriate to the mind's nature to ascend in what is above-nature, stepping without seeing, namely in a not-understood mode, in the unitary godlike hiding, that is above simplicity and mind. The mind doesn't have, then, any knowing perception, except the perception of The One Who is not outside Himself[348]. Reached there, the mind, through a movement characteristic to the mind, it reached a stopping and a resting. Not in a resting from contemplating – this is an insane passion – but in a stopping and in a resting from passing from a meaning to another meaning or view. This is because the mind, after it has been elevated up there, by falling into the depth of the endlessness or limitlessness, where the mind sinks into the understanding light of the non-comprised godlike hiding, and it becomes astonished, and it stops, to say so, by no longer experiencing anything else than the awe in that untold understanding brightness. And by no longer passing from a meaning to another, the mind still experiences the work of a [346] Therefore, one cannot say that the mind, when elevated above understanding, it is totally unworking. Even the fact that the mind sees that it doesn't see anything else except The One Who is simple and hidden into darkness, it is a proof that the mind's working isn't totally suppressed. If that had been the case, it would have meant, simply, the nescience. But the experience the mind has about The One from the darkness, it isn't simply a nescience, but it is more than any pretended knowledge about Him.

[347] By looking in sight, in addition to the fact that the mind only sees that there is hidden The One, the mind it sees also that out of This One are coming all realities, though the mind cannot see what This One is.

[348] It belongs to the mind's nature, the mind to ascend above its nature, namely to look at The One and at His hiding, without using any bodily sense. And this is the thinnest noticing of the All-Thin One. In that supreme thinness of God, there are the roots of all the more or less thick realities, as also in the ultimate thinness of the mind are the roots of all the thickened mind's works. Through its unique thinness, the mind notices The One in His supreme thinness Whom all the realities thicker than He is are comprised in.

understanding illumination[349], by motionlessly looking in the above-being hiding, being the mind filled up with non-understanding, and being the mind beautified in a unique and unitary mode, by the unapproachable depth of that brightness that doesn't scatter[350].

If the mind stopped the contemplation, how could the mind experience the awe and the enlightenment? So, we say about the mind that it stops, in the meaning that, once reached there, the mind no longer passes from a reality to another, but it contemplates The One, for the mind is addicted to His shininess, the mind rejoicing itself and being filled up with brightness, and no longer moving from the stability it has reached at. Consequently, the mind doesn't lock up its joy of contemplation (of seeing). This is because, not contemplating at all and nothing, it is a passion one must avoid, and which isn't commendable by any means, but it is full with the darkness of the nescience. The mentioned stability of the mind, it is born and it is upheld through the unapproachable shininess of the light, and it is a contemplation that doesn't wan any movement, but it wants resting and steadfastness. This is for, That One is above nature, hidden in His mystery and above being; He is endless and limitless to any mind; and He won't let the mind that contemplates Him, to look elsewhere, if that mind has been imparted with the cleanness appropriate to it, and with the godlike help. And the mind won't fall off this godlike contemplation and off this above-beauty-and-infinity shininess, except if it is attracted by a thing which the mind is addicted to, or by the natural fickleness which the mind suffers of[351].

[349] The "understanding light", that is the translation of the Greek expression: νοερο φως, it doesn't mean a light understood by the mind, or which the mind understands through, but it simply is a spiritual light, one opposed to the sensitive luminous light.

[350] The mind experiences the work of a spiritual enlightenment, which the mind looks through, with a helplessness of understanding and with an endless awe, in the abyssal and infinitely rich inside of The One. The mind doesn't pass to something else, neither is the mind dead, but the mind is in a work received from God, a work meaning another kind of movement, but unmoved towards something else. The not-understanding, which end the mind never reaches despite the mind's unmeasurable capacity of understanding, it keeps the mind in a ceaseless relation of understanding increasingly more.

[351] This hints to the Origen's theory, according to which, the soul, by getting bored of the monotony of the life into God, it wants to get out from there, and so it falls in an earthly experience. The infinite beauty and richness, of The One Who the mind reached in, it won't ever cause such a saturation. A leaving from there, of the mind, or a desire of living from there, it is unimaginable. Outside God, there are only things, and feelings, and knowledge, which are infinitely inferior in beauty, and in the richness of meanings, and in the power of attraction.

44. It belongs to the mind's nature, to understand. And the understanding is done in motion and in movement[352]. But, because the mind reached into God, it is above understanding and motion, rightly so, one could say that the mind ascends above its nature when contemplating God as detached from all realities[353]. This is for any meaning is given by a thing. And where there isn't contemplated a thing, there isn't born and there isn't a meaning. So, not being possible by any means, to see God as a thing, God shows Himself to the mind, through the realities naturally being around Him, namely through the realities which He works through, works that unveil the power springing out of somebody who is powerful. For, so, the mind uses to contemplate, in all the other realities, the powers together with the realities having those powers[354], and therefore the mind searches, at God, for the same thing. But because the mind is unable to succeed in that, because God is above the nature of any created mind, the mind contemplates the realities from around God. And the mind represents God to itself, without seeing Him, namely through a simple, and lasting for a moment, intuition[355]. But, by advancing in the sky of the quietude and gaining the godlike benevolence, and by working the Holy and extolled Ghost, within the mind, the mind will be increasingly often kidnapped from the work of understanding, towards the [352] The understanding is done in the motion and in the movement from a meaning to another; in adding new understandings, which to bring a surplus of light in the realities the mind has known before, through: association, examples, and contrasts, or contradictions.

[353] We understand any thing in connection with other things. That's why our understanding increases by passing from something to something else, by finding out the connection of one thing with other things. But despite all this increasing, we still remain on the limited plan. The one who has reached into God, he no longer needs this passing from a meaning to another, for God is no longer understood in connection with other realities, but He is detached from all realities (He is absolute) and He has in Himself all the realities.

[354] We contemplate the powers together with the subjects, or with the sources those powers star from.

[355] The mind, in its striving for understanding, it always searches for the subject of the powers through which are accomplished, in the world, diverse effects. Only then, the mind reaches, somehow, a satisfactory end of its understanding. And only God is the consummate Subject suffering nothing from the world, but all the realities from within the world depend on Him. In order to find God, the mind must exceed all the realities from within the world, and the mind must contemplate the powers from around God, the powers which God has created and upholds the world through, and the mind sees that the world couldn't have been created and upheld by the human subjects. By contemplating the powers from around God, or His works, the mind sees in them, through a simple and simultaneous intuition, their Subject; it is an eyeless sight. But also logically, the mind presupposes a Subject as ground of any manifestation.

imageless, without quality, and simple state, by quickly penetrating within the heart, through the above-nature power of the Ghost[356].

By stopping itself here, in the feeling of the godlike presence, and by not understanding anything, the mind is above-understanding. And by the fact that form understanding the realities from around God, the mind has ascended at feeling the godlike presence, the mind has become, as I said, simple. And, for the mind is above-understanding, we say that it lives above its nature.

45. All the realities which are called as hidden, they necessarily have something shown outside, out of which one can intuit that hiding. Because, otherwise, they rather would be reckoned as inexistent. This is because, a reality that doesn't give any kind of knowledge showing its existence, it could be reckoned as equal to what doesn't exist at all. So, without any doubt, the hidden of God too, it is accompanied by some showings.

BY stepping of the tracks of these showings, the mind receives a feeling of the godlike hiding, and the mind ascends from the comprised realities belonging to God, to something that is non-comprisable. And by being elevated up from there, the mind knows with certitude that there is something escaping its natural comprising capacity, namely something being above any possibility of comprising with the understanding, either be it that understanding even angelic, or above-nature. Also, the mind know that that something is hidden also in the beginning and in the end of this nature and being (created) of all existing realities, endlessly above the whole existence; the mind know that that something is uncreated, without a beginning, borderless, and non-comprised either by nature, or by space and time. This Something is The One Who is hidden and above-mind. From Him it naturally starts the diverse godlike understanding[357], one that elevates us again, and that turns us back through advices and understanding elevations, towards The One Who is hidden and above-nature and the beginning of all the realities.

[356] The "sky of the quietude" is the ambience which lives in, the man who is spiritually advanced. Only in this state the kidnapping will take place. This is for the quietude is too, an undisturbed focusing of the mind towards God Who is endless in His beauty. But this is done through the work of the Ghost and in the same time with the mind's penetration within the heart, in the deep of the own being, after steadfastly leaving the scattering.

[357] If we understand God in any way, it is for Himself understands Himself. He shares this understanding of Himself, to us too. He makes Himself, His understanding towards us.

And the mind unites so much with Him, that the mind understands that He is One; and the mind also know that He is impossible to be understood, in all aspect, regarding to what this One is. And about what is above mind and it escaped the understanding, what the word could say more? So, by the fact that the word cannot say anything more about This One, the mind will look at Him, speechlessly, and without words, in total silence, and unitarily, and above understanding, as to something hidden, and the mind will rejoice as of the Creator and of the Giver of all the realities. Also, the mind will wonder of Him as of The One Who is much more luminous, and much more kind, much more wise, much more powerful, and the mind will feel a godlike joy, by the fact that the realties which The hidden One - and Who is above-being - shows Himself through, are endless and borderless, and especially by the fact that He makes Himself known to the rational nature. But, by being the mind in ones like these, the mind won't reckon as appropriate to us and to string up words, by passing from one to another.

So, the one who doesn't use the silence, but he uses the speech, he isn't in the highest state of the mind. This is because the highest state of the mind, as the ones who value nothing more than they value the truth, they will affirm too, it is that of being the mind on the highest level of its work. And the highest level of the mind is that of looking at what is the highest, a looking which we say about that is done without sight (eyes), so that, even more so, without the possibility of being described in words.

46. The mind, by entering the all-godlike and unique hiding and without beginning and from on the highest top, without using the bodily sight, the mind receives there some kind of unseen, unique, and unitary, and full of a more than beautiful shininess, and more than luminous and untold, a wave that calls the mind, silently, in a depth of the wondering and of the awe and it fills the heart up with a spiritual work and with a sweet joy. This wave becomes to the mind as understanding luminous light, shininess, and godlike love, on the mind's measure, as also gladness spread in rays. It has its departure point into God, where all the good gifts are coming from (Jas. 1: 17), being us imparted with it, through the mind's cleanness, and having its content, as somebody would say, in the godlike unveilings of the Scriptures and in the creatures contemplated wisely and rightly, in quietude and in prayer. This is for the godhead's hidden and most-inward and above-understanding unity, it cannot be seen anyhow, but only in the unitary ray starting from there and that filles up, overwhelmingly, the understanding sight and contemplation. Not experiencing this, the one who ascends from outside and in rational manner, and through natural knowledge, towards the One Who is above-understanding and hidden and simple, that one won't receive the godlike work within his heart and he won't be enlightened in an understanding mode[358].

Especially His above-nature understanding it exclusively belongs to Him. 'Into Your light, I shall see light".

47. The all-transparent, unique, and unitary sight of the mind that has reached into God, by penetrating into the one godlike hiding, and by receiving in a lightning of shininess, a godlike ray out of the without beginning and endless spring of luminous light, it doesn't ask only for the mouth's silence, but it also asks for the mind's silence. This is because of not being possible, even when the mouth keeps its silence, the mind to move inwardly towards something, and to move from a thought and from a meaning, to another, and to occupy itself with diverse things. These ones are the so-called inward word, which the mind that has been elevated at the shapeless and all-simple hiding of the godlike unity, it is far away from it. This is for, something else is the contemplation of the mind, and something else is, its inward movement towards, and its cogitation about something, which is one with the inward word[359]. By being the mind in the created and composed realities, or which are diverse in other aspects, the mind firstly looks at them, and then it cogitates, by alternating its work. This is for the mind often finds out, in a single thing, not a few meanings[360]. But in that godlike and all-inward hiding, unique and unitary, the mind raises and widens its seer (contemplative) eye, and it is illuminated by the simplicity of the godlike luminous light, but the mind doesn't move itself in a cogitation work. This is for, that unitary simplicity, it escapes the cogitation that passes from a reality to another, or it escapes the pleasure for variety; and the hiding doesn't allow to be said about itself, with the mouth, things the mind would think out of pleasure. Due to these reasons, the man, after he has bee understandingly elevated into the godlike extolled and unique hiding, he naturally keeps his silence, both with his mouth and with his mind.

[358] The one who wants to reach the godlike One through rationality and by using the natural knowledge, and by stepping not on an inward path, but through reasonings upon the external things, he won't receive the godlike work within his heart, neither he receives the light of the above-nature "understanding" (non-sensitive). This is the rational "theology", one not reaching to experience God, but one that speaks about Him as about an external thing. The Byzantine Fathers and writers, they don't even call this as theology.

[359] The inwards word or work, it is the cogitation's movement from a thing to another. By this, the cogitation won't reach into God, even if it occupies itself with God.

48. When the mind, by turning, it wholly tends towards God, and when the mind's seer work it sinks in the all-shiny rays of the godlike beauty, and it ascends, without imagining, at the simplicity and the limitlessness of The One Who is hidden and imageless, and when the mind is made one with itself by its stretching towards and its looking at The One, under the breeze of the Ghost, the mind reaches in the manifest state of the little child, and the mind tastes the untold and above-nature Kingdom of God, according to the Lord's word: "If you do not turn yourselves and if you do not become like the children, you won't enter the Kingdom of Heavens" (Mt. 18: 3). This is for, then, the mind exits any connection and relation with any reality, being the mind elevated above the borders of the whole knowledge, or any kind of understanding, above any composition and diversity, and the mind is stretching itself towards The One Who is untold, and above-mind, and unknown[361]. That's why, the mind

[360] When the mind occupies itself with the created and composed realities, the mind firstly looks at them globally, and then the mind cogitates at them, by analyzing them. Usually, the mind, by looking at something, it embraces that something in its wholeness. Then the cogitation analyzes the elements and the composing aspects of that something, and so the mind is filled up with a variety of meanings by what is being singled out by its own knowledge, or by the self-knowledge, and it successively take the image of the meaning cogitated by the mind, one at the time.

[361] The little child doesn't know about the implacable character of the natural laws, which impede him doing a thing or another. The little child lives his full freedom, by only knowing about his love for his mother. Likewise, the spiritualized mind knows only about its love for God. While sunk in the love that shines of the luminous light of the love coming from God, the mind has forgotten about itself, it has been elevated above itself, but in the same time, it has been made one with itself, and thus the mind has exited the self-forgetfulness, which the mind naturally keeps its silence, due to its present state, a state that isn't only above-world, but it is also above the understanding work, a state which the mind is having in, The One Who is hidden and above-nature and imageless, together with His joy and sweetness, through an understanding impartation[362].

49. The seers contemplate God in an imageless image, and in an above-light beauty, one immaterial and non-composed, in His all-simple face[363]; the see The One as unitary, crown with countless good things, and adorned with countless splendors, and enlightening the whole mind with the rays of a shiny beauty; the mind contemplates the untold and impossible to tell happiness, the spring of the good things and of the beauties, the inexhaustible and always gushing up abundance, the above-fullness treasury, inexhaustible, and non-emptied, of the glory, which fills up, the eyeless minds, with a great delectation. This is for, out of that spiritual and above-nature unity, placed above all the realities in that impenetrable hiding, it springs out, mysteriously, joy, content, and clean gladness, in an always flowing river. Out of it, it is outpoured an unpassable and non-comprisable torrent of untold kindness, of unexplainable love, and of non-understood care, through a borderless power and through an untold wisdom. This is because these realities, as realities which are above-mind, they remain non-understood even by angels and seraphs. This is for, even the realities born within us, during the present time, in an untold mode, and which will be plainly shown in the future age, as through some kind of birth, and which will be done, they kidnap even the cherubs mind, though the cherubs mind only understand those realities in an overshadowed manner. O, the is lost in, when caught up with all sorts of worries. The mind needed to come back to itself, in order its transparency to be penetrated by the luminous light of the godlike love.

[362] The mind sunk in the luminous light of the parental love of God, it is above the understanding work, like the little child lives, in the bosom of his mother, his and her love, beyond any effort of understanding. The understanding has here the meaning of our usual understanding. But the author, by saying, immediately after, that the seers rejoice of the sweetness they are tasting it in the union with God, in an understanding mode, the understanding receives in the vision of our author, another meaning too: it is the simple understanding, one that doesn't try to understand more, because of being aware of the limitation of the present understanding. The "understanding impartation" it means here, also a non-sensitive impartation. It is a contact, an unmediated encounter with God, a receiving of Him within the soul, but not as a reality submitted to the bodily senses.

kindness, the counsel, the love, the mercy, the power, the 3wisdom, and the taking care from God! Truly "blessed are them, whose lawlessness has been forgiven, and whose sins have been covered" (Ps. 31[364]: 1). And: "blessed is the man whom God will guide, and out of His law and out of the law of the Ghost will teach him" (Ps. 93[365]: 12).

50. The realities unseen by the people living in the world, for they cannot receive the Holy Ghost (Jn. 14: 17), as the Lord said, are unveiled to the ones who love to withdraw themselves and to sit far from the world and from the things from the world. To those ones, it shined, through the godlike grace, the light of the understanding and: "the sunrise from the height" of the spiritual Sun (Lk. 1: 78) had opened the eyes of their heart and they have received help from God, in order to "put ascensions in their hearts" (Ps. 83[366]: 6) and to be lighted by the rays which they see God through. Consequently, they are shown very clearly other many godlike and spiritual mysteries, worthy of the spiritual time. In addition to these, to the ones who live in a pious mode, it is unveiled their future state, worthy and without blemish, one that won't only be above senses, but it will also be above mind. This is for, then, they will be entirely changed, by reaching an above-mind state and an above-understanding delectation. They will delight and rejoice themselves, as some gods through work, before God Who is God by nature, of the above-nature good things. This is for, they will stay in a circle around Him and they will feast, in an all-holy and all-clean manner, the godlike and above-mind holyday, composing, together with all the well-ordered angelic groups, the celebratory and more than happy assembly, one full of that famous delectation and of good gladness.

Great and non-comprised is the flowing river of the clean gladness of the above-beauty gifts! This is because, if the seen beauty, that one made known to the mind through senses, it is limited and submitted to the division and that isn't either simple, nor uncreated, but still uses to produce, to the soul, a non-charmless delectation, it won't be difficult to the ones who have mind, and who take heed to the difference of plans, to know, and to understand, what they felt, if they would be in front of the beauties thought with the mind, but in the same time being above-mind, borderless, and imperishable, which spring out of God, out of Whom are all the good and beautiful realities, and which aren't either created or conceived – and this towards their joy and gladness, through the impartation with the godlike life and with that age's state.

[364] In KJB we have: Psalm 32: 1. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[365] In KJB we have: Psalm 94: 12. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[366] In KJB we have: Psalm 84: 5: "Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee; in whose heart are the ways of them.; in ROB we have: Psalm 83: 6: "Blessed in the man whose help is at You, Lord; he has put ascensions in his heart". (E. l. t.'s n.)

51. The mind, by rejoicing of getting out from the lengths of the distances of space and time, and of getting out of their features which set borders, it truly empties itself, through the unitary simplicity and through the non-masterly and imageless life, which the mind is elevated at. And the mind steps above-being, without any cover and without any impediment, through non-understanding and non-speaking, in the land of the lack of beginning, of non-comprising, of limitlessness, and of infinity, spiritually moved by the godlike power and illumination from within heart, a power leading the mind towards limitlessness, a power extending together with the mind's seeing[367]. Then rises in the soul the God's peace and the untold joy of the Ghost; and an impossible to describe gladness it is poured within the soul and an awe higher than the knowledge[368] engulfs the soul, making the soul to sin, together with the Psalmist: not that "He will show Himself", but that "the God of the gods shows Himself in Sion" (Ps. 83[369]: 8), namely in that mind that travels on the peaks and that watches from height. "Lord, God of the Powers, blessed in the man that hope in You" (Ps. 83[370]: 13).

[367] All over the present writing, the author thoroughly explains the processes taking place within heart, when the mind, by entering the heart and by living within heart, through ceaseless prayer, it sees the endless light of God, and it is kidnapped by that light from all the worldly realities. All the authors' descriptions serve explaining the hesychast teaching and practice. We have here an original joining of Areopagite's influence and of hesychast preoccupation, or, in other words, the Areopagite's intellectual vision is being warmed up by a fiery feeling in hesychastic ghost. Only in the mind emptied of the ideas and of the images of the things, the godlike light can find a place to dwell. Only such a mind has become transparent to that godlike light, and able, through the regained limitlessness, to contain the godlike limitlessness. In order to achieve that, the mind must get out not only from the limited images of the things, but also out of the limitation of the distances of time and space, connected to the things' images. Thus, the mind liberated from all images, ideas, and spatial and temporal limited dimensions, it is not only empties, and so come back to its limitless depth and to its limitless width, but the mind is too, disrobed of the covers of those images, ideas, dimension, and addictions, which have been keeping the mind until now, inside some borders and impediments; and, but this, the mind has become transparent. The expression: "empty mind" has both the meanings: emptied and disrobed. In this sense, the mind shows itself to God, as emptied of any other content and non-covered, or transparent and open, in order to receive Him; the mind better stretches towards God, through the unique preoccupation with Him, manifested in the ceaseless prayer addressed to Jesus. And this prayer is done, by the mind, in the heart's ambience of feeling.

52. When the mind lingers in awe, enlightened by an indescribable and non-understandable presence, by seeing itself between God and the godlike realities[371], the mind eats, if I could say so, the true fruits of the spiritual knowledge, and the mind stays under the deifying work, and it rejoices and it increases in love, by not saying and by not working anything, either inside or outside, and not even thinking, but looking with understanding[372] and unitarily, in the light of the truth and of the Ghost and making out of the seen realities, an occasion for delectation, without passing from a thing to another.

53. When the mind's face, by bowing down inside the heart, it sees the light to the Ghost as springing out of the heart, in an eternal gushing up, then will be the time for mind's silence[373].

[368] The awe is higher than the knowledge, than the understanding. The awe sees more out of the God's reality than the knowledge or the understanding, because these last ones limit the perception of God, to their limited capacity of comprising.

[370] In KJB we have: Psalm 84 ending with the verse no. 11; the verse mentioned in the writing isn't present in KJB; the verse no. 11 (the las verse of the Psalm 84) in KJB has the following content: "For the Lord God is a sun and shield: the Lord will give grace and glory: no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[371] The mind "sees itself between God and the godlike realities", namely between the Giver and the gifts, here looking at Him, there looking at them, or looking, in the same time, at God and at them, as lacking their personal support. They have the whole value only by being gifts given by the godlike Person.

[373] The light of the godlike love, it is communicated to the mind as to an organ that knows through the heart, for the heart is the spiritual organ of the feeling. The heart loves, the heart received the God's love. But only a heart having within, the mind's understanding. A darkened, blind heart is carried away by the vehemence of some disordered feelings. But the love of God is luminous light. The mind's face, bowed down towards the heart, it is the mind's sight. Through this, the mind sees the God's love as a full of meaning light.

54. When the entire understanding face (of the mind) sees God, or, better said, when the entire mind reaches inside God, or, to say so, when God comes within the whole mind, then is the appropriate time to be silent[374].

55. When the mind shows itself to God, by looking at Him wit the whole its understanding, for the mind is imparted with the Ghost, and when the mind rejoices of God's glory and of His face shininess, as much as the mind it is allowed to, it is due and it is very appropriate the mind to watch in silence and without disturbance. And if any sort of darkness cloud interposes between mind and God, you throw in that cloud, as a dreadful fire, a luminous and burning fire, a short word, but out of the godlike unveiling. Thus, by quickly banishing away, the darkness with the light, and the mist with the warmth, and by enlightening the whole mind and by warming it with that word, the mind will succeed in being again together with God, as before, and to look at God's beauty and to rejoice, as it is due, of Him, and to beautify itself with God's beauty and to experience, to say it briefly, the realities coming from God, through the understanding sight, in the same time with receiving the-life-maker Ghost. In the same time, the mind will succeed in becoming simple, and in detaching itself, into Ghost and truth, namely into God, from all realities, even from those around God[375].

These things happen, as it is due, to the seer. But the one who is attached only to the doing, he need many things in order to reach this state, because of not being united with himself yet, and, through himself, with God. So, it is no wonder that, this one, he sings and he speaks in all ways, much and [374] Then they meet one another, or, then dwell one into another, the two faces, or sights, or loving intentions. Then the mind feels, with a supreme intensity, the look or the loving intention of God, or it feels the whole pulsation of endless love, from God, we would say of God's heart. Then is the time to be silent, in order not to scatter this untold charm.

[375] The author of the present writing constantly highlights the fact that the seer is elevated up to intuit God as Person, so that the seer doesn't stop at contemplating God's features as good things and values in themselves. If that was the case, this would be philosophy and not theology. Of course, God as Person doesn't lack His features and His uncreated energies. God is seen as their subject, or He is seen through them. But Himself is seen in them, and they aren't contemplated alone. And seeing God, it determines the mind to forget about them. When you see the beloved person, you see also that person's kindness, but you forget about kindness when looking at that person. The kindness is absorbed into person. In this sense, the mind must detach itself even from contemplating the realities from around God.

often, out of the godlike realities, frightening and banishing away, as through some ceaseless arrows, the one who hates us much and who angrily wages war to us. But the time of that one will also come, if the doer has patience, through the wave of the Ghost. Namely, when the shininess of the many hymns, songs, and godlike words, they will join in a great blaze[376]. Then the one who prays will defeat the enemy more easily, by mortally wounding the enemy, namely by burning up and by tearing apart, and especially banishing away the enemy's darkness, and the one who prays will enlighten himself and he will warm himself up by this fire, which will move him towards the godlike love. In the same time with this, he will raise towards God, silently, a hymn of his heart and the whole his awe, he showing to himself the above-nature wonders of many mysteries. This is for, not unjustly, the one who suffer, they are blessed by the Lord. Actually, with the passing of the time, they will inherit, as ones who will become gentle, the spiritual land of the promise (Mt. 5: 5) into Christ our Lord.

56. When the mind, by being envelopes by all the luminous light outpouring of the Ghost, it gets dizzy and it no longer know what to do, and it sees itself extending and being transformed according to the One Who is endless and borderless, then it is the to be silent.

57. And when the mind feels tired because of the all-luminous views and the mind wants to express those in words, as weakening the strength of the experience, to find a little resting, it is the due time to speak (Eccl. 3: 7), of course, short words, and appropriate to the godlike illumination.

58. When, by running away through the middle of the waters, from that pharaoh, thought with the mind, the mind

[376] The deeds of the ones who are on the level of the doing, those deeds were reckoned in the hesychastic movement, starting with Gregory of Sinai, especially the singing and the reading of the holy books, unlike the ceaseless prayer of the mind within the heart, one reckoned as characteristic to the seers, of to the contemplatives. This was due to the fact that the doers were monks too, namely withdrawn from the world. Of course, the Christians living in the world, they are called also to do the good deeds of the patience, of serving and loving the people. The monks banish away the temptations brought by the enemy, especially through singings and readings. But the song and read words must be uttered with so much warmth of the faith, so that the hot and luminous sparks out of each of them, to grow up and unite in a ceaseless blaze of the love for God.

crosses through its night in a light of fire and its day under a cloud cover (Exod. 13: 21)[377], then it is time for blessed silence and for quietude. This is for, then it truly starts the cleaning up of the soul. And when the thought with the mind grizzly Amalec, and the kinships following to that, they come against the monk, impeding the monk's crossing towards the Promise Land, then the time is right for speaking; but the mind must be upheld, in the mind's focusing towards God, by the understanding doing and by the due contemplation, as were yore the hands of Moses upheld by Aaron and Orr (Exod. 17: 12).

59. When is gushes up within heart, out of the endless depth of the godlike spring and out of the understanding sight, the spiritual power, that is due time for being silent. This is for, it is being done, in an untold mode, the holy religious service and the mind's worshipping towards God in Ghost and truth. And this takes place in a true understanding feeling[378].

60. When, through the understanding looking towards God, the rational part of the soul is being filled up with a godlike awe, and the understanding power is being filled up with sight, and the soul is wholly filled up with joy, then is time to be silent. This is for the mind sees then, with good-feeling, the truth, in a concentrated manner, and the mind extolls, by worshipping - while being bewildered – God Who shines within the mind[379].

[377] At night, the monk gets rid of the unsee enemy through the water of the tears and he is being led towards the Promise Land of the union with God, through the fire of the prayer, and during the day, the monk is covered with the grace of the humbleness, in order him not to be defeated by the vain glory.

[378] To the seen religious service and worshipping, brought to God, there must correspond also an unseen and wordless religious service (λατρεια) and worshipping. But in any religious service brought to God, the man encounters God. So, also in the inner religious service brought by the mind into the heart, it takes place this encounter. This is for, through the heart's altar, which the heart liturgizes at, the spiritual power gushes up out of the godlike abyss. Tis power catches the mind's worshipping and it offers that worshipping to God. What is being committed, it is so overwhelming, that the mind feels the need for being silent. This is a religious service offered by the mind, with an intense understanding feeling, like the seen religious service is perceived by the bodily senses. By committing the prayer within the heart, the mind is living, through understanding, a state of ceaseless worshipping. The mind is upheld by the "seeing" of God and by feeling God, namely by perceiving God through mind, which is different from perceiving the material things with the senses, but it is equally manifest like that one too.

[379] The rationality, by no longer being able to function, it falls in awe, and the understanding becomes "seeing". The rationality is accompanied by awe in its judgments too, through which

61. The one who worship God in a due manner, in Ghost and in truth, and who serve Him as it is due, they not only don't' worship and serve in a certain place, but not even with uttered words. This is for, as the understanding feeling, by raising righteously, it no longer wants to worship the One Who is non-circumscribed, in a certain place, likewise, by attaching itself to what is required in order to remain in truth, it naturally no longer suffers to worship and to serve - The One Who is endless, borderless, without a beginning, imageless, consummately simple and, generally speaking, above-mind – by using diverse words and limited utterings. When, namely, the time has come for the mind to unitarily shine the knowledge of the godlike truth out of the breeze and the breath of the Ghost, while the mind generally detaches itself from all the realities and it goes out above itself, the mind no longer sinks only into speechlessness, but also in a blessed understanding, as one that occupies itself, joyfully and with awe, with the realities which are above-word and above-mind, which the mind contemplates in the understanding light, motionlessly and unchangeably, in an eyeless gazing, as one that has reached - through union – above itself.

62. The mind, by taking heed at itself, it must carefully guide its understanding state, thoughtfully, wisely, and with right-judgment. And when the mind feels itself as contemplating the simple and imageless mysteries of the knowledge of God, the mind will immediately have to stop, in quietude and in silence and in awe, but not far from its heart worked and illuminated by the Ghost. This is for, then it is the time not only for appeasing all the feelings coming from the realities usually submitted to the senses, but nevertheless will be the time for being silent of any undertaken speech. And, even more that that, then will be the time, for the ones whoa re on the level of the knowledge[380], to indulge with occupying itself with the quietude and with the

it discovers new sides of the reality. All the more the rationality is being filled up with awe when knowing the whole concentrated truth. This is for the rationality sees in that truth, in the same time, all the sides, which the rationality would have seen them one at a time and separately. The mind has a sight too, as the body had. It is continuously affirmed the mind's contact with God, and not the rationally deducing Him from distance. This feeling has not only the meaning of perceiving, but also of sentiment, as the body's feeling hast it too.

understanding not-looking[381]. This is because of needing a total motionlessness into senses, in words, and in understandings, in order the mind to attach itself to The One and Only, but Threefold God, freely and in a direct impulse, by unitarily and uniquely looking at God. By this, the mind will see, as much as it is allowed to, the endless, the without-beginning, the non-comprised, and, to say it briefly, all the other godlike features, unchangeable and absolute (detached from all realities), and the mind will be united with God, transformed through contemplation, and simplified, and wholly become in the godlike image, with the help of the grace and full of joy and awe. And for the mind would want to tarry in this state, if it was possible, but it cannot, because of being changing and because of living together with the changing realities, and because of being connected with the body and with the surrounding things, when falling, the mind must known and not to get too far from the unitarily seeing and not to speak too much, but to say only a few things and those to be about the godlike lights, so that, thus, the mind not only to be able to return again, easily, to the above-mind union with God, but to feel, even more manifestly and more steadfastly, the union with God. This is for, the more the mind will guard the gathering in itself and the non-spreading, the more the nourishing out of God it will bring the mind more quickly towards the godlike union, and the mind will be united with even more manifest and more fruitful glows, by ceaselessly habituating to the godlike realities[382].

63. Once the mind has been changed, by experiencing the godlike showing through the understanding sight, and once the mind is overshadowed by the light of The unknown One Who is beyond all knowledge, the mind becomes undivided, simple, and borderless, by being unitarily enlightened like in a

[381] There is an understanding quietude, unlike the sensitive, exterior, one. But there is too, an understanding sight, unlike the sensitive sight. But both that quietude and that non-seeing, they have a positive meaning too. They are a quietude and a non-seeing which understand more than the inward disturbance and more than the rational sight, or, above all, the spiritual sight. This is because that unmatching is caused by an overwhelming light. And through non-seeing one can feel the intensity of that luminous light.

[382] The mind cannot stay continuously in the ecstasy of looking at God. But when the mind falls off that ecstasy, then the mind must occupy itself with singings and with godlike words, in order the mind to be able to come again, easily, to that ecstasy state.

darkness[383]. Then the mind contemplated the borderless beauty due to the overwhelming simplicity, that one imageless in order to exceed any image, that one without beginning and above any beginning, non-comprised, but comprising in itself the borders of all realities and everything that is bordered, and filling up all the realities as one that is above-fulness and it is endless[384]. Shortly speaking, when the mind, by looking from above, it sees, by looking at The One, all the realities, on the untold ground of a understanding power that is above-understanding, it is the time for keeping its silence, and for being mysteriously and in a above-world manner - or, to say so, both without seeing and speechlessly – delighted with the impartation with the truth, through a godlike penetration into the truth. And when the mentioned aspects lack from within mind, and when the mind sees division around itself, then is the time for speaking, namely for speaking the word appropriate for leading to silence. This is for the above-word silence is better than any word, namely that silence very appropriately called as "the silence at its time", as Solomon said too, when placing this silence in the first place: "The time is to be silent" and then "The time is to speak" (Eccl. 3: 7). Actually, the best thing, and first to be honored, it is that of keeping the mind its silence at due time. And if this isn't present yet, and the mind still isn't unitarily in the above-world realities, let there be at least the second thing, namely the speaking at due time, for in his way, the speaking to be kindred with the silence and nigh to it. Thus, as the silence, likewise the [383] The seemingly paradox of the "illuminating into darkness" it can be solved, if we take in account that this is the darkness of a too intense light, or the "supra-luminous darkness", as it was called by Dionysus the Areopagite. This darkness means too, the state of non-specifying into shapes, namely contemplating, in an undifferentiated manner, all the realties. That's why the mind can be plenary enlightened into that "darkness", for this darkness comprises all the meanings, or the meanings of all realities, and it comprises infinitely more than all the realities together. But the concentratedly comprised realities aren't differentiated in God Himself, through the understanding of an evolution, in the sense of that one thought by Jacob Böhme. They are differentiated only a created world, when God wants to created the it. In God there is another differentiation, actualized from ever: that of the Persons' Trinity.

[384] We always are here in full Areopagite's terminology. Only in what is composed, there are limits of the component parts. Within the absolutely simple One, there isn't any limit. God is imageless, not because of being uniform or chaotic, but for He virtually comprises in Himself all the shapes, in such a consummate harmony, that they for an all-simple unit. In The non-comprised and borderless One, are comprised and are overwhelmed the borders of all realities. God isn't incapable of giving border to the realities He creates. If that had been the case, God couldn't have actually created the realities, but to His chaos it would have been corresponded the emanations' chaos.

speaking, let them be at due time, and let the speaking to strive to come back to silence. And this happens to the one who ceaselessly speaks and cogitated at the godlike realities, and who sees the creation as mirroring the Creator and as talking about Him. This means speaking at due time. But about these aspects, we must speak more detailed.

64. When the mind, by naturally crossing above all the realities from here, it embraces the silence, it is the time for delighting with the above-world and untold realities. This is for, it is the time form the illumination and for the understanding light, for the union between mind and sight, for the limitlessness, for the above-nature knowledge and, in short, it is the time for receiving the godlike wisdom and for being imparted with the godlike wisdom, which the mind is consummated through, in resting and in silence from all realities, by achieving the untold joy in awe[385].

65. When the soul, by getting drunk with feeling the truth, as out of a too strong goblet of the grace, it feels himself as he would have left his mind, let the soul know that is the time for being silent.

66. When the inward man's mood feel that it must shout out: "Lord, how much got multiplied the ones who trouble me! Many are rising up against me" (Ps. 3: 1), then it is the time for speaking; it is the time for speaking in words as it is due, not vain things, but pondered words, against the enemies, as it should[386].

67. When the light of the Lord's face it has been shed upon the soul, so that the soul is getting beautified and it is

[385] The awe is the above-understanding state of understanding, it is impartation above-word, in silence. As such, the awe doesn't mean the mind's paralysis, but it is a state of fulness, or of supra-fullness; it means experiencing the realities which cannot be known only with the natural mind, despite making efforts for knowing and understanding.

[386] A too strong goblet means here a too strong wine. It is the too strong wine of the overwhelming truth. It is called the wine of the grace, for the truth is given to the mind united with God not by the mind's own power, but by grace, or as a gift. The mind is getting drunk of this overwhelming truth, by being filled up with enthusiasm. This truth isn't known simply intellectually, but it is intensely felt, for the mind baths in God's light, a light that is, in the same time, the God's love.

68. When the soul sees rising up unjust witnesses against himself, asking him about the things he doesn't know and disturbing him, it is the time for speaking, namely, it is the time for answering back against.

69. The highest good and, to say so, the good that is on top of all existing and thought realities, it is God. And in all the sees realities, the highest and the unmatched and the best according to the nature, it is the man. And by grace, the man is even above the angels. So, the seer's mind, by getting closer through the very many realities existing between God and people, to the One Who is above-understanding, the man will be filled up with fear, if he hasn't had plentifully the experience of the illuminator grace[387]. But if the man has tasted, as one could say, out of the spiritual power that is working within heart, the man will be elevated at the highest good, at God, and the man enters God, through an even more godlike gift, and the man looks at God, unitarily, and the man is filled by awe, while silently dwelling in the above-mind depth. And this is, like one would say, truly the warranty of the first resting, one that has as role model the God's resting after creation (Gen. 2: 2-3)[388]. And about the second resting, a higher and more enlightened one, having as image the resting ordered on behalf of the people of God (Hebr. 4: 9), the mind rejoices by turning back to itself, from God, and by knowing itself as image of the prototype (role model) and all the realties existing between God and man, as they are. This is for, then the mind not only reached the above-mind and the above – understanding realities, in a corresponding manner and in a wonderful awe, but it is filled up with joy, too, and not with any kind of joy, but with the spiritual joy, and the mind silently rejoices of the rays which show God, and the mind rejoices of the deifying works coming upon itself, and is being [387] Between God and people, there are very numerous realities: the seen realities, the angels, the uncreated energies, and the features of God. Across all of those, and by getting through all of those, the man gets closer to God.

[388] In the Greek text, this resting is called as "Sabbath-ism" (Sabbatismos), for the seventh day, which God rested Himself on, in Hebrew is called Sabbath.

united with the above-nature Unity of the godhead, into Christ Jesus[389].

70. When the mind reckons that it has removed all the created realities, as they wouldn't existed, then the mind intuits, in an untold mode, the One Who truly exists, contemplating Him above any word and understanding union, into ghost and truth, through the endless raising above the godlike realities which are in connection with the existing realities[390]. Then the mind becomes unitary, or one, to say so, and through this light, the mind passes under the mastery of the silence, in an untold mode. Also, the mind is filled up with love and with joy, and that isn't only a simple joy, but it is the delectation with the effects of the Ghost's work, one which the angels too, are partakers to.

71. As You are, Lord, non-comprised according to Your being, by anybody, and by any rational and understanding nature, or by any created knowledge, not even by that one of the cherubs, but You are outside and above, endlessly endless, to any knowledge, likewise, Master, are endless and borderless the realities from round You. That's why, through Your immeasurable taking care of us, You have commanded Moses, the lawmaker of the Old Testament, to herald You as The One Who Are and like The One Who called Himself as such. And again, You, the all-true One and the only Supreme Truth, You said about some people of Yours that You showed Yourself to them, but You didn't unveil them Your name. This is because You name is unparalleled and above any name (Philip. 2: 9), not only above any name on earth, but also in heavens. This is for the ones who are full with Your light, they describe You as a being, but without being them able to tell anything about Your being's content. So, they show You as above-being and as a support (subject) that cannot be understood. And You make Yourself known, manifestly, above-understanding and endlessly unknown, to all the ones who have the power of knowing You; and above them.

[389] The man, by crossing through all realities, and by reaching at God, it finds the first resting. This first resting is the sinking in the God's depth, as into the consummate and endless Good. This first resting it has a model the God's resting after He created the world, or His turning back into His endless depth form the exist into the creation's deed. The second resting s the turning back of the mind to itself, but without exiting God. This is the second act of the resting. If the mind doesn't become aware of itself, the mind won't be able to fully rejoice of the resting into God. It is being highlighted here the preservation of the human person in his union with God. That's why, only know the mind fully rejoices of the union with God, by surrendering itself to this union while having the clearest self-awareness.

[390] Between God and people, there are very many realities: the seen realities, the angels, the uncreated energies, and the features of God. Through all of those, and by crossing through all of them, the man gets closer to God. The mind makes a hypothetical abstraction not only of all the created realities, but the mind even exceeds the thinking at the godlike features and energies related to the created realities, so that the mind focuses on their divine Subject itself. And this isn't an intellectual act of the man, but it is a sight into the Ghost and truth, and above any work and above any union with the godlike features and works.

You sometimes show Yourself as consummately above time, without beginning, as being the limitless life itself, and as escaping any spatial understanding, and You are present everywhere in the same time, above all realities, as The One Who made all realities by Yourself. But You are the content of the understanding natures, and You are their impassable place[391]. And You exceed the mind's quickness and thought, as The One Who is above all realities and the hand all-upholding all the realities, in a non-understood mode. You aren't submitted to the nature's borders, for You are borderless. This is for You are, in an above-nature mode, non-comprised not only according to Your nature, but also in the natural realities which are around You, as One Who are wisdom above wisdom, power above power, and love and kindness above the whole meaning of the love and of the kindness.

What somebody could name You like? Unapproachable light? But you are above light. Judge Who knows everything from before being done? But You are all-above any judge. Have we call You as Maker? But what kind of Maker are You, for You create through a simple inclination of Your will, the many and diverse material existences? But what could we say about the immaterial realities? O, what a depth exceeding everything! Through a simple inclination of Your Ghost, are produced all the spiritual realities, which are of one nature, but which are very numerous according to their dispositions, and, if you want, also [391] "God is the content (περιοχή) of the rational natures and their impassable place", or unexplored. The spiritual beings aren't on a given place, and all the less is God. Although, God is the "garden" receiving all of them and the unexplored "place', which they are their steadfastness in, despite the fact that this "garden" and this "place" are infinite. Otherwise, who would have kept all of them together? They would have scattered and they would have been abolished it id hadn't been so. God is infinite, but He still constituted for them a "place" and a "land" keeping all of them in connection and giving them a "house". The God's infinity isn't a chaos, but it is a very well composed and steadfast and springing out the whole good composition, or of all structures.

according to their persons. And this is what is most wonderful, and what escapes, because of overwhelming any understanding, of whosoever cogitates. I wonder, are these ones characteristic to the Maker? Not at all. Should we call You as Builder and Craftsman? But what builder builds without a foundation, even the tiniest thing, as You did, Master, the so large earth, with so many mountains and rocks and other materials, and by founding it on nothing (Job 26: 7), and being the earth such a steadfast one? Or, what craftsman brings to existence the inexistent realities, and even in a moment and only with the word and so many and great things, as You have brought them to existence? So, by somebody saying that your things are those of a builder and of a craftsman, will him say what is due? By no means. For You are endlessly above a builder and a craftsman, o, God!

Then, who have seen, heard, or done, such a love as the all-illuminated one which, into Your kindness, You have shown it to us, by taking our nature with all the awful suffering You endured for us, above all hopes? The one who contemplated this fact, as much as it can be contemplated through the grace, they enter the widely open torrent of the love and of the wonderful taking care, and they reach totally outside themselves (in ecstasy), comprised, at their turn, by an overwhelming love for You. And they do not know what to truly and appropriately call like, the aspects of this oikonomia. This is for the aspects belonging to Your embodiment, they abundantly overwhelm the mind and the word and all the hearing and understanding, You the All-Good God. Are You and are You called as Father of all realities? But You exceed in parenthood, in untold mode, any mind, according to cause, to mastery, and to taking care, to advising, to long-suffering, and to lenience. Are you called as Emperor? Yes, and You equally are so, and not less for the present time and not more for the time to come, or for the time past. And how? Wonderfully, totally freely and simply. This is for Your Kingdom is the Kingdom of all ages together, of the present time, pf the past time and of the future time, and You mastery is from generation to generation (Ps. 144[392]: 13).

Thus, in all realities and in all modes, You are placed infinitely above all realities, being You simply and freely beyond any imagination, and exceeding, to say it shortly, in any aspect, all the realities, both You, non-comprised Lord, and the realities from around You. The mind, by imagining these realities from around You, the mind has them as the soul's guide, towards seeing (contemplating) of You. And, by entirely receiving the instillation of the Ghost, the mind enters like a mysterious darkness, not being the mind able to see consummately You, because of the limitless and unapproachable Your glory. And for this reason, You rest them with an above-world resting, in an untold manner, on the ones who contemplate You and who love You, they wondering – but they not totally being outside seeing You – what is the reason why, You are resting them for[393], You the untold One, You the non-understood One, You the limitless One, You the non-comprised One, and, in short, You the All-Unknown One, both according to Your being and to Your work. Amen.

72. When the mind moved away from the multitude of thought, by shaking off their diverse and much divided meanings, and thus the mind raises above the scattered cogitation, through the breeze of and the impartation with the Holy Ghost Who unifies the mind and Who ceaselessly blows in an continuous springing out (αεἰβλυτα) upon heart; when the mind enters the godlike places[394] and it is crossed through and imprinted by the thoughts about God, and, through a understanding focusing, unitarily and in the same time, and with love, the mind mirrors all the realities existing around God, and then the mind achieves, manifestly, the godlike resting, by rejoicing of a deep and godlike peace, and of an endless and serene resting of the heart into Christ Jesus, our Lord[395].

[393] God rests the one who have reached into Him also for they do not see Him consummately, for they do not try to get out of Him in order to have a new experience, because of being bored after finishing to know Him; but also, for they aren't totally outside seeing Him, a fact that would determine them to make other efforts in order to reach to see Him.

[394] The "godlike places". Each godlike meaning is a place, which the mind can deepen itself in, and it can be stabilized in. But, in the same time, each godlike meaning has diverse layers, or it can be seen together with other meanings, which can be reckoned as several "places" and a only one godlike 'place". But these places are also the diverse densities of the godlike energies, or of the God's presence through those energies, which the spiritual man reaches onto, by experience. Thus, it can be reconciled the affirmation from this paragraph, that the mind must enter "the godlike places", with the affirmation that the mind must be unified, by contemplating, in the same time, all the realities from around God.

[395] The peace, or the resting, or the quietude, it has two reasons: the appeasing of the thoughts regarding the life within the world, which are equally numerous worries (Heidegger), and the

73. When the mind speaks to God and it prays, as a son prays his all-loving Father, and, by seeing the light of Jesus, the mind gladdens itself, overwhelmed and amazed by the godlike and above-nature love, and for it limpidly feels the work of the Holy Ghost within the heart; when the mind wants to fly mysteriously and in an above-world manner, above the godlike unveilings and consummation, then the mind truly stops itself from all its things, being elevated above understanding, after the mind has understood, and it is wonderfully sweetened, with the truly resting in the peace of the-life-maker Ghost of Christ[396].

74. "God rested of all the things He started doing" (Gen. 2: 3); but only after the fulfillment (unfolding) of all the things done through Word and Ghost. Likewise, the mind in the image of God, it rests from all its things, which it started doing towards the completion of the thought (intelligible) world of the virtue; but only after the mind searched and steadfastly consummate in the Word of God and in the of-life-maker Ghost, the whole world and the meanings (the intelligible) from within the world, and after the mind ascended again from these ones, in the Word and in the Ghost, to the ones called by some people as natural, and after the mind has ascended to the mysterious, simple, and detached from all realities views, of the knowledge of God (of the theology)[397]. This is for, by reaching the resting then, the soul overpouring within heart of the comforting from the Holy Ghost, of His fullness of love, one that overwhelms those worries, by consummately giving the soul everything the soul needs. The soul no longer feels the need for searching for something else, in order to comfort himself. This isn't a sentiment of emptiness and of tiredness, but of fullness.

[396] It is being described here what happens within the hesychasts' mind, when, through the Prayer to Jesus, they see His light within their heart. The hesychasts didn't describe in a more detailed manner, this experience of theirs. Not even Saint Gregory Palamas, their defender, did it. Our author affirms here too, that, then they enter a quietude, a resting, a peace above any understanding. But he highlights here too, that this resting, or peace, or quietude, it is not given except when exceeding the contemplation of the God's features and energies, which He shows Himself through; that peace isn't given except when surpassing those realities and encountering God as the Subject of those features and energies. The author constantly highlights that the human person cannot find his resting except by encountering God as Person.

[397] Here is being affirmed again that the mind doesn't rest in contemplating the natural features of God (infinity, kindness, righteousness etc.), as looked in themselves. These ones, as values in themselves, they have been called by some people as metaphysical (Aristotle). The mind doesn't rest except after ascending above these, in their godlike Subject, in the love of God as Person. Until the mind occupies itself with those natural features of God, the mind is being consummated through deeds in the virtues which the mind imitates those godlike features tastes much resting and peace, by knowing the truth of the understanding[398], and it is deified through the light of the knowledge and through the impartation with the-life-maker Ghost into Christ Jesus, our Lord.

75. When God was resting, He didn't rest from all things, but only from those things which He started doing. From the without beginning and uncreated and characteristic to Him by nature, He didn't rest. Likewise, the mind, by imitating God, after the mind searched into godlike Word and into the Ghost, and after the mind has crossed through the seen creation, it doesn't rest from the things characteristic to its nature, things having no beginning and no end, but the mind rests from the seen things, which begin and end. That's why, resting the body into motionless, a resting accompanying the one who has appeased himself, it is an opposite state to that of mind. This is for, if the mind hadn't entered, in a continuous motion, through a ceaseless breeze of the Ghost, in the contemplation of the seen things, the mind wouldn't have known if there is an understanding resting, one that turns in a ceaseless motion, and unitarily, only around God, a resting that deifies the one who is partaker to it, in an untold resting into Christ[399].

through. But the resting comes to the soul after the mind ascends beyond this endeavor of the doing that has as purpose the achieving of the virtues. Until the mind still has something to do, the mind won't rest. The resting comes after the soul has finished everything it has had to do, as a gift from the Word and from the Holy Ghost. Better said, in the Word and in the Ghost the mind worked in order to achieve consummation in virtues, and also in the Word and in the Ghost the soul finds the resting of this endeavor. This is for, in the Word and in the Ghost, there are the mysteries of the endless love of God, the simple mysteries, the mysteries detached from all realities, the mysteries of the true knowledge about God as Subject. This is for, what is simpler, what is more detached from anything, than experiencing the love from a person, especially when that Person is God, or than experiencing the supreme communion with persons.

On this way, one can say that the resting of God it coincides to the resting of each soul and, by and large, it coincides to the resting of all human beings who will be saved, at the general resurrection, and at the final judgment. This is because, until the souls are working in order to achieve this resting, God works too, within the souls. "Jésus sera en agonie jusqu'à la fin du monde" (Pascal). Besides, even the author here, he tells it in the next chapter.

[398] The fully real truth isn't an object, but it is a subject. The object doesn't exist for itself, but for subject. Through subject, the object is lightened. And the supreme Subject is God.

[399] The mind firstly searches and crosses through the creation into the hypostatical Word and into the godlike Ghost as Person, the mind understanding the creation in the supreme Rationality and Life, as its cause. But after this, the mind doesn't rest, but enter the accomplishing of the things regarding the mind's consummation, namely the things "characteristic to the mind's nature". These things are, in the same time, the works of God

76. “Do not hurry, says Solomon, to say something before the face of God; because God is in heavens, and you are on earth, down” (Eccl. 5: 1). By saying this, he very wisely and directly clarifies which is the time for being silent. Because he says: because you, despite you being down on earth, you are before the face of God Who is in heavens, and Who made you worthy of so much grace, so that you, the one from below, you can cogitate at and you can see the things from above, and, by entering them in an understanding mode, to stay in front of God - so, do not hurry to say a word; for that is the time to be silent. Aspire to be in an understanding mode[400] under the work of the truth, unitarily and in a godlike mode. This is for, this means being in front of God, while the mind is contemplating, unitarily and in a simple and unique seeing into God, the many realities from around God[401]. So, by experiencing this, and by standing in front of God, do not hurry to say something, unless you want, willingly and in an unskillful manner, to descend from there[402].

But one can tell also the following thing, to the ones who try to explain the meaning of this word: There was a time when the human nature was intact, and, that’s why, rightly so, the human nature was far from all bad things, and it was close to within the mind, which neither begin nor end. By this, the mind enters the contemplation of the things from within the world, namely the seeing of those things into God, or of seeing God into those things. Then the body rests. But the mind doesn’t rest. The body’s resting, equal to motionlessness, it accompanies the one who has been rested of the world’s things. But the mind’s resting equals a ceaseless motion, namely the mind doesn’t consist of motionlessness, as the body’s resting does. So, the motionless resting of the body it is contrary to the mobile resting of the mind. The ceaseless motion of the mind around God, it itself is a proof of the mind’s resting into God.

[400] “Experiencing in an understanding mode”, “you to be in an understanding mode”, namely not bodily. It is not here about understanding that state, though that state doesn’t lack a certain understanding.

[401] Here the author is explaining what the “face of God” is, which he spoke about in the head no. 55 too. This face is the presence of God as Person, intuited by mind through His works and features. The mind doesn’t stop at these ones, as in case of reckoning them as standing by themselves. But the mind sees in them, in a spiritual (understanding) mode, or the mind feels God as Person through them, as looked at in His unity and simplicity, unlike the variety of His works and features. Even when living, through all the manifestations of a human person, their subject, you live their subject as a unitary and simple reality, though when starting describing him, the words are insufficient.

[402] If you start describing the way you are experiencing the godlike Subject in, you will come down from that experience, to the speaking about His features. A resembling thing takes place when you start describing the subject of your fellow human. Immediately you have started that, you will exit the direct and intense intuition of him.

God, contemplating God and being delighted with gladness and with awe, by the glory of the beauty of His face, in our ancestor Adam, in an immaterial, understanding, heavenly, and incorruptible delectation. This is for much grace was overpoured within the soul of the first man and his mind, that was in a godlike manner, it was full, over the top, with many knower views and elevations towards God, rejoicing, in the seen Paradise, of the unseen (intelligible) Paradise, or, to say so, rejoicing of the happy life, for Adam's mind was united with itself and with God and it was tarrying into itself and into God, as it is due. Adam's mind was, namely, in a unified and resembling to God state, and it was totally deified. And thus, rightly so, since it has been created in the image of God. Behold, in short, the goods we have from God.

But the cursed devil couldn't stand that, because of being wounded with envy, and because of being the enemy of our lock and glory. And that's why, the perdition-monger, he was making all efforts to delude us and to deprive us of what we hoped for, by giving us so-called good advises, and by igniting our lust for a deification higher than the one we had, by slandering - the beginner of the evilness – the justness of the God's commandment. Out of that deceiving has come to us our pitiful perdition and we have been removed from God and from the godlike delectation; because of that we have fallen, miserably, form the spiritual living and from the unified mind and, so, from contemplating the face of God, and from being glorified and transformed through the ray of the spiritual beauty. And this has brought us to preaching many separated gods, instead of a threefold hypostatical godhead, namely we have fallen to worship the ones who aren't really gods, but they are deceitful demons, and perdition-mongers, and envious. So, we have lost The Actual One and the unitary life and order, and we have been broken in many and diverse parts; and our understanding power, as also its power of focusing, or, better said, its strength, they vanished, and not without reason; and we have fallen in the depth of an immeasurable evilness, and we have chosen, we who are the images of God and worthy of living above and heavenly, to recklessly thinking (Col. 3: 2).

But, given the fact that we aren't unchangeable and impossible to be budged, we can, happily so, as we have rolled down from the much glory to the lowest dishonor, to turn ourselves back again and to look upwards and to see the all-worshipped face of God. We no longer see His face as close as before Adam's falling, but we see it now from far away, but we still can see it and we still can experience the brightness of God's beauty.

So, the godlike Moses, and the entire group of the Prophets and the ones from before them, namely Abraham and the ones like him, they saw, as much as it was possible to them, very clearly, this beauty, and they were delighted, satisfactorily, with its shininess. But, because of being overwhelmed by God's unapproachable glory, some of them were crying for their unworthiness (Isa. 6: 5), others reckoned themselves and called themselves as dust and dirt (Gen. 18: 27); others, again, they weren't even capable of speaking because of the overwhelming greatness of the glory of the seen One, and they were rebuking their weakness and their cumbersome speaking (Exod. 4: 10). And many other blessed states they experienced in a worthy of being praised mode. That's why the godlike David, in love with the shininess of the beauty of the Lord's face, it shouts out towards God: "When will I come and show myself to the face of my God?" (Ps. 41[403]: 2). And by wanting to show the state of his soul when seeing the face of the Lord, he says: "The righteous will dwell together with Your face" (Ps. 139[404]: 13). And in order to wisely present the strength which the soul is given to, by the seen face of God, he says: "You turned Your face away from me, and I got troubled" (Ps. 29[405]: 7). And if the turning away of God's face, it brings fear, it will follow that its showing, to the soul, and the soul's looking at it, it brings spiritual peace to the soul.

And this is an all the greater gift, as after the godlike love and joy, there are shown the charismas of the Ghost, or His fruits, which present the ones who live in holiness and awe, as walking in the Lord's light. That's why he says: "Lord, into the light of Your face they will walk and into Your name they will rejoice all day" (Ps. 88[406]: 16) – of course, here is about the spiritual gladness, given that the understanding and untold Sun sends within the inwards man, unstained and of-life-maker His rays, and through this there start shining within mind, the realities from above world[407].

Meanwhile, the whole soul's memory is elevated from on earth and it is moved to heavens[408]. And the man rejoices and jumps up and, by singing hymns, the man stops and gladdens in so much joy, delectation, and satisfaction, as one cannot tell, and the man happily spread out of him, the shininess of the Lord's face. That's why the man prays, on one hand, to God, by saying: "Do not turn Your face away from me, in order I not to resemble to the ones who descend into grave" (Ps. 142[409]: 7). This is because the turning away, of the Lord's face, from the man, it is cause for darkness, and the turning towards the man, of the Lord's face, it is cause of all the understanding light, and, rightly so, also of the spiritual joy. That's why he says about himself too: "It has been marked, upon me, the light of Your face", and he adds: "You have given gladness into my heart" (Ps. 4: 6-7).

And again, by confessing that the spiritual gift of the godlike grace has come to him out of the light of the Lord's face, and by asking himself: who are the ones staying before the Lord's face and worshipping Him, he answers: "The rich in understanding, of the people of God" (Ps. 44[410]: 14), namely the saints and the people of God, who are many, but not all of them. This is because of not being all of them able to see the face of God and to live the angelic life, until they still are living on earth. This is for they still need more, in order to reach that. To this are partakers only the ones who reckon that it is due to serve God with godlike wisdom and with knowledge, and that it must be brought Him worshipping into Ghost and truth. Only thus could be called, appropriately, as "the rich ones of the people of God", as ones who are illuminated by the mysteries of many views and they have, as richness, the depths of the much-wisdom and of the godlike and spiritual knowledge, which, according to Paul, it

[407] The Holy Fathers speak, by and large, about a "mind's feeling", or about "the understanding feeling". As we have often said, it means that the understanding or the mind, it doesn't relate, from distance, to the godlike realities, but it lives in their ambience, and it experiences them. This thing is said here, for it is affirmed that feeling God, by the mind, it is set in working by God's rays, or energies, which come within our mind or soul.

[408] The mind no longer remembers about the earthly realities. The mind's memory has been moved to the heavenly realities. The mind remembers all the previous experiences it had with God.

[409] In KJB we have: Psalm 143: 7. (E. l. t.'s n.)

is not had by many (1 Cor. 8: 7). That's why, the wonderful David says towards God: "And Your face will be worshipped by the rich ones of the people".

Solomon, by knowing this better than everybody, for he was full of wisdom more than everybody (3[411] Kings 3: 12), and who has a special gift in teaching us, he says: "Do not hurry to s-peak before God, for God is in heavens and you are on earth" (Eccl. 5: 1). Namely, when you reach, by the godlike gift, in front of God, and when you are partaker to a godlike and unitary view, namely when the mind's sight raises up to there, it is time to be silent. So, do not hurry then to say not even one word, by vainly following your habit of speaking, because then it isn't the time for speaking. This is for, then, you too are being made god, while you still being on earth, for you are looking, like the angels, at the face of The God from Heavens.

Actually, the angels too, as the Savior said: "they always see the face of the Father Who is in heavens" (Mt. 18: 10). That's why, when you hear Solomon saying in another place: "To the righteous one it always springs out light from the face of the Lord" (Proverbs 13: 9), you think at the fact that they too experience this, like the angels do, by the godlike grace, by always looking at the face of the Lord, out of which it springs the light like from a spring. This is for the man can become and he can be an angel on earth, not to say another god, and he turns back to the gift of being in the image of God, by the grace of the Lord. Thus, you, by becoming down on earth what God is in heavens, namely god, do not tear apart this wonderful thing by uttering words, neither you pass from a meaning to another, by moving you cogitation, through a division of the understanding, but get yourself close, unitarily, and watch, like God does, eyeless and motionless, through a simple and unified sight, delighting yourself with the unapproachable and all-luminous shininess that springs out of the face of the Lord.

This is the highest state and the most craved for state, of the mind of the ones keeping their mind wisely directed towards God, or, as one could say, the flower od the mind's cleanness. This is the desired unit of the faith done in the communion of the Ghost; the extolled fruit of the deifying wisdom; the foundation of the spiritual peace; the chamber of the unimaginable joy; the gate of the love from God; the offspring of the illumination; the cause for springing out of heart the inexhaustible waters of the Ghost; the true food of the fore-imagined manna; the delectation, the transformation, and the growing up of the soul; the beginning of the mysteries and of the godlike untold unveilings; the end of the unique and first truth; the raising of any kind of thoughts; the guarding of all cogitations; the elevation above understanding; the occasion of the awe; the above-mind transformation and transfiguration of the mind, in simple, borderless, endless, non-comprised, in a imageless and shapeless state, without quality, non-diverse, without quantity, untouched and above-world; the mind's total restoration in the godlike image.

So, you, by reaching this state and by being under such a deifying work of the loving-of-people grace, do not hurry to utter, because of your lack of skillfulness, some word, before the face of the Lord. For His will be the unique and simple glory forever and ever[412].

77. While the mind wants to contemplate the realities of the understanding (intelligible) from above itself, if the mind doesn't have together-working for that, by grace, also its heart, the mind will only see feeble, non-enlightened, and muddy things. That's why, the mind will miss also its main pleasure, even if, because of the mind's nescience, it will seem to the mind that is sweetened, because of the fact that the mind hasn't tasted yet the sweetening and the mind doesn't know what that sweetening is[413].

[412] It is about the same very convincing argument regarding the necessity of being silent when the mind feels an unmediated relation with God as Person. The simple unity, alive and impossible to define how rich, or any person, it hides when the man gets out of the spell of directly experiencing that person, and experience that is upheld by the reciprocal attention of the two persons. The word scatters the spell, it scatters the most essential reality, or the living into that reality, as in the fairy tales where the will of communication in words the mystery of the beloved person it makes that person leaving forever. But then the question is: what the importance of the words still consists of? The uttered word in an introduction to the Word-Person. One can speak until he reaches the unmediated experiencing of the person, namely the direct communication with the person. Once reached there, we must keep our silence. We must experience the word-person in its fullness through the silence which our persons catch with, as an all-comprising word, another person. The multitude of words keeps us in a world of lifeless peels, in an apparent reality. The essential reality is the person. But we live in our person only the image, the most essential image of the plenary and ultimate reality that is the godlike Person, better said the Trinitarian communion of Persons.

[413] If the mind isn't accompanied by the heart, it won't have the experience of God as Person, for the mind always tends towards discerning, in order to understand, or the mind is carried

79. The mind, guide by grace towards contemplation, it is always being truly nourished with spiritual manna. This is for the felt manna too, that one eaten by Israel during their exodus in desert, it has a worthy of being cherished power, as one that was feeding and sweetening the body; by what was that manna according to its being, they didn't know. That's' why too, it was called as manna, a word showing its unknow nature. This is for, the word manna means: "What is this?". And this was for, while eating what they were seeing, and because of not knowing the nature of that thing, the Jews asked in their bewilderment: "What is this?". Likewise, the seer too, by getting out of himself towards himself, with his mind, he always asks himself: "What is this? – for it gladdens when looked at, and it fattens the mind when it is spiritually eaten, but it exceeds the possibility of being understood in itself, because of being godlike and above-nature, and it nourishes and it waters the mind in a wonderful mode, but it escapes any understanding of the mind, not only because of being non-comprised, according to its being, but also for being endless and borderless[414].

80. Also I would say, rightly so, that three are the things bearing witness to the truth: the creation, the Scripture, and the Ghost. This is for through Scripture and creation, when looked at spiritually, it is being contemplated the One and simple truth, as a truth coming out of Him. And through these three witnesses, the mind reaching and stopping into the two truths[415], the mind has found, by the grace of God, its way. This is for, through the simple truth, the mind has found the height and the depths thought with the mind (intelligible), as also its endless width, which, by placing the mind in a state of awe, it away, by the tendency of finding out some self-standing things, in order the mind to be able to fully comprise them with the understanding. But my heart makes me to experience that all of these are some feeble and inconsistent realities. Only the heart, ads the most total and as the most intense organ of the person, it experiences the Person of God. And the mind sees the light only through the heart, or it experiences the love from the Person. But the encounter with another person comes only out of that person's will, namely out of that person's grace.

[414] As the manna too, that was nourishing the body into wilderness, likewise God Who nourishes the mind, He cannot be understood in Himself. The mind, by being nourished with Him, it asks: what is This? The mind feels the impulse of asking, for, by getting out of the divide and estranged self, it gets out towards the true self, and through that into God Who is above understanding.

[415] The two truths are: the simple truth, or The One, or God; and the multiple truth, composed, created by the first one.

makes the mind to fearfully extoll God. And through the composed truth, the mind has found, in addition to the mentioned things, also the heart's peace, the love, and the joy, which make the mind singing with love, overwhelmed with wonder. But the man needs a long time and much toiling and much patience, in order to, by somehow rejecting the senses and by removing from within mind the things submitted to the senses, the mind to be elevated to the realities thought with the mind (intelligible), consequently to which, it shines to the soul the seeing of the truth.

I haven't said that the truths need, in order to be found, some like these, as there are the time intervals, or the toiling, or the patience, in order to be comprised, but I've said that the man needs them. And this is, for the truth is one and simple, despite it appears to the contemplation (to the view) in a twofold mode, and not only that it almost shouts out from all quarters, confessing itself to the ones who want to see the truth. But the man, because of being composes and intertwined with the senses, and also submitted to transformations and to changing, he sometimes deviates from himself and he becomes his own enemy, without knowing it, deceiving on himself due to his self-appreciation and getting ill of faithlessness. And by these three, namely through self-appreciation, through cunningness, and through faithlessness, he miserably falls off the truth confesses by the three realities previously mentioned: the Scripture, the creation, and the Ghost. That's why, in order to reject the awful self-appreciation and the others, the man needs the three ones which I've been speaking about, saying that he needs them[416].

[416] Through the simple truth, the author understands God in Himself; and through the composed truth, the author understands the composed truth, namely the creation. Through this we can understand the affirmation that the first truth makes the mind to fearfully extoll God; and the second truth makes the mind to extoll God with love, due to the mind's gratitude for the gift of the world, given to the man, by God. Nut the composed truth can also mean the fact that we cannot know God without knowing on ourselves too, namely without Him entering the relation with us. In this sense, one can understand the expression that the truth is simple in itself, but when contemplated by us it appears to be twofold. But the two truths, being in connection, they actually are one truth. And this truth confesses to us from all quarters. That's why the truth is not difficult to be fount out. On the other hand, though, because of depending on us to recognize the truth, namely to be found out, or recognized, if we do not know on ourselves, we won't be able to know that truth either. This is for we are part of the creation and only together with the creation we are in connection with God, namely only by knowing on ourselves, as such, we know Him.

This is for, the mind, by getting humble, to believe with simplicity and thus to immediately know limpidly, out of Scripture, and out of creation, into the Ghost, not only the all-simple truth, but also the composed truth coming out of the all-simple truth, and even what have been impeding the mind from seeing the truth and it has been parting the mind from the joy of having the truth.

So, the first truth is One and the only simple by nature. After the first truths there comes the composed truth coming out of the first truth for us, the composed ones[417]. And the ultimate and the best end of our mind, which the whole living and ascesis strive towards, of the ones who are guided according to the Ghost's target, it is that the empty mind to see and to rejoice of the shininess sprung out of the prime and unique truth and out of the composed truth wonderfully coming out of the simple truth. And this thing couldn't be achieved otherwise, except through humbleness and simplicity in faith, on the ground of the Scripture's witness and of the creation's witness into the Ghost[418].

And when the mind will mirror with the three powers it has, the truth, out of the three witnesses mentioned above, by somehow bending towards itself, it becomes much more humble and steadfastly faithful. From here it ascends, step by step, gladly, towards contemplating (seeing) the truth, whose rays are more limpidly illuminated. Due to these ones, by turning back again towards itself, for the greatness of the glory saw by it, the mind descends to an even humbler and simpler state, and it is overwhelmed with awe, under the power of the fate. And thus, by constantly repeating and crossing some kind of godlike circle, the mind ascends through faith, humbleness, and simplicity, to seeing the truth and the shininess of the truth makes the mind to descend to even more humbleness and to become even [417] For us, the ones composed out of soul and body, the simple God has composed Himself with the body.

[418] Maybe the author hints towards 1 John 5: 7-8: "Three are confessing into heavens: the Father, the Word, and the Ghost. And these Three are One. And there are three confessing on earth: the ghost, the water, and the blood". But our author placed instead of the last trinity: the creation, the Scripture, and the Ghost. Couldn't we understand through water the creation, through blood the Scripture, which bear witness to the embodied Christ? Anyway, the creation, the Scripture, and the Ghost compose a unity too. This is because the Scripture cannot be separated from the creation, which it confesses about that it is a gift from God, neither it can the creation be separated from the Scripture which it finds its meaning and purpose into. And both of them cannot be understood and received as witnesses of God, except into the Ghost.

simpler in faith[419]. Ad the mind doesn't cease from waling this road "until there still is said today" (Hebr. 3: 13), contemplating with humbleness, with simplicity, and with faith, through the witness of the creation and of the Scripture, the truth into Ghost, and turning back again from where it has started. Thus, by being day by day deified through grace, and by being illuminated by the above-mind realities, and by living a life full of the joy into Christ, our Lord, the man tastes as an earnest, the rejoicing of the eternal and future good things.

81. The contemplative life is upheld without shortcomings and unstained, through these three: through faith, through the manifest impartation with the holy Ghost, and through the wisdom of the good science[420]. This is for the contemplation is, to say it through a definition, the knowledge about the realities to be understood with the mind in the things submitted to the senses (or the intelligible ones in the sensitive ones), and sometimes also of the intelligible ones (known with the mind) simple, separate from senses; this takes place to the advanced hesychasts. That's why, one needs faith[421]. "This is because, if you don't believer, you won't understand" (Isa. 7: 9). Also, the Ghost is necessary for "the Ghost searches all things, even the depths of God" (1 Cor. 2: 10). That's why, the godlike Job said: "The breaths of the All-Upholder is that teaches me" (Job 33: 4).

The godlike and living work of the Ghost, by igniting the flaming fire within heart, to say so, and by invigorating the heart in an above-world manner, it focuses and in gathers the mind at [419] Through humbleness, the soul ascends in the godlike light, because ethe humble one, by no longer seeing himself, he sees God. But the godlike light makes the mind to become even humbler, in order by this to see even more light. It is a continuous turning into a circle, but in an increasingly higher circle, in a spiral. The humbleness is ever-deeper and the elevation is ever-higher. Or, form the ever-higher ascension it doesn't lack the ever-deeper humbleness, and from the ever-deeper humbleness it doesn't lack the ever-higher ascension. The depth and the height coincide increasingly more, in an increasingly necessary interiority, united with the godlike life.

[420] Here we have a new trinity. The creation and the Scripture are concentrated in one: in science. And the Ghost is presented as ramified in two: in the Self-impartation and in the faith He produces.

[421] The contemplation doesn't stop at the realities submitted to the senses, but it sees through them the realities known with the mind. But these ones, on one hand they are "seen", and on the other hand they aren't felt with the senses. That's why one needs faith in order to recognize them.

Himself, and it impedes the mind from any scattering, by giving to the mind, in addition to serenity and much content and comforting, also godlike love, in order to easily see the godlike realities, and in order to tarry around them, and in order to represent God to itself in a ne mode, as also in order the mind to rejoice of God with a great and difficult to bear love, and with a gladness according to it[422].

But one need wisdom too, as I said before. This is for "the wisdom, sys the Scripture, it illuminated the face of the man" (Eccl. 8: 1). It illuminates it, for the mind easily moves from the senses to understanding, and form the realities submitted to the senses to the understood and godlike views, and the mind sees, through understanding unveiling, the untold realities. It illuminates the mind for the mind unitarily contemplates and sees the above-being God, and for the mind is being imprinted by God. "Blessed is the man, whom you advise, Lord, and through Your law You teach him" (Ps. 93[423]: 12). This is for such a man is truly wise, by reaching through advising at faith, and by learning out of the Ghost's teaching the hidden things of God. The wise man is truly a great thing, for he walks through faith in the union and in the above-nature partaking with the Ghost.

And truly three are the ones who cannot be grabbed and held, as somebody said: God, the angels, and the wise man[424], who is another angel on earth, a supervisor of the seen nature[425]

[422] This is a description of the mode in which the Ghost works within man. The Ghost primarily work within heart, for the heart is the most sensitive organ of the man. The Ghost's work ignites within the heart the love for God. Through the vibrant life, which the heart is awakened at, thus, the work of the Ghost gathers the mind and it united the mind with the heart, or, with itself too (with the Ghost's work). Due to the attraction exercised by this powerful life of the heart, the mind no longer feels itself attracted by the outside things, but it is filled up at its turn, with a joy and with a love for God, that, together with the simplicity and with the limitlessness which the mind gained by getting out of the narrowing of the outside images, they make the mind to see God in a new manner, through a fresh and unmediated feeling.

[423] In KJB we have: Psalm 94: 12. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[424] God, the angel, and the wise man cannot be grabbed and held, for they are free and borderless. They aren't like the objects are, or like the animals are. Only the passionate man can be grabbed and driven with the nose ring, by the cunning ones.

[425] The man is a supervisor of the seen nature, or a conscious seer of the seen nature. There is a seen world only for the man exists, as conscious subject, to see it. But seeing the nature it means knowledge too. This means that the world is rational, and it is a fabric of materialized rationalities, for the man who is the rational subject, in order the man to realize about the

and a mysterious knower of the works, of if somebody wants to say it so, of the uncreated godlike gifts springing out of God; This is for the man impropriates, on all ways, through a total seeing, like the angels, the knowledge about God. So is, to say it shortly, the one who is wise into the Holy Ghost, by faith, and who, as such, is blessed.

Besides, it will be enough to me, the things said to me by Saint Luke in the Gospel – to me, for I reckon that Lord Jesus was free of the creatures' law – in order to represent to myself the power and the praise of the wisdom and of the grace. This is for he wrote that Jesus "was increasing in wisdom, with the age and by grace" (Lk. 2: 52), and again that He "was growing and getting stronger into Ghost" (Lk. 2: 40), being Him full of wisdom. And because I've started writing even more clearly about the things I said before, I am bringing here also what the wise Solomon says towards God: "Who would search for the trace of the one from heavens and who would know Your advice, if You didn't give wisdom and if you didn't send Your Holy Ghost form the high ones" (Wisdom of Solomon 9: 16-19). Do you see to how much power reaches the wisdom when intertwined with the impartation with the Ghost? And, do you see how far from salvation jumps the one who hasn't achieved wisdom and Ghost from God, neither is him guided by one who is wise and partaker to the Ghost?

If about the Savior, Whom the whole fulness of the godhead lives in (Col. 1: 19), things like these ones have been written, it won't be difficult to understand how much wisdom, intertwined with the influence of the Holy Ghost, the whole mankind needs and how much mercy, power, and advancing from the loving of soul God, it has been found worthy of the wiseman into the Ghost, who researches the traces of the realities from heavens and it steps towards the knowledge of The Most Heigh.

So, after telling you so many things about the seer man, it is due now to toil and to partially speak about the seeing too, in order to nourish the cogitation of the one who listens with the whole his heart. This is for God commands to all the ones who speak about Him, they to give out of their abundance also to the ones who lower and those too, to piously be imparted with the higher spiritual gifts of the godlike illumination, in order they to come closer in communion Ghost and without pride, to their fellow humans, and in order they to speak them about the realities known with the mind and about God. Thus, they not only strongly illuminate, in the church of the living God, the straight and non-errant teaching, but also the pious and the all-beautiful face of the love, which is the sign of the Christ's disciples, it ceaselessly shines within our hearts, poured within us through the Holy Ghost, towards the consummate and simple love for God and for the people. Only thus we can live on earth an angelic-like life, a truly happy and all-pleasant life, as ones who are connected through the godlike and deifying love to twofold nature[426], "which all the law and the prophets are upheld by" (Mt. 22: 40) and which nothing is sweeter to the soul like, especially when it has is springing, in an unmediated manner, out of the seeing and the knowledge of God and of the godlike realities, namely of the illuminating grace[427].

So, the one who established as his own purpose, to ascend well and beautifully, at God, in order him to be united with God, and in order him to be consummately be deified through God, or, in other words, to be saved, since without the mind's deification the man cannot be saved, as the speakers about God say, in addition to fulfilling the Lord's commandments, as much as it is possible, let him occupy also with the due contemplation of the creatures and of all the seen realities, in order him not to have a blind doing, namely one separated from contemplation, neither him to have the contemplation without soul, namely without going[428]. That's why, he begins with the wisdom of the rationality and of the mind, and with the holy knowledge of the Scripture, namely with a good start, in order him to look, with a good purpose and with rationality, at the world of the realities submitted to the senses, [426] "Our love is of twofold nature", because of being both godlike, as one poured within us by the Holy Ghost, but it is also human, as one which, our human nature too, it is ignited by.

[427] The love spring out of the knowledge of God, for this knowledge means seeing of His loving face, and not a speculation about Him, from distance. The love for his father, it springs within the child, out of the knowledge, or out of seeing the loving face of his father.

[428] This expression is a parallel to the expression of Saint James: "The faith without deeds is dead" (Jas. 2: 20). The contemplation is the job of the soul's eye of the man. But a man who sees without love, he is a cold, soulless man. That's why he cannot see the full reality. And the love is the fruit of the doing. So, without doing, one cannot reach the true view of God and of the people. Consequently, the ascesis doesn't consist of despising the world, but it consists of understanding the world into God.

as at a shown sign of the Creator, endless in power and in wisdom. So, he meets, as much as it is possible, the endless in power realities and their whole diversity[429], and he secretly delights and nourishes his mind out of the hidden realities. And, as the time passes, by living a life in quietude, and without disturbance, and by cogitating only at the godlike realities, through the meditation of the Scripture and of the seen things, he makes as his own occupation, to spiritually look, as much as possible, at the creation, in dialogue with the Scripture and with the images (symbols), in dialogue with the truth, through a more unitary sight.

When this happens, the mind, with the help of the worshipped Ghost and of His work, the mind is elevated to seeing and to knowing the holy truth, as Great Dionysus says, namely on the second level of the contemplation, to say is generally, at the godlike views and meanings, namely at the ones without cover and without images[430].

By this, the empty mind comes closer to the uncovered intelligible realities (those known through cogitation) and, by mostly occupying itself with the godlike showings, through its cleanness and by tending towards God, in looks in itself, as in a shiny mirror, the supra-sparking rays of the Sun known with the mind.

Nourished, on the way, through grace, again by the good things which the mind is imparted with according to its spiritualization[431], being elevated and more unitarily and more concentratedly penetrating at those many and happy godlike views and impartations, or, from their great diversity at the untold love of the unchanged and hidden One[432]. This is for on [429] Through the world's things, he meets the infinite creator and providential energies of God.

[430] The first level of the contemplation, or of the soul's sight into the Ghost, it consists of seeing the godlike realities in the things' images. The second level consists of looking at the godlike realities in themselves, without t the covers and the images of the things, for those ones have been overwhelmed by the stronger work of the Holy Ghost within mind.

[431] Nourished, grown up, fattened up, and increased by the godlike gifts which the mind is imparted with, the mind steps higher up, on the third level of the sight.

[432] It is constantly affirmed the encounter with the unitary and simple and godlike Person, beyond His multiple manifestations. This is the third and the last level of the contemplation, or of the seeing. This is an encounter with God within love. This is for only between person and person the true love can be ignited. But the person, no matter how seen would that person be, and regardless how many times we would encounter that person, she/he otherwise remains hidden, as a center of the endless depth of all that person's manifestations. And the godlike Person is unchanged in His love, in His quality as unique center of all manifestations, unlike this level, the seer is transformed under the work of the illuminating Ghost Who remembers him and Who keeps in the seer's mind the whole truth, with the whole understanding feeling, in fire and in deifying love, endless, and with the whole heart, and for God. And this is, also according to the Great Dionysus, the deified and unitary impartation with The One Himself, as much as it is possible to the man.

So, the bearer of God - and full of thinking at Him - mind, by flying on these levels of impartation with the threefold hypostatical Unity, in a threefold more happily mode[433], and by seeing itself as wounded with love and ignited in its feeling, the mind gets enthusiastic, and the mind truly gets out of itself, by entering, with the shiny face, the untold (apophatic) mysteries of the theology (of the knowledge about God). And there, the mind abundantly feasts, through unseen embracing, with The One Who is without-beginning, and endless, and non-comprised, and entirely uninterpreted and all-ununderstood. But, in the same time, the mind imagines God, as an endless and borderless ocean of the being that escapes any meaning related to time and nature, according to the mentioned theologian[434].

This is, as Saint Dionysus says too, the feasting of the sight nourishing, in a godlike manner, and deifying every person ascending towards Him, starting with the contemplation and the knowing of the things, as says this holy teacher, where it clarifies the holy symbols of our hierarchy. Abut also the Great Basil says: "After somebody crosses through contemplation beyond the beauty of the seen things, and he presents himself to God Himself Whose view cannot be shown except to the clean

His manifestations which can be seen and which are changes according to the one who needs them.

[433] The One encountered with the mind, He is threefold in Hypostases, and therefore He is full of the love's life. The love becomes His unity, and it also becomes His Trinity. It is a living One, through a borderless love; that's why He is an One threefold in Hypostases. By being imparted with Him, the mind is imparted with this unitary love amongst the Three One and the mind feels, for that reason, a unique and still threefold happiness. This is for the mind if filled up with filial love towards the Father, but also with the union amongst the Three Ones, and between the mind and God into the Holy Ghost.

[434] We have here, again, an enthusiastic description of the seeing of God, which the author originally united in, the abstract exposition belonging to Dionysus the Areopagite, with the fiery feeling described by Saint Simeon the New Theologian. By this, the author is close too, to the sentimentalist description of the Occidental mysticism, but he also keeps the theological consistency of Saint Dionysus the Areopagite, by taking further the Christianization of some Neoplatonic themes, by strongly accentuating the personal character, of better said: the tri-personal character, and therefore of a loving nature, of The One.

hearts, he advances to the higher mysteries of the theology (of the knowledge about God), so that he can become seer". And again, when mentioning about the word of David, who spoke into Ghost: "In the morning I will stay before You and You will see me" (Ps. 5: 3), he says: "When I will stay before You and by contemplating with my mind the realities from around You, I will get closer, then I will receive the seer work through the illumination of the knowledge".

Such things can be heard also from Saint Maximos the Confessor, who shows how much advancing it brings the contemplation and the knowledge of God through Scripture, and through creation, and that from here it comes the enlightening of the knowledge, which the happy deification is produced through. Of course, this is a good thing which rarely and with difficulty it can be found by hesychasts (by the ones who occupy themselves with the self-appeasing), because of the absence of the one who learns out of experience with the help of the grace, as the highest teacher of the appeasement, Saint Isaac the Syrian, says, in the word which he starts speaking about the spiritual feeling and about the seer power[435].

So, Saint Maximos says: "We call as deifying lights the teachings of the saints, as ones seeding the light of the knowledge and which deify the ones who listen to them". He obviously expresses the same idea as Saint Dionysus who says: "All the other deifying light, as many as he has given us as gifts, by following to the words (from Gospels), the hidden teaching of our teachers, at our turn, we secretly teach them to others too". And in another place, he says: "The godlike knowledge, on the ones who impropriate it as much as it is possible to the human beings, it elevates them, according to their powers, and it unifies them according to its own simple unity". And again: "The whole brightness of light, started out of the Father, by coming to us as a good gift, it makes us floating straightly upwards, as a unifying power, and it turns us towards the deifying unity and simplicity of the Father Who gather us up" (Rom. 11: 36). You can notice that the one who becomes simple, by strongly and wisely turning himself towards God, or by godlike work, when he reaches to contemplate God, by being elevated either from things or from Scripture, either from all kind of godlike symbols, he is united with God and he is deified, and even more than that, he is even called as god? "This if for he says - all the ones amongst the understanding and speaking being, who have turned with the whole their power, towards the union with the starting godlike hiding, and they are elevated, as much as they are allowed to, towards its godlike rays, in an untold mode, by imitating God, if we can say so, they will also be found worthy of the same name wit God". Also, the Great Gregory the Theologian, he limpidly says about the human being that is "an animal guided by the godlike oikonomia, in order him to be move elsewhere, and the end of the mystery it is his deification by consenting to God". And Saint Maximos says: "the cogitated image of the godlike Scripture it transforms the knowers, through wisdom, towards deification, through the transfiguration of the Word within them, so that they mirror the glory of the Lord, on their unveiled face: (2 Cor. 3: 18)[436]. This contemplative life needs the three things mentioned before: faith, impartation with the Holy Ghost, and the wisdom of the good-knowledge into Christ Jesus, our Lord.

82. The contemplative (seer) life into the-life-maker Ghost, it mysteriously filles up the seer with many and wonderful views cogitate with the mind (intelligible), which aren't contemplated on the same moment and all at once, not in time and through getting wiser over a long time, according to a rule and gradually. Now you hear the one having such a life, saying that he sees out of the quietude's abundance and out of getting far from all things, except from God: "Differently I am, until I will have passed" (Ps. 140[437]: 10). Some other time, he says that he sees due to his turning with his conscience towards creatures: "How great are Your things, Lord, wisely You have made all of them" (Ps. 103: 24); or: "The fragrance of Your vestments, as a fragrance of rich filed, which You have blessed it, Lord" (Gen. 27: 27). Sometimes, this life, by making the seer to look more intensely, and to ascend height know with the mind (Ps. 83[438]: 3), it persuades him to say: "I walk on the traces of the fragrance of Your chrisms" (Song of Songs 1: 4); or: "I will extoll You, my God, my Emperor, and I will bless Your name for ever and ever" (Ps. 144: 1); or: "Your knowledge has become wonderful to me, it has been strengthened, I won't be able towards it" (Ps. 138[439]: 6). And in another place, he says: "All-Hight are You, Lord, for ever and ever, and Your remembrance is from generation to generation" (Ps. 101: 12). You have been extolled very, above all gods. Namely, it prepares the seers who ascends towards God, for extolling of God, through that sight above-sight. Some other times, it brings the seers to a manifest untold knowledge (apophatic), making them to cry out: "There is no other like You amongst gods, Lord, and there is nothing like Your things" (Ps. 85[440]: 7). And to the ones who spiritually look at the "knowledge's mountain" and "the holy place of God", it shows them where ascend to and where stop at, those "innocent with their hand and clean in heart" (Ps. 23: 40). But not only that, but it gives them to see also ascensions to heavens and descents to depths (abysses), namely the heigh and the deep mysteries. Sometimes the seer stops, wondering, around seeing the face of The One in Trinity. Some other times, he tarries in contemplating Jesus and the oikonomia or the embodiment and in the amazed looking at the mysteries from above-nature which follow out of it.

[436] The man is deified through the transfiguration of Christ within him, namely through the deification of the Christ's human nature, united with the mans' nature and imprinted in the man's nature. Then the man mirrors on his unveiled face the shininess of the Christ's transfigured humanity, that it has become the man's shininess. Then the man has become transparent to the transfigured Christ, or deified in his humanity.

And after all these many and blessed views, the seer who has reached to be illuminated, he is introduced, o, what a grace, in a wonderful mode, also in the themselves bosoms of God, where he finds the true ceasing from all things and the untold resting and the spiritual and above-nature delectation (not to say drunkenness) with the good things from God and with the godlike ecstasy (the godlike getting outside himself) in those more than blessed bosom, which hide in their great depth countless godlike mysteries, which the seer gets satisfyingly close by feeling the supra-being of God[441]. This bosom have been received by Abraham, as inheritance form above, for even God

[441] The term "supra-being" of God, it is used by Dionysus the Areopagite, because the "being", he says, it is a name given to God through the resemblance with the being of the created realities, and it keeps us tight to this way of thinking. This supra-being is beyond any God's coming out of us; it is totally ununderstood. Although, the one who doesn't reach to see into the God's depth of mysteries, he "feels" that supra-being; he feels it as hidden under those depths of mysteries.

Himself had made Himself as part of Abraham, according to the word: "I am the God of Abraham" (Gen. 26: 24). So, God, by being especially the God of Abraham, the God's bosom too, are the Abraham's bosom (Lk. 16: 22). Thus, that one who wants to say that the seer life into the Ghost it elevates somebody into the God's bosom, or into Abraham's bosom, he says that it introduces the seer in the full simplicity and in a more than loving joy, as also that it deifies the seer, it makes the seer happy, and it places the seer into untold satisfaction and delectation. But this will take place only if the seer's mind has been imparted with wisdom and the mind strives as much as it can to look upwards, into Christ Jesus, our Lord.

83. If both the creation and the Scripture have come to existence through the word of God, and, when spiritually looked at, they strengthen the mind and all the mind's powers towards seeing and understanding God, since the heart is spiritually worked and moved, all-wisely Prophet David teaches us, by telling us in a place: "with the word of the Lord are the minds strengthened (which here he calls them as skies) and with the Ghost of His mouth the whole their power" (Ps. 32[442]: 6); and in another place: "full is the earth (cogitated with the mind, or our heart) of God's mercy" (Ps. 32[443]: 5), namely of the power and of the motion well felt and manifest, moved by the Ghost. This is because, before feeling the mind within heart, the power and the motion (of the Ghost), not only that he won't gather strength out of the seer and spiritual research, done on the creation and of the godlike Scripture and out of bringing the rationalities form within them to a sole rationality, but it will also be overwhelmed by a great fear, lest to be lost because of being filled up with hallucinations[444]. That's why, if we want to occupy ourselves

[442] In KJB we have: Psalm 33: 6. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[444] Only when guide by the Ghost of God, united with the Word, the mind isn't filled up with wrong ideas, or with hallucinations regarding their meanings. This is for the Word of God is, in the same time, the true and supreme Rationality. How many heresies appeared by subjectively interpreting the Scripture and how many non-Christian explanation have been given to the world! Like Saint Maximos the Confessor too, the author of the present writing sees, both in creation and in the Scripture, the rationalities and the meanings of the same Word of God, or of the same unique and supreme Rationality. In the world's things and in the deeds and in the Scripture's writings, we are addressed the words of the same Word-Person or hypostatical Rationality; namely our personal rationality, made in the image of the supreme Rationality-Person, it can judge rightly, according to the supreme Rationality, and it can perceive the things with the contemplation of God in the Scripture and creation, in order to unitarily concentrate the many reasons of the things and the many views (of the Scripture) in a sole rationality and in a sole Ghost, and in order to have a sole sight, one unitarily, simple, and imageless, in the limitlessness, infinity, and without beginning-ness, which are open to us within them, let's firstly look for finding the treasury within our heart[445]. And we pray the holy God to fille up our earth (inward) with His mercy. And then, with the whole power which we will have, let's give freedom to our mind, to fly out, as it has been said, towards the unitary, simple, imageless, eternal, endless, and borderless understanding of God, in a view helped by the Word and by the Ghost.

84. When the man will have walked the road of the virtues, in humble thought, patiently, with hope and with faith and with righteous and simple feelings, the life-maker power and work of the Holy Ghost will come within heart, illuminating the soul's powers and moving them and by urging them according to their nature. Then it will attract the mind kept in work, at itself, and it will unite the mind with itself, quickly and in an untold mode, so that the mind and the grace will be totally through and doubtlessly a ghost. Then, the mind helps by the breath of the grace, it comes by itself to seeing, by ending, in an untold mode, its walks and wanders, through the work and the light of the Holy and of-life-maker Ghost[446]. The mind moves itself, then, in and the teachings of the Scripture as real words of the Word-Person, only because the Holy Ghost, as Ghost-Person, He strengthens our character as persons, by strengthening within us the conscience that we are, through creation and Scripture, in a relation with the supreme Person of the Word.

[445] The treasury from within us are the Ghost and the Word of God, received by us at Baptism (see Mark the Ascetic, About Baptism, in The Romanian Philokalia, volume I), but we can find Them by refreshing out dialogue with the Word into the Ghost, through prayer.

[446] The author said before, that the work of the Ghost attracts the mind to Himself. Now he adds that the Ghost's work will unite itself with the mind, insomuch that they become one ghost, and that the mind helped by grace it comes by itself to contemplation. "By itself" it means that the work of the grace which the mind has been united with, it doesn't stop the spontaneous motion of the mind, but it strengthens the mind. But it strengthens the mind towards seeing God. The strengthened spontaneity of the mind it means strengthening the man's character as person. The man's person meets his work, which it has been imprinted in, and which the Ghost's work has strengthened it, with the Ghost Himself. The man impropriates the Ghost's work, and the Ghost make the man's work as His own, so that they work together like some kind of bi-personal unit. The work is one, but theandric, the working unit is one, but bi-personal. Each person and work can interpret the another. Through the human person work the unveiling of the godlike mysteries, known with the mind (intelligible) and it reaches to enter the whole silence and quietude, with a seeing characteristic to its nature[447], in the untold and above-nature realities.

Ad the mind deepens itself all the more in seeing, and it is taken in mastery by God, and the mind is elevated as much as it can towards seeing God, with the science about the godlike realities gathered out of the holy readings, as much as it is abundant in humbleness, in prayer, under the work of the Holy Ghost, into the Holy Ghost. Then the mind isn't stranger either of the work of theologizing (the work of speaking about God), but it immediately reaches at this work and it doesn't endure not to speak about God (to theologize) and even ceaselessly. But without the mentioned heavenly gift and without the Ghost ceaselessly blowing, through a continuous movement, within heart, all the realities seen by the mind, woe, are hallucinations[448]. And all the things the mind says about God, are vain words blown away by the wind, and not awakening as it is due, the feeling of the soul[449]. This if for that feeling stays then only under the influence of the words coming from outside, out of which is born the most dreadful wandering regarding the things cogitate with the mind (intelligible); and itself the peaking about God it is marginal, perishable, and evil. That's speaking about God doesn't stay under the influence of the illuminating Ghost, from Who it comes the unitarily and unchanged truth of the realities cogitated with the mind (intelligible) and that of the speaking about God (of the true theology). This is for that one in whose heart, generally speaking, it isn't, manifestly, the life-maker and illuminating power of the Ghost, and the always the Ghost's Person, but without the man's person ceasing to work. A contrary, the man's person is made even more working, but he works by working, in the same time, the Ghost through the human person, in the human person's work.

[447] It is "a seeing characteristic to it", meaning that the mind needs it, not in the sense that it can do it with its own natural powers.

[448] The Ghost guarantees the objectivity of the mind's seeing, or of the right understanding of the world's rationalities, and of the Scripture, and therefore the right theologizing or speaking about God. This is for He keeps our mind on the line of the right-judgment, by being united with the word, or with the supreme Rationality, and strengthening the seer in his real quality as person. The contemplation is done in silence. But after that, what it has been contemplates it is communicated to other by theologizing or speaking about God.

[449] Only the word of the one whose heart the Ghost breaths within, are full of life, with the conviction that through what it says through them they provide life; that's why only them awaken into the hearer, powerfully and durably, the soul's feeling.

springing or inspiring work of the Ghost, if somebody wants to say so: flowing, it isn't the understanding union, but rather division[450]; neither power nor steadfastness, but rather weakness and fickleness; neither light and seeing the truth, but rather darkness and vain contrivance of hallucinations, and in all ways reckless and wandering path.

For the mind can travel on three plans or on three ways, according to the Holy Fathers: on the nature's way, on the above-nature way, and on the contrary-to-nature way. When the mind sees something cogitated with the mind (intelligible) in a concrete thing, it sees according to the nature, but it sees with the above-nature work of the Ghost; when the mind sees a hypostasis, but not in a concrete thing, it sees an angel or a devil. But if the mind has been partially unified and the Ghost's candle illuminates more strongly, the mind sees in above-nature mode, and, of course, an undeceiving way. And when the mind, by looking at the visible things, it becomes divided and darkened and its life-maker power gets quenched, then the mind sees something contrary-to-nature and that seeing is a deceiving one. That's why, we mustn't stretch our mind towards the spiritual seeing in hypostasis, neither to believe in any sort of views, until the heart isn't influenced and moved by the power of the Holy Ghost – according to the things said before – if we want to have a sane and wise mind.

85. Some people, by working wisely, they attempt to heal the fire of their passions with the heavenly dew of the grace. About these ones it was written: "The dew from You it is healing to us" (Isa. 26: 19). To some other people, the same dew, by being united with an even greater godlike help, that dew becomes manna to them, or some kind of bread, if received as it is due and worthily, with the breaking of the humble heart and with the water of the tears and with the fire of the spiritual knowledge. And thus, it becomes their food, in the image of the heavenly food. About those ones it has been said, for many times, and with a good reason: "The man ate angelic bread" (Ps. 77: 29). But there are also some people whose nature, after it has advanced, it become and it is shown to them, in a higher mode, itself as manna. About these ones the Gospels say: "What is born out of Ghost, Ghost is" (Jn. 3: 6). The first stage is that of the wisemen who occupy themselves with the appeasement (hesychasts). The next one is that of the ones who, in addition to the godlike knowledge, they silently live in ascesis. And the third one (the highest one) it is that of the ones who have become totally simple and they have been transformed by Christ Jesus, our Lord[451].

[450] The one in whose heart there isn't the Ghost, he isn't unified neither in himself, but he is divided, and torn apart. The Holy Ghost unifies, for, by being powerful and by bringing with Himself a new life, it attracts all the soul's powers to Himself.

86. The mind, by escaping – through understanding (intelligible) grace – from pharaoh and from Egypt, and from the toils and troubles from there, namely from the bodily living that raises the passionate waves of the bitter and salty evilness, namely to a living delivered from the Egyptians understood with the mind (intelligible) and, shortly speaking, by suffering in understanding (intelligible) mode all the things which came then upon Jews in a seen mode, and by being delivered from them, it eats through a certain feeling of the soul a manna understood with the mind (intelligible) whose image was being eaten by Israel in a felt mode. And after the beginning of this living, it happens that, as those were craving for the seen meats, the mind to lust for them, at its turn, because of the memory, the sacrifices understood with the mind (intelligible) of the Egyptians, in a dangerous and not less wrong mode[452]. Such a mind that eats manna, it has a spiritual scale and some plates (Lev. 19: 35), which are used by the mind in weighing the food and in order not to gather more than is needed for its daily food, [451] About the three levels of the spiritual ascension the author spoke in the head no. 81. Here they are described a little differently. To the ones form the first level, the grace becomes them a dew healing the fire of the passions. To the ones from the second level, it becomes manna, which, as food, it helps them in their spiritual growth, through the knowledge of the godlike rationalities of the things. This level has two stages. The second stage of it, it is the contemplation of these rationalities in silence. On the third level, the grace fully unites with the man, so that the grace becomes one ghost with the man. The assimilation of the man with the grace it has become complete. It is what has been said also in the head no. 84.

[452] After the mind has been liberated form the passions of the bitter and salty sin (committing sins brings bitterness and the spicy taste, on one hand pleasant, on the other hand unpleasant, of the salt, unlike the delicate, thin taste of the clean life), it still is followed by the memory of the sins, and it feels itself attracted to consent to them, as some sacrifices spiritually brought to the demon-gods, like those of the Egyptians. The Byzantine Holy Father and writers didn't use in order to name these experiences, the term "spiritual", as it is being used in Occident, for they were putting a great accent on the "mind" and on its natural or above-nature contents, namely on the "intelligible" ones, for, actually, from the mind starts the temptation and the sin, or to get far from them.

lest, by exceeding the measure, all of it to get rotten and to be lost, and, in the same time with it, to be lost due to lack of food, also the mind that doesn't keep the measure.

And the mind that eats manna, it is known by the fact that, not eating anything else, it obviously lives a more beautiful life than anything else that eats something else, of course, in an understanding (intelligible) mode. And this is, for the mind it has been somehow changed, through the habituation to that food, in the quality of the manna, to say it so. And the sign of this fact is the lack of any lust for the other foods, which it has been previously lusting for, as also the fact that everywhere it wants to eat only mana and it has become child and it has attached itself to honoring God. Besides, it is not wonder that somebody becomes what he continuously eats and bears within himself for a long time.

So, neither the mind's transformation through habituation, in the quality of the manna, it isn't something unnatural. This is for it is very natural that a continuous and unchanged food to transform the ones whom it nourishes, in itself. Thus, the mind not only that it has achieved the level of an angel, but it becomes partaker to the godlike adoption, by being righteously moved from a spiritual glory to other spiritual glory, and not only by looking at The One, but by itself becoming One and living and being imparted, in an above0world manner, with Him. For, to say so, by being imparted with untold mysteries in a godlike manner, and with love for God into the Holy Ghost, it consummately become like the seen and extolled realities, so that it sees itself too, as transformed through habituation in the manna's characteristic. This level is much higher and much more honored than that one of the one who knows himself as eating manna, but he hasn't been transformed, by habituation, in a feature of the manna. The mind experiences the first state at the beginning, when it gathers in itself, in a unity thought with the mind. And the second is the clear showing of a more manifest union, of the unveiling of some mysteries of the knowledge and of the detachment from all things and of that understanding above-simplicity.

87. The mind is simple by nature, for also That One Whose image the mind is, He likes to work simply[453]. And by being so, it likes to work in a simple mode[454]. This is for everybody likes what it fits him by nature. But the mind becomes also diverse, but not because of itself, but because of the senses and of the things submitted to the senses. But when the mind places its rationality between itself and the senses and the things submitted to senses, and the mind weighs in and judges skillfully, without making the senses blunter than necessary, and without covering or despising the beauties of the things easily submitted to senses, or to praise those in a low manner, and, therefore, without carelessly obeying the mind's authority to them, but by wisely giving to each one of them what is due, then the mind immediately becomes unitary and simple, being restored in its nature[455]. By getting far from the divided realities, the mind starts again loving The simple One, and working unitarily and simple. And by loving That One, the mind searches for Him and by searching for Him, the mind flies above anything that is composed, until the mind finds The One Who actually is One and simple, and Who is God. And reached here, now the mind stays covered only with His wings, now the mind floats into the skies, being delighted as it appropriate to be delighted the mind guarded and borne by God.

88. The thick mist placed by passions over the foreseeing power of the soul, it makes the soul seeing other realities than The One Who is. But, when through the often prayer, by [453] The mind is simple by nature. Only when attached to the surface of the limited things, or to the limited surface of the thins, an attachment contrary to its aspiration, it makes the mind diverse, namely it makes the mind to be divided amongst the images which occupy the mind, or to pass from a limited image to another. Besides, itself the need felt by the mind, for making associations between things, it shows the mind's tendency towards unity, towards simplicity, and towards removal of the limits. The mind is simple by nature, namely borderless, and capable of comprising all things, for it is the image of God Who is simple by excellence, as borderless and all-comprising through Himself. About the simplicity of the mind and about the mind's sinking into the depth of the godlike light, or into the supra-luminous darkness of God, Saint Simeon the New Theologian spoke in details (in Heads II, 14, 16, 17, 18, in The Romanian Philokalia, volume IV).

[454] The mind likes working simply, namely to comprise everything in a borderless mode, to enter the relation with The simple One, in Who are comprised all the realities in an undifferentiated mode.

[455] Here is specified that the mind is restored in its borderless simplicity not by despising the sensitive things, but by discovering the unitary beauty within all things, by exceeding what separated them.

fulfilling the commandments and by being elevated to see God, the mind removes from itself, with the help of the grace, the thick mist which we mentioned about, and the mind limpidly sees that is sees God[456], not needing any interpreter for that, as somebody won't need a teacher in order to see with the senses, if he doesn't have placed on the apple of the eye something that hinders the sight. This is for, like the things submitted to the senses are connected with the senses, when the senses are healthy, likewise are the realities cogitated with the mind, they are familiar with the understandings when those ones are cleaned of the slag of the passions, and like through the perceiving with the senses it is born the knowledge of the things submitted to the senses, likewise out of the understanding look it is born the seeing of the realities cogitated with the mind. And after it, it follows the imageless, borderless, and simple contemplation of God, which, by keeping the mind under its mastery, it makes the mind free of all things submitted to the senses and known with the mind (intelligible), by locking it up in the depth of the endless, non-comprised, and borderless[457], and the mind will be overwhelmed with awe, as one cannot express through words.

89. O, Master, the One Who are the beginning and the upholder of all seen and unseen realities; The One Who has as beginning the lack of beginning, You the Uncreated One; You have a border the limitlessness, You the Non-Comprised One; You Who are as being, above-being, You the Uncreated One; and You Who have as image, the lack of image, You the Unseen One; and You Who have as characteristic the eternity, You the Incorruptible One; You who have as countenance, the lack of countenance, You Who are without trace[458]; as place, You are [456] "The mind sees that it sees God". The mind is aware of the fact that it sees God. The simple sight is had by animals too. But the man is aware of seeing. God cannot be seen but in a conscious mode. God awakens and strengthens the man's conscience of being in front of Him. Like God, by not creating the man as an object, He make the man free through His freedom, likewise He makes the man conscious, through His conscience.

[457] "The locking up of the mind" into the infinite's depth, it is an improper term, forcedly used, because of the absence of a better term. In infinity and in limitlessness, the mind it at large. But the mind still is locked up within these, so that it cannot get out, so that the mind no longer feels the pleasure for getting out in narrowness. Somebody is locked up in the freedom from outside, so that he no longer can "get out" of it, in the narrow prison cell.

[458] The One Who doesn't' have any countenance, he doesn't leave any traces, so that one couldn't tell where He was, or where He is.

what one cannot go around, You the Uncircumscribed One; as content, You are what is non-comprisable, you the Non-Comprised One, You the Unsearched One; as knowledge and sight, You are the Unknown and the Unsee, You the Unapproachable and Ununderstood One; as work, You are what one cannot tell, You the Untold One[459]; as interpretation, You are what cannot be interpreted, You the Uninterpretable One; as understand You are, the non-understanding, You the Ununderstood One; and in all aspects, as affirmation, the You are the above all negation, You Who are above God[460]. You Wholly are wonder, quietude, courage, love, sweetness, satisfaction, and safety in all aspect, and lack of worries, and joys, You Who are the only glory, kingdom, wisdom, and hypostatized power[461]. That's why You cause the kidnapping out of all the seen realities, and the stopping from all the thought realities in an untold manner[462]. That's why, in You, You the Untold God, there is the wonderful resting or the ones who look through the impartation with the Holy Ghost.

90. "The Godhead, wondering us, it is by this also ever more desired. And by being desired, it cleans us up", says

[459] God is Word that cannot be fully expressed in words, as, by keeping the proportions, the human person too, he is word that cannot be exactly expressed, a fact that forces us to use countless words in order to describe the human person, but it always remains totally insufficient. God is the speaking Word-Person Who reveals Himself through words, but it couldn't have been exhausted in His intelligible manifestations and words, even if He had used the infinitely, as the case is, again by keeping the proportions, also with the human person.

[460] "Above God". This term is again taken from Dionysus the Areopagite, in order to show that God is above what we reckon and call as God. Besides, all the names we use to call God, they must, on the other hand, be denied, because God is above what those names usually express, because of being those names borrowed from creatures; or, we must place before them the attributes: 'supra" or "above". This is for one doesn't deny God His kindness, His infinity, His being, because He would have missed them, but for He has them not only in a potentiated mode, but even in a mode transcendent to the move which the creatures have them in.

[461] All the features of God are hypostatized, or they have their support in a hypostasis, in a supreme subject, in a Person. Nothing out of the thought things, they do not exist by themselves, but in a hypostasis. Only the hypostasis is real by itself. The features and the works have their reality only in hypostasis.

[462] In the Person or in the supreme communion of Persons, there is the only resting of the thinking, for only that Person or supreme communion of Persons satisfied the thinking, and it makes the mind thinking as the infinity thought by it. The mind isn't satisfied in its thinking with anything that isn't a person, because nothing is explainable except having as support a person. But into a person the human subject finds not only the resting of the thinking, in the same time continuously nourished by that person, but also the resting of the thirst for love, always unsatisfied that person.

Gregory the Theologian[463]. "And by cleaning up on the ones who desire the godhead, the godhead deifies them too. And with the ones who have reached to be like this, God speaks to them as to his familiars". But not only God ones this, but also the ones cleaned up thus, they are dialogue with the godlike realities and with God, into Ghost and truth, as they would dialogue with the ones whom they are familiar with. That's why, also the theologian continues: "This is for God unites Himself with Gods and He makes Himself know to them". Can you see the wonder of the union? This is for he says: "God unites Himself with gods". Actually, if the union is done amongst the ones who feel the same, it is obvious that also their feelings and their joys are the same. That's we he also says that "he makes himself known to them". This is for the ones who has been deified and who has reached to be gods by grace, they live with the godlike realities and with God as with their familiars, and they know those realities as they contemplate God, in a similar mode, the ones who have reached in the godlike image and gods, and He talks to them and He unites Himself with them, and the speaks and he unites himself with them, according to the said things. That's why, the great Gregory adds, not purposelessly, but in order to be known, that: "As much is known God by the clean ones and by these gods, as they are known, similarly, by The One Who is God by nature, the ones who are gods by work"[464].

And you can imagine how much, if you reckon as it is due. The ones whoa re elevated are very happy, as it is due, towards the views of the contemplations of God, with the whole power of their soul, and with spiritual skillfulness. When you see them overwhelmed by the limitlessness of God, due to the non-beginning, of the impenetrability, of the infinity, of the eternity, and of the infinity from around Him, totally amazed by the wonder above any wonder, of God. Due to this reason, their soul remains attached to the love "for God" (Ps. 62[465]: 8) and they are [463] On the one who desire Him, God cleans them up of their attachment to the inferior things, for He attracts them towards Himself and He keeps them attached to Him.

[464] The ones who have reached gods by grace, they know God, as much God knows them. This is for God dwells with His power within them, as much as He knows them; so, God empowers them in knowing Him, as much he dwells within them, by the fact that he knows them. They know God as people, buy to the extent of their quality as participants to God, because neither God knows them otherwise except in their quality as participants to Him. But who can understand the height of his level as participant to God, namely the greatness of being him known by God and of being God known by him?

engulfed by an unbearable longing for contemplating the godlike face and its extolled beauty, being they melted by the happiness of experiencing it. And so, they are cleaned up and deified under the godlike work, and they become the image of God and gods and they are united into knowledge with God.

And God, by making Himself known to the ones who are godlike out of abundance, consequently to the above-nature gift and to their deification, and to their godlike union, He wonderfully kidnaps with His beauty above-beauty, the whole understanding feeling and the whole their desire, so that he keeps them charmed around Him, as some other angels, who sing in an unretained impulse, like it is due: "God stood in the assembly of the gods and in the middle He will chose the gods" (Ps. 81: 1); and: "The God of the gods, the Lord spoke and he called the earth (namely the earthers), form the sunrises to sunsets" (Ps. 49: 1); and "The chieftains of the people gathered in the same place with the God of Abraham" (Ps. 46: 9); and the stood around God as there stay the "Seraphs around Him" (Isa. 6: 2), receiving the godlike illuminations of the above-world mysteries and by keeping themselves undetached from God Who is endlessly above all realities. If, therefore, the clean in their heart, are happy, according to the Lord's saying, for "they will see God" (Mt. 5: 8), how won't be happy the seers, who are cleaned up through the awe engulfing them out of knowing God, being they elevated, by spiritually advancing, on the level of God? Therefore, the ones wanting the happiness, they must experience the deification and thus to stay motionless as some Cherubs around God and to maintain, with the whole zeal, the contemplation, the knowing, and the doing, into Christ Jesus, our Lord.

91. I would want to see You as better as I can, and then to extoll You, You the life-Maker, the life of the ones who see You, Lord my God. But wanting, I do not know hos to worthily speak about You; I truly do not understand and I get entangled. O, how characteristic You are to the mind, You Master, Maker, and All-Wise. Only by seeing You, the mind enjoys its peace and its own resting. This is for the mind desires You by nature, and it tries to be delivered from the scattering into the external and seen things, for, being at peace from their part, to cogitate at itself and, especially to understand and to penetrate, with natural nimbleness, the heigh realities, and through its consummate lack of matter, to attach itself to the stronger realities. Through the natural rationality, the mind tends towards what is place above all realities, the mind tends by itself towards what is placed above all realities and it is above everything that is submitted to senses.

So, it is proven that, being the mind helped as it is due, by the Holy Ghost, shown in faith, and being elevated, or better said by being attracted, for being a mind, towards the thought (intelligible) realities from around You, as by some relatives, it desires much to see You, with the whole zeal of the soul. This is for the mind experiences these wonderful and happy things according to its nature. This is because, by it nature, as one that is understanding, the mind is winged and quicker that all creatures, and the though (intelligible) realities are, naturally, desired by it; the mind needs to cogitate and to understand them, like the creatures dressed up in senses need the realities submitted to the senses, in order to eat them. This is for, to me, cogitating and understanding, it is the same thing like eating is to the creatures submitted to senses. This is for, like the min actually lives, it grows up, it rejoices, and it is delighted by understanding, likewise the creatures dressed up in senses have these by eating. And the mind experiences these by the fact that it works, and that overwhelmingly means that the mind understands; and this happens especially when, through Your spiritual kindness, the mind has reached in an untold manner, within You, the mind's desire being united with the charm of Your glory. This is for, the one desiring something, what will he taste when he will be imparted with what it attracts him, especially if that something is like You are, and if through Your oikonomia, his desire is directed towards something so great as You are? This is for You, Lord, You the all-wise, almighty, all-good Emperor, by building the mind up as a understanding being, You have made it so that to easily be gladdened of Your things, according to its nature, and to be imparted, in an untold manner and with deep awe, with Your godlike love and to love You with an insane pleasure and with a drunk enthusiasm.

So, the mind, by being built to overwhelmingly love the beauty and the kindness, and by naturally loving all of these, it has, by the godlike Providence, the desire to always understand the high realities and to lust for the realities ahead, and to rejoice, in advance, of the best of them. And with this You show Yourself to the mind, in an all-wise mode as such, and You kidnap the mind, by making the mind to be attracted by the love for seeing You and to get out from all realities with the whole feeling of the soul, in order the mind to remain only with You. This is for You not only show Yourself as diverse, You the all-sweet, neither only simple, nor only non-comprised, neither only fearful, nor only gentle, but now like this, and then like that, so that, thus, the motion and the changing of the mind, by passing from here to there, not to have any reason for deviating towards something from amongst the realities which are outside You, because of variety, images, or simplicity, for the desire after what is non-comprised, or for what can be comprised, in order to find something scary or something gentle[466].

By and large, You, by being the One Good and Beautiful, in a comprising mode, and the above-nature beginning, which gives the tasting of all good things and beauties, the mind cannot contemplate, and live, and it cannot fully delight itself except in You. This is for You have all realities in Yourself, in Your quality as their Cause, and You are above all realities, as the Builder, of countless times countlessly above-beauty. Thus, by being One according to being, God, you make Yourself seen diversely according to the works, for their multitude, and great for their size.

So, even if You let Yourself to be comprised by some people, again You appear them as wonderful and overwhelming. This is for, by being totally non-comprised according to Your being, You aren't fully comprised either according to the work or according to the power. This is because, who has found out the measure of Your power? And Your wisdom, who has known it? And the ocean of Your kindness, who has researched it? And, finally, who has understood all the way up to the end, something of Your realities? Although, on the other hand, after all of these, You let Yourself to be comprised, in another mode.

Actually, the mind, by starting the contemplation from the understood (intelligible) realities form the seen things, later it ascends to the realities which are one and un-comprised around You, You the Savior. Then, by being attracted by the sweet and full charm of what it contains and by being driven by its love for beauty and for good, it hurries with the whole its zeal and it [466] Although is simple in Himself, God shows Himself to the mind as being diverse, for this is, before reaching at Him, loving the diversity. Through the diverse realities, God leads the mind towards Him as The One. Bu in Him as One, the mind finds all the realities.

craves for ascending, as much as it is possible, even beyond this. But because of not being able to reach further, by cogitating, through resemblance, at what escapes it, without any doubt, as at something that is above all realities, it is comprised by a great love and it insanely gets drunk of You and fiery longings are ignited within soul, and it makes by what it can comprise out of You, a fuel that nourishes the fire of the godlike love, for what it doesn't comprise, and making out of non-understanding, victuals of an even greater love[467].

This is for, what can be comprised around You, You the All-Wise, it doesn't charm the mind more than is ignited by what escapes the understanding and it is unreachable by the knowledge. This is for, this upholds the awe and it urges to a special desiring. I may add here, that this urges also to a searching not for what You are according to Your being, because this isn't to nobody and by any means possible to find out, but of the infinity of the power and of the existential work and usually contemplated and theologized around You, which are, as it was said, endless because of their seize and ununderstood due to their multitude. This is for in those, which are around You, though one cannot reach their end, for they are endless, but to the one who comes closer to You through cleanness and who focuses his sight on Your beauty, it is possible to him to reach more limpid and more luminous views, and to be deified to the extent of those views. That's why you ignite with the ray of the love, the mind that perseveres next to You, as much as it is possible to the human mind, by illuminating that mind more and more and by introducing that mind to impenetrable and mysterious and above-skies views. O, all-praised Monad (Unit) and all-worshipped Trinity, and impenetrable depth of power and wisdom! How, out of this love, as from a flight departure place, as from a race starting line, You bring into the all-godlike darkness from around You, the mind that has been cleaned as it is due, by moving that mind from glory to glory, eve if that mind often stays within the above-light darkness[468]? I do not know, as [467] The love is a wound for it makes the being to suffer due to the desire of being healed by encountering the beloved One, by fulfilling His will. And it is fire, in the same time, because also the fire wants to be quenched by that encounter. The love is a wound produced by fire, or accompanied by fire, for it is accompanied by the temperature that searches for to be appeased.

[468] Saint Simeon the New Theologian says, in Heads II, no. 18: "The always moving mind reaches motionless when covered under the godlike darkness and light". The term "supra-luminous darkness", as we've seen, it comes from Dionysus the Areopagite.

You know: do You introduce the mind into the darkness which Moses was introduced within, or it is that one the image of this one, or this one is the image of that one? If this is a darkness cogitated with the mind (intelligible)[469] and that within that darkness are committed in a godlike, above-nature, and untold mode, in the mysterious hiding of the soul, the mysteries of the union and of the spiritual love, this is very well known by the ones who are guided by the torch of the illuminating Ghost.

92. Who, by seeing You, Lord, Holy Trinity, he doesn't rejoice of The One Who is the Emperor and the ceaseless Master sand the Giver of all good, and the blessed source of all good? And who could rejoice with a true joy, before seeing Your all-upholding mastery? Of course, nobody and in no way! That's why, truly happy are the ones who are clean in their heart, for those ones will see You with the eye of their soul, for You are, to them, the most exquisite spiritual joy. They rejoice with much gladness and satisfaction, and they are being filled up with overwhelming love, even if they often fight against bodily narrowing and they suffer the devilish inrushing. This is for the spiritual light of Your beauty, Lord, it is endlessly endless above any closeness of the worldly sadness, to the one who is illuminated by grace. That's why You walk before them, wholly, like a sweetness; You wholly are a lust to them, a holy desire and an untold love. That's why, the ones who see you through a certain understanding, You wound them with the above-nature and unbearable arrows of Your love. And, that's why, they run "after You tracing the fragrance of Your chrisms" (Song of Songs 2: 5; 1: 4), with a strong and tireless straining, for You made Yourself seen to their souls, You the untold God, and their souls ceaselessly try to attracts You within themselves, for they are conquered and melted down wonderfully, due to their longing for You. That's why, they keep You in their minds without forgetting about You, for they depend on Your above-nature beauty. Better said, You ceaselessly and spiritually are mastering their hearts, day and night, and the sleep left their eyelids; and the sweetness... ... Even while their eyelids are asleep, "their heart takes vigil" (Son of Songs 5: 2) getting gladdened, as the Prophet says: "in their bedsheets" (Ps. 149: 5); And they watch and they are equally mastered and they do not know what to do; they do not understand and they get out of themselves, due to the untold shininess of Your face, and due to the infinity of the glory of Your holiness, and due to Your ascensions which order by themselves, and due to Your mysterious unveilings, and due to Your hidden, untold, all-beautiful, and all-good gifts which are around You, Father… Uphold, Lord, the ones who dwell into righteousness, together with Your face (Ps. 139[470]: 13).

50. But not only at the mentioned Holy Fathers one can find mysteriously the words of the sanctified and deifying prayer into the Ghost, but also to the coryphées of the apostles themselves: Peter, Paul, and John.

Not only at the mentioned God loving Fathers and at their descendants one can find secretly mentioned these words of the sanctified prayer, but, before them, one can find them also at the first Apostles and coryphées, namely at: Peter, Paul, and John. One of them says, as we have said before: "Nobody can say «Lord Jesus" but into the Holy Ghost» (1 Cor. 12: 3). And another: "The grace and the truth have been made through Jesus Christ" (Jn. 1: 17); and: "Every ghost who confesses Jesus Christ come into body, he is from God" (1 Jn. 4: 2). And the chief of the disciples into Christ, the question the Savior and the Teacher addressed it to the Apostles: "Who the people say I am?" he answered by giving the most blessed confession: "You are Christ, the Son of the living God" (Mt. 16: 16). That's why, also the illustrious our teachers who followed them, especially the ones who proceeded on the road of the unmarried, monastic, and quiet life, they considered these words, announced before, here and there, by the three pillars of the Holy Church, given by those as godlike words, on the ground of the unveiling received from the Holy Ghost, and confessed by the three so worthy to be believed disciples, as pillar of the prayer, and they gave to their followers to keep this one and to guard it in the same way they did. "For through three witnesses will stand every word" (Mt. 18: 19). These heavenly thinkers united these words and articulated them, in a consummate manner, through the Holy Ghost, Who was dwelling within them. Look, actually, at their totally special order and connection, having in it imprinted the wisdom from above. This is for one says: "Lord Jesus", another says: "Jesus Christ" and the third says: "Christ, the Son of God". In this way, one follows to the others, and all the three ones connect to one another, directly, through the together-speaking and through the connection of these deifying words. This is for you can see the word of each of them connecting with the end of the preceding word it has as beginning, and thus they advance to the third one.

You can see the same thing related the adding concerning the Holy Ghost. This is for the blessed Paul says that nobody can say "Lord Jesus" but only into the Holy Ghost, and this One, the Holy Ghost, standing at the end, he is used by John - the thunder voice, as beginning, by saying: "The Ghost Who confesses Jesus Christ come into body, he is from God" (1 Jn. 4: 2).

And they said these things one after another, not from themselves, but by being moved by the hand of the Most Holy Ghost. This is for the confession of the godlike Peter was made through unveiling into the Holy Ghost. "This is for all things, he says, are worked by one and the same Ghost, sharing differently to each one, as He wishes" (1 Cor. 12: 11).

And thus, the threefold and impossible to undone rope (Eccl. 4: 20) of the deifying prayer, woven and knitted with great wisdom and skillfulness, it passes also to the ones from our times, being preserved intact. The Godlike Fathers, after they connected the word "have mercy on me" to these deliverer words of the prayer, namely to "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God", especially for the younger ones or beginners and not-consummate into virtue. This is for the advanced and consummate ones into Christ are satiated by uttering and thinking at each of these words, namely with "Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God", and sometimes even by only uttering the name "Jesus", which he imprint it within themselves and they embrace it with the whole working of the prayer, being filled up, by this name, with an untold pleasure and joyfulness, which overwhelm the whole mind, the whole sight, and the whole hearing. And thus, being threefold blessed, by reaching outside their body and outside world, they close their senses by the godlike gift and by the grace and, being conquered by love like by a happy drunkenness, they are being cleaned up, they are being illuminated, and they are being consummated[471], as ones who are mirroring, since now, in an not-understood manner, as an earnest, the grace from above nature, without beginning, and uncreated, of the Godhead from above being[472].

They are satiated with solely remembering and cogitating each of the shown names of the God-Man Word and through it they are made worthy to be elevated to kidnappings, to knowledge, and to untold unveilings into the Ghost[473]. The clear assurance and the doubtless entrusting of those it has been given to us in a luminous manner, by the most sweet and loving of soul, our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, Whose words are deeds[474] and their utterance is, according to Himself, Ghost and life (Jn. 6: 63)[475], when he said: "Without me you cannot do anything" (Jn. 15: 5) and : "If you ask something in My name, I will do that (Jn. 14:14), and the followings, as they have been taught to us before.

[471] Here are two things to be noticed. First, that the prayer of Jesus can have diverse forms. To the advanced ones it suffices even to ceaselessly repeat the name of Jesus, and even in their thought. Second, that this name alone, being repeated by feeling the love, it can fill up the one who repeats it with an untold, and above mind, pleasure and joyfulness, making him to feel as outside his body, and outside hearing and seeing. Their senses are overwhelmed by the feeling produced by grace. The love for Christ conquer them like as a "drunkenness"(saint Gregory of Nyssa), which cleans them up of any passion for something else than Christ, and it lightens them through the conscience of the presence of Christ and it consummates them, making them to feel nothing else but the clean love for Christ and for people. The ceaselessly repeating of the name of Christ it is reckoned thus, through the love for Christ that it produces, the force of passing through the three main stages of the spiritual ascension, through which ascend even the angelic groups, according to Dionysus the Areopagite (cleaning, illumination, consummation). Repeating the name of Christ is united to a ceaseless ascendant dynamism of the soul.

[472] We are ascertaining here the sure influence of the doctrine of the uncreated grace of Saint Gregory Palamas, in the same time with that of Dionysus the Areopagite.

[473] Each of the names of Jesus opens superior horizons and comprises contents out of which the soul can ascend endlessly. In each of them there is a power of kidnapping to knowledge and unveilings which do not come from man and from the created nature. Each of them is a gate to another and another revelation, hidden into Jesus, a gate opened by the Holy Ghost through the love he awakens within our soul.

[474] The words of Christ are deeds for they produce effects within souls and within the being of the believer. But they produced also the world. Even the man's words, uttered with power and conviction, they are deeds, for the produce new states within the ones who receive them.

[475] His words are "deeds", for they contain powers which produce new states within souls and, through souls within bodies and within the external things. His words are deeds for out of them irradiates Ghost and life, His Ghost and His life. Each of them communicates through words something from Himself, it communicates power and ghost according to the measure of the power and of the ghost and of the will of receiving, belonging to the hearers. This helps us to understand how all the things were made at the beginning by the word of God and how the things are the images of His words.

51. The beginners also can pray sometimes using all the words of the prayer and some other times only a part of it, but ceaselessly and within their heart and let them not to change the words often.

The beginners are allowed to pray sometimes using all the prayer's words, and some other times uttering only a part of the prayer, but within their heart and ceaselessly. This if for according to Saint Diadochus: "The one who always spends his time within his heart, he doubtlessly gets out from the beautiful things of the life. This is for by walking into the Ghost, he cannot know about the body's lusts (Gal. 5: 16). This is for one like this, by doing his walks within the fortified stronghold of the virtues, he has the virtues themselves as guards at the gates if his clean living. That's why, the plots of the devils, against him, they remain ineffectual"[476]. But Saint Isaac writes also: "The one who observes his soul constantly, he enjoys unveiling in his heart. And the one who gathers his sight (the contemplation) within himself, he sees any ascension, and he sees his Master within his heart"[477].

That's why it is not appropriate to always change the words of the prayer, lest, by continuously changing and moving them, the mind gets habituated to the fickleness and to deviations and it becomes more easily to be stolen and fruitless, like the trees always moved and planted somewhere else are.

52. The fruit of the prayer within heart it needs a long time of struggling and forcing. And, simply speaking, every good thing is achieved with much toiling and after a long time.

The ceaseless prayer within heart and the things from beyond heart (from above the heart) cannot be achieved simply, or randomly, or through little and short toiling, even if this happens to some people, totally rarely, and through some untold oikonomia. But, in order to be achieved, it needs a long time, of toiling and bodily and of soul's ascesis and it needs also much and long forcing. This is because according to the part given us from the gift and the grace, of which we hope to be imparted, we must contribute on the measure of our power, also with our ascesis in order to achieve that gift or grace, and to cross through the time necessary to that. And its purpose is, according to the Holy Teachers, to cast the enemy out from the stretches of our heart[478] and to have dwelling in our heart, in a proven manner, Christ. For Saint Isaac says: "The one who wants to see the Lord, he strives to clean up his heart by ceaselessly remembering God. And thus, in the light of His understanding, he will see the Lord permanently"[479].

[476] Ascetic Word 57; G.P. 65, 1167-1212; The Romanian Philokalia, vol. I, p. 356.

[477] Quoted work, Word 43, p. 176. The one who accustoms himself to always observe himself, he surely reaches at increasingly thinner mysteries' unveilings in the folds of his soul and, through them he reaches at seeing the light of the Ghost. This is for the soul is being increasingly seen as not standing by itself and as having clean everything that moves within it, from God. The one who looks only at the external things gets himself haughty. He cannot see the Master of everything. That man thinks at himself as master of the things. He who looks within himself, he no longer gets haughty and that's why he sees the Master of everything. He no longer gets haughty because he realizes how little is him able to master and to contain himself, in the complex movement of his indefinite life.

And Saint Barsanuphios says: "If the work from inside doesn't help, together with God, to the man, the man will vainly toil towards the external things. This is because, the work from within, done with the toiling of the heart, it brings cleanness; and the cleanness brings the true appeasement of the heart[480]; and the quietude bring the humbleness; and the humbleness makes the man the dwelling place of God; and out of this dwelling place the demons are cast out, together with the passions. And the man becomes, thus, the Church of God, full of holiness and full of cleanness and full of grace. Blessed is, therefore, the one who sees god in the internal things of his [478] This is the purpose of the ceaseless uttering of the name Jesus with the cogitation directed towards heart: to cast out the enemy which masters upon the heart's stretches and to make Christ Master upon our heart. Actually, according to Saint Mark the Ascetic and to Diadochus, Christ is in our heart from Baptism, but rather potentially. The enemy stretches through the temptations from outside his influences. By remembering the name of Christ as often as possible we make actual in our heart His virtual presence.

[479] Quoted work, Word 43, p. 177. One cannot separate the between "the light of the mind" and "the light of Christ" seen in the first one. This is because "the light of the mind" isn't but the "light of the understanding" and the true "understanding" projected towards God, Who is the source of everything that can be understood. The "understanding" always has an "object". And the supreme "object" of the understanding, or the source of any content of the understanding, is God. The Person of endless love and thinking, Who is above thinking. This source doesn't become obvious until the cogitation is directed towards the finite things. Until then, the light of the true "understanding" into which one can understand all things, it hasn't appeared within us.

[480] It is to be noticed this deriving of the appeasing from the cleanness of the heart. Only the passions bother and tear apart the man's heart. That's why quietude is only where God is. Only by His power is the man liberated from the unrest for the perishing things, from the passionate passing from one thing to another, or from his passionate preoccupation to have one thing or another.

heart and he pours his supplication, accompanied by crying, before Hid goodness"[481].

And the Pious John the Carpathian he also says: "It takes much ascesis and a long time in prayers, in order to find, in the undisturbed state of the understanding, another sky of the heart, in which Christ dwells, as the Apostle says: «Don't you know that Jesus Christ dwells within you? Except, only, you are not experienced» (2 Cor. 13: 5)[482].

But also the Great John Chrysostom says: "You remain ceaselessly with the name of Lord Jesus, in order your heart to swallow the Lord and the Lord your heart and the two to be one. This thing is not for a day or two, but for a logn time. This is because it takes much struggle and time in order to cast the enemy out and to dwell Christ inside"[483].

But it is enough about these things, so let's turn back to the things we have in front of us.

53. About that prayer of the heart that isn't clean; and how can somebody reach the clean and not-scattered prayer.

By tarrying in the mentioned rule of the clean and not-scattered prayer of the heart, even if, maybe, it is not clean and not-scattered yet, due to the impediment posed by the previous states and thoughts, the one who lives in ascesis reaches at the habituation of praying not-forcedly, in a not-scattered manner, cleanly and truly. Namely, he reaches the habituation that the mind persevere in his heart and he mustn't forcedly introduce his mind in his heart, or, when he doesn't pay attention through respiration his mind doesn't jump out of heart. But his mind always tarries in his heart and he prays thus ceaselessly. This is because Saint Hesychios says: "The one who doesn't have his prayer clean of thought, then he doesn't have a weapon of war. And I call prayer that one that is ceaselessly being in the depths of the heart, for by calling the name of Jesus Christ, the enemy that secretly wages war to us to be whipped and scorched"[484]. And again: "Blessed is the one who has stuck with his cogitation to the prayer of Jesus and he calls upon Him ceaselessly in his

54. About the not-scattered and clean prayer of the heart and about the warmth born out of it.

The clean and not-scattered prayer of the heart is, as I've said before, that one out of which it is born a certain warmth within heart, according to what it has been written: "My heart has become hot within me and within my cogitation a fire will be lit" (Ps. 38: 4)[487]. It is the fire Jesus Christ came to cast is on the lands of our heart which have been before bearer of passions' brambles, and now they are, through grace, bearer of Ghost, as our Lord Jesus Christ said: "Fire I have come to cast on earth and how much I would have wanted it to be lit" (Luke 12: 49). This he did, yore, to Cleophas and to his companion, when he warmed them up and he made them fiery to shout out, while being out of themselves (in ecstasy), one towards another: "It hasn't been our heart burning within us while we were on the way?" (Luke 24: 32).

But also the wonderful John of Damascus says, in a troparion he composed, towards the Most Clean Birth Giver of God: "The fire from my heart pushes me towards singing the virginal love". And Saint Isaac says: "Out of the full of power work is born the unmeasured warmth, which is lit within heart out of the fiery thoughts which are moving into cogitation. This work and guarding, with their warmth, they make the mind [485] Quoted work, II, 49; G.P. 93, 1541 C; The Romanian Philokalia, vol. IV, p. 91. The cogitation no longer has other content except the Prayer of Jesus. But this doesn't mean a narrowing of the cogitation, but a deepening and a broadening of it in the endless ocean of meanings, of light of God penetrated in the humanity of Christ and through that in our thinking and in our life. On the way of this prayer we reach to understand "which is the width and the length and the depths and the height" of "the love of Christ, that one above knowledge, in order to be filled up with the whole kindness of God" (Eph. 3: 18-19).

[486] Quoted place. The countless meanings which fill up the understanding, being meanings which sprout out from Christ the God-Man, they are luminous as he is, and they represent a true unitary light from the endless light.

thinner and give sight to it"[488]. And a little further he says: "And out of this warmth sprout within heart out of the gift of sight, it is born the flowing of the tears"[489]. And after a little while: "And out of the ceaseless tears the soul receives the peace of the thoughts. And out of the peace of the thoughts, he is elevated to the cleanness of the mind. And out of the cleanness of the mind the man comes to the seeing of the mysteries of God"[490]. And again: "after these the mind reaches to see unveilings and signs, as Hezekiah the Prophet saw"[491]. And again: "The tears and the bashing of the own head during the prayer and the nodding due to the warmth, it arouse the warmth of their sweetness within heart. And after the commendable getting out of the self (after ecstasy), the heart flies towards God and shout out: "My soul was thirsty of You, God, the Powerful, and the Living One. When will I come and will I show myself before Your face, Lord?" and the followings (Ps. 41: 2[492])[493]. And Climacus says: "The fire, by dwelling within heart, it has resurrected the prayer. And after the prayer has ascended to heavens, it has been done the descent of the fire in the upper chamber of the soul"[494]. And [488] Quoted work, Word 9, p. 61. The work of ceaselessly calling Jesus and the straining for maintaining it, they have warmth within, for it is maintained by the love for Him. The warmth of this love it makes the cogitation thinner, for it keeps it directed towards the One Who is all-thin in comparison to the thickened things and movements of the world and of the body. The thinness of the mind, full of fiery love for the all-thin One, it makes the mind understanding, and therefore able to receive visions, or capable of having thin intuitions. These visions, at their turn, they give birth to clean warmth, or to fiery thoughts, says Saint Isaac the Syrian in continuation.

[489] Quoted work, quoted place. This warmth, which is one with the fiery feeling of the clean love, it becomes a spring of tears. It must be noticed the full of high quality poetry inspired to the Holy Fathers by this living of the clean love for God.

[490] Quoted work, quoted place. Where are tears, there is peace from the thoughts which wage war to us, for there is no longer frown. But there is also the peace of the thoughts of clean, thin, and fiery love, or total love, for God. This is because the peace is where love is, and, consequently, where is full trust in the loved one. But there is also the compassion overflowing into tears. And where peace and tears are, there is the cleanness of the heart. This is because no hidden thought defiles this love in its ascension towards the loved One. There is full sincerity and transparency. In this cleanness, transcendent to the closed mind, in the thoughts related to the world, the mind can see the mysteries of God, of the all-thin One.

again: "Who is, therefore, the faithful and wise monk who has guarded his warmth unquenched? And who hasn't ceased, until his exit, to add on each day fire to the fire, warmth to warmth, longing to longing, and zeal to zeal?"[495] Saint Elijah the Ecdicius says: "When the soul, resting of all the external things, it will united itself with the prayer, this one enveloping the soul it makes the soul entirely hot, as the fire makes the iron. The soul is the same, but it no longer can be touched by the outside touching, likewise the hot iron cannot be too"[496]. And again: "Blessed is him who was found worthy to show thus in this life, and his stature – being of clay by its nature – he sees it fiery, due to the grace"[497].

55. The warmth too has diverse causes, but the most important one is that born out of the clean prayer.

Know that also such warmth has its cause and existence in many and diverse causes. This thing can be seen in the words told by the saints. This is because it is hard to us to say that it can be seen also out of our experience. The paramount is that warmth born out of the clean prayer of the heart. That one advances and grows up ceaselessly, together with the prayer, and it rests (it ends) in a hypostasis light, namely it makes such believe in Him. Only the fire resurrects the prayer or resurrects the soul through prayer, and it elevates the prayer or the soul in state of prayer, to heavens, or to God, and then it descends again from even higher, in the soul which is elevated in the upper room, making the soul even more fiery when praying, and this fire is communicated out of the prayer of somebody to the prayer of the others. The prayer doesn't take place without the Holy Ghost and the Holy Ghost doesn't descend to the soul and doesn't elevate the soul except through prayer. The prayer is the form of resurrection and of elevating the soul through the Ghost. The prayer is the way the |Ghost works within our soul. This is for through prayer the soul is united with God and the prayer becomes the work of the Holy Ghost, Who becomes a living bridge between soul and God, making the man transparent.

[497] Quoted G.P., The Romanian Philokalia, volume IV, p. 254. The warmth of the one who prays ceaselessly, it is not only a subjective feeling, but a new state of the being, becoming fiery by grace. The human being sees himself burning by the grace from within. This warmth burns away the sins from within and it is being transmitted also to other people. The hands elevated to prayer are seen, in the saints' lives, like flames. There is a fire within the whole being that is felt and somehow, shown. But it is a fire of the clean enthusiasm, and not of the shameful passion. It is a fire of the Ghost that makes the body transparent.

a man, according to the Fathers, to be illuminated in the meaning hypostatized in that clean prayer[498].

56. What the unmediated effect of the heart's warmth is?

This warmth melts down in an unmediated manner everything that impedes the first prayer to become consummately clean prayer. This is for "fire is our God"; namely –"fire that consumes" (Heb. 12: 29) the evilness of the devils and of our passions[499]. This is for, says saint Diadochus: "When the heart receives with some hot pain the devils' arrow shots, - so that the warred one thinks that he receives the arrows themselves – the soul bitterly hates the passions, like one who is at the beginning of the cleaning. This is for, if the soul isn't feeling much pain for the shamefulness of the sin, it won't be able to rejoice plentifully of the kindness of the righteousness. That's why, the one who wants to clean his heart, let him warm his heart up with the remembrance of Jesus Christ, by having only this as ceaseless cogitation and work[500]. This is because the ones who want to reject their own rottenness, it is not appropriate to them to alternate the prayer with pauses, but [498] The hypostatized light it is the light that has Christ as its hypostasis, in the sense that in His hypostasis it has its foundation and its source, crossing through that man who has advanced by ceaseless remembering - and clean of any other thought -, of the name of Jesus until the total union with Christ. By doing so, the man has united himself sp much with Christ, than the light of Christ it has become the light of that man too, for Christ Himself as Hypostasis has become fundamental hypostasis to the man united with Him. The warmth ends into light. Until it reaches there, the soul keeps advancing. There the soul rests in the light of Christ like in His fully communicated love. This is because the soul has everything in that light. The soul rests there like on a holiday. About this warmth wrote also other great spiritual Fathers, but none of them framed it in a development of the spiritual life, as the authors of the present writing and of the following writings did. One can see from here too, that these authors, though they are based only on foreign quotes, they organized these quotes in an own, unitary vision. It can be also mentioned that though about warmth spoke also Saint Gregory of Sinai (but not so insistently), the authors of the present writing didn't mention him either in this regards or in others. One can see that they weren't his direct disciples. They are after Palamas.

[499] The fire of the love of God, lit within us by the Ghost, it consumes any bodily or worldly pleasure and passion, any temptation awakened within us by demons for the limited things, which estrange us from God, making them to fade in their smallness, in comparison to the great beauty of God.

[500] Therefore the main purpose of the ceaseless prayer is to get the heart warmed through the love of Christ, until this warmth ends in light, namely in "seeing" of feeling the presence of Christ, the source of the light, or of the all-comprising personalistic and living meaning of the existence, which in the same time also sustains us forever as persons. When the ceaseless prayer doesn't reach this purpose, but it becomes a monotone formalism, it won't fulfill, generally, its purpose. But in order to achieve this purpose, it must be done with increasing attention and with love for Christ.

they owe to always spend their time in prayer, accompanied with the guarding of the mind, even if they would be outside the places of prayer[501].

This is for the one who wants to purify the gold, if he lets the fire in the oven quench - even for a little while - he makes the slag to become again attached to the cleaned gold, likewise the one who is remembering God and then he stops doing it; what it seems he gained by praying, he lose it by ceasing the prayer. It is characteristic to a man who loves the virtue to melt down - by remembering God - the earthly bark from his heart, for like this, the evilness being slowly melted down by the fire of the remembrance of the Good One, the soul to totally come back to its natural happiness with even more glory"[502]. And thus, the mind, tarrying within heart in an unimpeded manner, it prays clearly and without roving, according to the Saint who says: "The prayer is true and not-roving when the mind guards the heart while praying"[503]. And Saint Hesychius writes: "True monk is that one who keeps the watchfulness; and the one who truly take vigil, he is monk in his heart"[504].

57. About the longing and the love born out of warmth, out of paying attention, and out of prayer.

Out of such warmth and out of the prayer made attentively, or out of the clean prayer, it is born within heart the [501] The rottenness it is a drowsiness leading to decomposition, in which the subject no longer controls his power and tendencies by directing them towards Christ. This rottenness can be overcome only by "guarding the mind" in order not to be stolen by other thoughts. This is a great internal heroism, a great and alive tension.

[502] Quoted work, Head 97: The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. I, pp. 386-387. The evilness attached the heart - or to the living, transparent, and oriented towards the infinite depth of our subject – it is an earthly bark, viscously glued to the pleasures produced to the body by the seen surface of the world. The Good, or the Good One, for the Good has an inexhaustible subject in His generosity, it gives back to our subject, or to our heart, the freedom and the impulse of a advancement in the same clean live communicated to it by the Supreme Subject. And this free and mobile state it is the natural state of the subject. The remembrance of the Good One cannot be done except in the warmth of the love.

[503] This quote is from "The Method of the Sanctified Prayer and Attention", given in Philokalia under the name of Saint Simeon the New Theologian (The Greek Philokalia, tome V, 1963, p. 85: J. Hausherr, La méthode d'Oraison hésychaste, in: "Orientalia Christiana", 1927, IX, 2, p. 363 and the followings). But the authors of the present writing do not mention the name of Simeon as author of the method. If it was his, the authors of the present writing would have mentioned this, given the great personality Saint Simeon the New Theologian was. To be seen on this theme: Pr. D. Stăniloae, Viața și învățăturile Sf. Grigore Palama (The Life and the Teachings of Saint Gregory Palamas), Sibiu, 1938, p. 48 and the followings.

longing and the godlike love for the remembered name of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is for it is written: "The virgins love Me, they attracted Me" (Song. 1: 3-4). And: "I am wounded by love" (Song. 2: 5). But Saint Maximos says also: "All the virtues help the mind to gain the godlike love, but, more than all of them, the clean prayer. This is for through it, flying towards God, it goes out of all things"[505].

58. About the tears from within heart; and, in continuation, about the godlike longing and about love.

Out of such a heart flow many tears, which clean up and thicken the one who has become enrich with them, but they don't dry him out, nor do they wither him. The last thing come out of the fear of God, and the first one comes out of the godlike love, out of the longing and of the powerful and unrestraint love for the remembered Jesus Christ. This is because the heart, by being comprised by enthusiasm, it shouts out: "You have charmed me with Your longing, Christ, and You have changed me with Your godlike love". And: "Whole are You, Savior, sweetness and whole, my longing; whole, the One I cannot have enough of; your holly are, untold beauty". But also the godlike Paul – the herald of Christ - shouts out: "The love of God crushes us" (2 Cor. 5: 14). And: "Who will separate us from the love of Christ? The trouble, or the tribulation, or the persecution, or the nakedness, of the danger, or the sword?" (Rom. 8: 35). And again: "I trust that neither death, nor the life, neither the angels, nor the principalities, neither the masteries, nor the powers, neither the ones from now, nor the future ones, neither the height, nor the depth, neither some other creation cannot separate us from the love of God that into Christ Jesus, our Lord" (Rom. 8: 38-39).

59. Advice to not search for the things above our measure; and continuation to the teaching about the ceaseless remembrance within heart, of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Good is to somebody to be found worthy of these and of all the things coming after these. But it is not the right time now to speak about them. This is because "do not search, he says, before time, the things appropriate to a certain time"; and: "The good is not good when it is done wrong". And according to Saint

[505] Heads about Love, I, 11; G.P. 90, 964 A; The Romanian Philokalia, II, p. 39

Mark: "It is not profitable to know before working the first things, the last things"[506]. This is because "the knowledge makes haughty", for the lack of the deeds; "and the love build up, for it endures all things" (1 Cor. 8: 1). But in order to be found worthy of them, the man must strive and he must always live in ascesis, to always keep, as we have said, the remembrance of Lord Jesus Christ in the deep of his heart and to not let it outside and at surface. This is because the Blessed Mark himself says: "If it is not opened, through the usual and understanding hope, the inner chamber, more hidden and more sincere of our heart, we won't know, surely, the One Who dwells in it and we won't be able to know whether our sacrifices of thoughts have been accepted or not"[507].

60. About the fiery zeal and about the godlike showing within us and about that illumination from the hypostasis of the grace[508].

By doing like this, somebody will easily escape not only the evil deeds, but also the passionate thoughts and the inappropriate hallucinations, as it is written: "Walk with the Ghost and you won't fulfill the lust of the body"(Gal. 5: 16). Even more, this one will go out of every thought and of every hallucination (imagining), by burning and banishing away, through his fiery zeal for virtue, the whole evil doing that have been worked before within him and through his senses and through his mind, together with the devils who have been sustaining that and who have been imprinting the evilness within him. This is for Saint Isaac says: "Fearsome is to the devil and loved is by God and by His angels, the one who uproots with fiery zeal the brambles sprouted out of the enemy's work within him"[509]. He will reach the advanced stage of having within himself the trust (the sure and full feeling) of the love of God for him and of the showing of the hypostatized and most-godlike illumination of the grace[510]. And if you want, you can say that through this he comes back in a glittering manner to the nobility and to the spiritual resurrection worked within us from above, through the grace of the Baptism[511]. But Saint Isaac the Syrian says again: "This is the Jerusalem and the Kingdom of God, hidden within us (Luke 17: 21), according to the word of the Lord; this place is the cloud of the glory of God, which will be entered only by the ones who are clean in their heart, in order to see the face of their Master (Mt. 5: 8). Let him only search, himself, for the showing of God, in order not to receive what is in fact darkness but it pretends to be light (2 Cor. 11: 14)"[512].

61. About the godlike work and about the opposite work.

And when his mind, without searching for, it sees a light, let him not receive that light, neither to remove it. This is for saint Mark says: "There is a work of the grace unknown to the little child; and there is another, of the evilness, which resembles

[510] It appears within him an illumination hypostatized by grace within his person, but which has its natural source, or which is originally hypostatized in Jesus Christ, the Embodied Word of God. The authors of the present writing identify this illumination to the grace of Christ, become felt and intuited. One can notice in this the influence of Saint Simeon the New Theologian and of Saint Gregory Palamas. If the grace is the love of Christ for the one who continuously calls upon Him, we will understand that this openness of Christ, as any loving openness of the person, it is shown as light, for the loved person is light, or love.

[511] The lighting taking place within us it doesn't belong only to the grace but also to us. The light of the grace, or of the love of Christ, by encountering or producing our love of luminous openness, which is done under His work, it becomes together with our lighting only one lighting (illumination). The light of the grace has been dwelling within us from Baptism. Through the fiery zeal of the ceaseless remembrance of Christ we are doing, this light becomes actualized.

[512] Let the man not force the showing of God, for in this case, by losing the feeling of the presence of Christ from Himself, the man produces to himself a hallucination of the light of God, which is in reality the darkness of the demons. The man must pursue only to be cleaned of any passion and of any thought and to increase his love for Christ, by ceaselessly remembering Him. The illumination will come by itself, from Christ. This is a spiritual orientation which is totally different from that of the feminine mystique from occident, which forces for a showing of Christ like bearer of wounds. But one cannot say that the spiritual life, as described by the authors of the analyzed writing, it lacks the love for Christ, the communion with Him, as A. M. Ammann says, quoted work, p. 40. We do not reckon that such a communion comes only out of the juridical conception of the satisfaction Christ brought to God through His sacrifice on the cross. A contrary, only a teaching about the salvation as deification of the man it really values the communion of Christ with the man. This is because the occidental feminine mystique doesn't draw any practical conclusion out of the sentimental communion with Christ, once he has given us something else, through His sacrifice, than the escape from guilt. The communion remains in such a vision a sentimental and superficial matter, without having any effect upon man.

to the truth. But it is good to him to not receive these, because of the fear of the deceit; but let him neither consider them anathema, because he need to fearfully think that they can be true; but let him always run to God with hope, for He knows the benefit of both of them. But let him also ask about these, the one who has grace and power from God to teach and to discern"[513].

62. About the lightened and not-deceiving teacher.

And if he finds the one who can teach him not as he has already known only from the Holy Scripture, but as that one endured in a blessed manner the godlike illumination[514], let him give thanks to God. And if not, it is better not to receive it, but to run to God with humbleness, by reckoning himself, with the whole sincerity of his heart, unworthy, and by declaring himself beneath to such a worthiness and sight. And this and others like this, as many as have been told, we have learnt them with by the grace of Christ, out of the not-liar mouths which spoke to us moved by the Holy Ghost, as also from the inspired by God Scriptures, and out of some experience.

63. About the true lighting and about the liar lighting, or about the godlike light and about the devilish light.

Actually, our famous Fathers show us in some of their writings the signs of the not-deceiving lighting and those ones of the liar lighting. So did for three times the Blessed Paul from Latro[515], saying to his disciple who asked him about this: "The light of the enemy power is in the image of a fire and it smokes

[513] The man doesn't see the glory of God in a totally unmediated manner, but he sees it always through the creature that has become transparent as a cloud through which one can see the light of the sun. Even the body of Christ is such a cloud, transparent in the highest degree (Mt. 17: 5). Otherwise, the man couldn't bear the sight of the glory of God. Through this, the being also becomes beautiful, by actualizing its rich colors, or its complex virtualities, all of them bearing a charming light. This is for Jerusalem isn't monochromatic and therefore monotone and lacking variety (Rev. 21).

[514] This is the light "seen" by the ones who were reaching at the ceaseless practice of the prayer of Jesus within their heart. This light is "suffered" because it is not produced by the man, but received from God. The knowledge of God from the Holy Scripture it is not rejected, but the godlike illumination it differs from that. But, before deciding to receive that light as being true or to reject it, it is good to ask one - who has suffered it at his turn - about it. Otherwise, it is better not to receive it, in order not to be deceived by a false light.

and it is like the fire felt with the senses; and when the temperate and cleaned soul sees it, it is disgusted and abhorred by it. And the good light of the Good One is very pleasant and clean and when it shows up it sanctifies and it fill the soul up with joy and with serenity and it makes it gentle and loving of people". And others say the same. But, as I have heard the things said before, verbally, so you are going to hear about these at the right time. Because now isn't that time.

64. About the indecent imagination and about the decent imagination and about how we must behave to them.

For, a little earlier, we have mentioned about imagination and about the indecent imagination, we reckon that it is most profitable to shortly speak also about that, batter said, as much as it is possible, about imagination in general. This is for this cursed movement it opposes very much the clean prayer of the heart and the unitary and not-deceiving work of the mind. That's why also the godlike Fathers speak on many occasions about it and against it. The Saints from before reckoned it as the mythical Daedalus, as an imagination with many faces and with many heads resembling to hydra, as abridge of the demons. This is because the cursed killers, by crossing on it, they enter in communication with the soul and it mix themselves with the soul, making the soul some sort of wasps hive and like a cave of barren and passionate thoughts[516]. And when you do not want, for the sake of the repentance and of the crying combined with the crushing of the heart and with the humble cogitation, and before this also for the sake of the understanding and of seeing the creatures, and also for the will of comparing the indecent imagination to the decent imagination and of placing the last one on the first place, you bring the last one closer to the first one and thus you powerfully banish away the indecent and shameful one which is like a coward, and you are going to achieve victory upon it. By doing so, not only that it won't cause any loss to you, but it will rather be cause for gaining, for you have led your things with judgment, without mistake, as one who has destroyed the indecent imagination through the decent imagination, and you have mortally wounded your enemies with their own weapons, as yore the godlike David did to Goliath (1 Kings[517] 17: 51)[518].

[516] In the Romanian manuscripts the Greek word "φαντασία" (fantasia) was always translated as "hallucination". We discern today between "hallucination" and "imagination". The first one has rather the meaning of an ill hallucination. But the difference between these two meanings isn't always a full one. Anyway, the meaning of the "imagination" some of our authors reject it, it is not that of a simple idea or new intuition, but is about imagining a concrete situation. This is because they don't always have something tempting in them. But, generally, the one who wants to focus himself on prayer, he must shun himself from any imaginings. This is because they attract the soul to surface and make the soul passing from an imagining to another. They are reckoned by our authors as bridges of the devil through which the devil enters the soul and makes the soul get out of the focusing on the simple thinking about the undivided and the borderless God. If the thinking always presupposes a subject who thinks, so also the thinking the subject of which we do not seem to be, it has as its subject deeper within us, or related to us, an evil ghost, or a demon. He wants even through the seemingly good imaginings to break us off from the prayer. That's why they even the seemingly good imaginings must be rejected in time of prayer. But out authors make an exception in the following considerations, with the good imaginings, for the shown reasons.

65. Not only the indecent imagination but also the decent imagination is rejected by the saints, in the clean prayer and in the simple and unitary work of the mind.

But this is a battle of the ones who still are little children, or beginners[519]. This is because the ones who advances in time, they reject and totally banish away the indecent imagination together with the decent one, transforming it and melting it down to ashes, as the wax melted by the face of the fire (Ps. 67: 2)[520], through the clean prayer and through the unveiling and undressing the mind of all the images, due to its surrender, in simple state, to God, or, if you wish, due to receiving Him and to simply and imageless uniting with Him. This is for Saint Hesychios says: "Every thought is the imagining in the mind, of a thing submitted to the senses[521]. This is because the Assyrian

[517] In KJB we have 1 Samuel.

[518] This is a remarkable proving of the value of the good imaginings in order to destroy the evil imaginings, to the ones who haven't reach yet the stage of the ceaseless prayer "of a sole thought". But they are used also by the consummate ones in order to communicate their imageless experiences to the not-consummate ones. And even the Prophets use the good imaginings in order to share other their revelations. That's why the revelation also uses images, and the Holy Scripture and the cult are full of images.

[519] It is about combating the indecent imaginings through the decent imaginings, as described in the previous head.

[520] KJB: Ps. 68: 2: "As smoke is driven away, so drive them away: as wax melteth before the fire, so let the wicked perish at the presence of God."; ROB: 67: 2: "Like the fire is quenched, let them be quenched; as the wax is melted by the face of the fire, so let the sinners perish from the face of God,"

[521] It is impossible to the mind to think at a thing submitted to the senses, without having some image of it. But God is above any image, and therefore also above the faculty that gathers in itself the images of the things, or produces other images resembling to them (the imaginative faculty).

(the devil), being himself mind, he cannot deceive us except by using the things sensitive and usual to us"[522]. And Diadochus says: "Because any thought enters the heart by imagining some things submitted to the senses, the happy light of the godlike will shine to it when he will rest himself of everything and he will leave any form coming out of these. This is because the shininess of that one it shows itself to the clean mind, when the mind will empty itself of all thoughts"[523].

But also the Great Basil says: "Like the Lord does not inhabit temples made by hand (Acts 7: 48), likewise he doesn't inhabit thought shapes and imaginings. These ones have been placed like some walls around the defiled soul, because this soul cannot watch the truth in a clean manner, but this soul still is under the mastery of mirror and of the riddle"(1 Cor. 13: 12)[524]. And the godlike Evagrius says: "They say God dwells where he is known. That's why the clean mind is also called as throne of God. Therefore, God won't show His meaning in the meanings imprinted in those mind like images. That is why, the one who prays they must totally separate themselves from the meanings imprinted in the mind like some images. And thus the mind will be imprinted by seeing (contemplating) a mind and by seeing that mind's rationality. From here we find out that the spiritual knowledge detaches the mind from the meanings imprinted in the mind as some images. And the mind, getting accustomed to be free of images (shapeless), it presents thus to God"[525].

[522] About Watchfulness and Virtue II, 78, G.P. 93, 1537 C; The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. IV, p. 87. The "Assyrian", or the enemy which besieges our soul, though he is mind, he can penetrate our soul only through the images of the sensitive things; he stirs up our senses towards the pleasure of uniting with those images. The symbol is taken from the history of the Jerusalem's besiege by Assyrians in the time of King Hezekiah.

[523] It is not about Diadochus, but it still is about Hesychios, quoted work, I, 87; G.P. 93, 1508 A-B; The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. IV, p. 63. It is necessary that the mind to be emptied of any limited thoughts, in order to be united with the limitless One.

[524] The defiled soul, as a soul tied with some pleasure to the images of the things, that soul hasn't reached yet his natural transparency for God, the totally immaterial Spirit. Between that soul and God the things still stay as mirrors and riddles, or approximate resemblances; that soul hasn't discovered himself yet as a fully transparent mirror and therefore fully adequate for God, namely that soul hasn't fully discovered yet his clean spirituality. That soul hasn't discovered yet his indefinite, in which the infinite of the Godhead it can be felt.

[525] This is from Nilus the Ascetic, About the Evil Thoughts; G.P. 79, col. 1228. But it probably belongs to Evagrius. It is translated in The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. I, pp. 48-70. But I haven't found the place with the exact formulation from the text above. The idea is that the mind receives from any thought a limited form, according to the respective thought. This is an idea from the old Greek philosophy. Therefore, in order to have the feeling of the limitless

At his turn, Saint Maximos says in his "Scholia" to the Great Dionysius: "something else is the imagination and something else is the understanding, or the meaning. This is because out of other powers emerge these and they are different to each other by the quality of the movement. The understanding is working and doing; the imagination is suffering and imagining announcing a thing submitted to the senses or something resembling to a thing submitted to the senses[526]. The senses receive the thing in a mixed manner. And the mind perceives the things in another manner and not like the senses do. To the bodily side or to the spiritual side depends[527], as I have said before, the suffering and shaping movement[528]. And the discerning work and the perceiving work, or of understanding work, they depend on the soul and on the mind. To this work of perceiving it is submitted the imagination (the work of imagining)[529].

At its turn, the work of the imagination has three subdivisions: the first one is that giving icons to the perceptions, icons corresponding to the things perceive by the senses; the second on is that giving, to what remains after perceiving, images which do not lean on the icons bases on something real - this is called as imagination in a proper sense; the third one in that through which is born every pleasure for what it seems to God, the mind must liberate itself from the limitation the images of the limited things give it to the mind. Only thus the mind can present itself to God as being available for Him to imprinting Himself into mind. Saint Gregory of Nyssa called any meaning as "idol", because through its limited character it doesn't give to God the possibility to imprint the mind with his limitless. Seeing "a mind" it means seeing a limitless subject, different from any "meaning", any meaning always being limited. Something else is the mind, the "subject", and something else is an definite idea off the mind as subject. The "spiritual knowledge" it is that knowledge that enters in connection with God, as Person, directly, through His Ghost. God also imprints Himself in the mind, but not through limited meanings, not through ideas, not through rationalities, but as infinite presence. He imprints to the mind the feeling of His limitless depth and love.

[526] When working, the mind is free; when imagining, the mind endures something in a not free manner, by senses.

[527] "Spiritual" means here life, deriving from vital; therefore it doesn't differ from the living body.

[528] It is a movement within which nothing is active, for the senses perceive the outside world effortlessly. This world, by giving content to the senses, it gives them also a shape. But the senses give the world a shape, not so well defined for now.

[529] The imagination, or the work of forming images, of the understanding, it is different from the work of the senses, for through it each thing imprints distinctively its image in the mind, while in senses the things are imprinted, still, somehow in a mixed way.

be good, or the sadness for what it seems to be bad[530]. Thus, no imagining is directed, as it has been said, towards God. This is for He is, simply, above any meaning"[531].

And again, the Great Basil says: "That mind that is not scattered towards the things from outside, neither is overflowing over through the senses towards the world, it ascends again towards itself, and it ascends through itself to the understanding of God. And surrounded by the light of that beauty, it forgets even about the nature itself"[532].

Knowing these things, you too strive to be all the time, when you pray, with the help of God, entirely free from imaginings, free from imprints, with the whole mind clean and with the clean soul. This is also for saint Maximos says:

66. About the mind, the soul, and the heart of the clean and consummate ones.

a) About the clean mind. "Clean mind is that one separated from nescience and lightened by the godlike light"[533].

b) About the clean soul. "The clean soul it that liberated from passions and ceaselessly enjoying the godlike love"[534].

[530] First, there takes place the forming, within mind, of the images of the things which are perceive in that moment; then it takes place their approximate or resemblance imagining. But any image of the present things, or the things from the past, or of the imagined things, it produces a pleasure or it causes a sadness; therefore, it doesn't have a purely theoretical character, but an affective one, for it awakens an attraction or a repulsion for the things noticed or imagined. Therefore, not only the images per se get the mind out from its focusing on prayer, but also the affect of pleasure or of sadness caused by them. Through these affects the soul sticks with, or, in any case, it is preoccupied with, in a bigger degree, and more totally, with the created things, by engaging its powers on them, and no longer giving these powers the possibility to rest in God.

[533] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Heads about Love, I, 33; G.P. 90, 968 A. The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. II, p. 41. The idea that the nescience it is also an uncleanness, of which the mind must clean itself, we meet is also at Dionysus the Areopagite, according to whom the angels are cleaned during their whole ascension of other and other nescience, namely they reach other and other noticing of the limitless of God and of the love they have for Him; that love is smaller until they intuit less fully the limitless of God. Likewise, at Dionysus, after each stage of purification it follows, in the ascension of the angels, another stage of illumination. The meaning of uncleanness of the nescience it connotes that the nescience is a not-fully dwelling of the angels by God, namely a not-full transparency they have for Him; it is a not-full elevating above the limited plans of the creation.

[534] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Heads about Love I, 34; ibid; The Romanian Philokalia, ibid. Is the mind must liberate itself from nescience and to be filled up with light,, the soul must liberate himself from passions and to be filled up with the passion (suffering, but also loving)

c) About the clean heart. "Clean heart is that one that presented its memory to God, totally imageless and shapeless and ready to let itself to be inscribed only by His imprinting, through which he usually makes Himself shown"[535].

After these we have to add the followings:

d) About the consummate mind. Consummate mind is that which, through true faith has known the One above knowing and it has received the general things of the creatures and it has received from the judgment of God the comprising knowledge of the Providence and of the Judgment; of course, as much as it is possible to a man"[536].

e) About the consummate soul. "The consummate soul is that whose passionate power inclines totally towards God"[537].

f) About the consummate heart. "Consummate heart is called, maybe, that which no longer has any natural movement of any kind towards anything and which, when God comes, He inscribes, for that heart's consummate simplicity, His laws, in that heart, like on a well smoothed tablet"[538].

the godlike love. The mind is an organ of the seeing, of the knowing; the soul is an organ of the living, unclean attachment (passions), or of the attachment cleaned of anything (love).

[535] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Gnostic Heads II, 82; G.P. 90, 1184 A; The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. II, pp. 199-200. There is to be seen also the footnote no. 4. If the mind knows God through its transparency, crossed through by the godlike light, and the soul is lit up by the fire of the love for God, the heart attaches itself to God, by filling its memory only with Him, by ceaselessly remembering him. Through this the features of God are inscribed in the heart: the infinity, the eternity, and the kindness. Through that heart only God is being shown, to everybody.

[536] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Heads about Love III, 99; G.P. 90, 1048 A; The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. II, p. 98. This is not about a theoretical knowledge of the "universals" in the rational scholastic meaning, but it is about an intuition of the Providence of God that sustains and leads everything, often submitting us to punishments, to hardships, in order to be the sins overcome in those, through repentance and great efforts, and thus to be us strengthened in the love and in the kindness of God. Such a soul knows the ways of God which seem not-understood to many. This requires that the mind to have achieved an understanding through experience.

[537] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Quoted work, III, 98; quoted G.P.; quoted Romanian Philokalia, 97. The soul is again seen like as the dynamic and affectionate side of the human being. It cannot be consummate the soul that doesn't feel as a whole, the love of God, and it doesn't feel himself wholly penetrated by this love. By absolutely directing the soul's passion towards non-absolute objects, it brings the soul continuous disappointments.

[538] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Gnostic Heads II, 81; G.P. 90, 1184 A; The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. II, p. 199. The natural movement is that movement towards creatures, or the movement born out of the purely natural impulse of the heart. Within the consummate heart it has been imprinted the movement of the Holy Ghost, or the movement of the laws of God, of the laws of the union with Him in love, inscribed by Him, as some kind of forces which bring the heart towards Him. This movement isn't contrary to the natural movement of the heart, but

g) Again, about the clean mind. "Only the Holy Ghost can clean up the mind"- according to Saint Diadochus[539]; also, according to John Climacus[540]: "Only the Holy Ghost can make the mind steadfast". And Saint Nilus says: "If somebody would want to see the state of the mind, let him empty on himself of all meanings and then he will see the mind resembling to the sapphire of to the heavenly color"[541]. And again: "The state of the mind is intelligible (thought) height, resembling to the heavenly color, upon which, in the time of the prayer, it is shown the light of the Holy Trinity"[542]. And Saint Isaac the Syrian says: "When the mind disrobes itself of the old man and it puts on the new man of the grace (Col. 3: 9), it sees the its cleanness resembling to the heavenly color; this was called by the old people of Israel as place of God, when he showed Himself to them in the mountain" (Exod. 24: 10)[543].

By doing, so, as it has been said before, namely by praying cleanly and without imaginings and imprints, you will step on the footsteps of the saints. And if not, you will have, instead of the quietude, the hallucinations, and instead of the grapes, you will harvest brambles. But may this not be to you.

67. How the imprinting of the prophets was being done.

it is a restoration and a strengthening of it. The hearts smoothed like a tablet for inscribing the laws of God in it, it is a clean heart, that heart liberated from callousness and from attachment to the limited things, it is that heart that has become soft, and open to the limitless One and for everything in Him; it is that heart capable of easy flying towards the heights of God. It is that heart that opens itself to God as a flower opens in order to be fecundated in the time of the fruition; it is that heart that opens itself to the proved of somebody else's proves of love and, in the last analyze, to the proved of the subject of the supreme love.

[539] Saint Diadochus, Heads about the Spiritual Consummation 38: The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. I, p. 344. If the cleanness of the heart is means its transparency for God, God Himself has to enter the relation with a heart in order to be seen through that heart. Then, only the Ghost is so powerful through the personal relation He poses us in, with the Supreme Being, in order the mind no longer be attracted by any object.

[540] The Ladder, the quoted place. Namely He can make the mind not to pass from a thought to another. This is because the Ghost opens the ocean of the life of God.

[541] This place is from Evagrius, Gnostic Heads; at W. Frakenberg, Evagrius Ponticus, p. 427.

[542] The mind is the highest peak of the human being. Upon the mind it shines in the time of the prayer the light of the Holy trinity, for this is an illumination of the reciprocal love amongst the godlike Persons, love that is communicated also to the one who is praying, and who is at his turn lit up by the love and by the light of the Holy Trinity, which unveils the whole meaning of the existence.

[543] According to Ammann, at Isaac the Syrian, Quoted work, Word 32. But we couldn't find this place. The cleanness is transparency, sincerity, and full openness. Through cleanness the heart becomes a place of God, for no thought interposes then, between heart and God.

Is some people reckon that the visions, the images, and the unveilings of the prophets were born out of imagination and by natural development, let these people know that they are being carried away from the truth, This is for the prophets and the teachers from now of the holy things, they have seen and they have caught what they have seen in images, not according to some natural order and development, but their mind has been imprinted in a godlike and above nature manner, through an untold power and by the grace of the Holy Ghost. This is for the Great Basil says: "The ones who have their mind not-scattered and clean, they receive in it imprints through a certain untold power and they hear within themselves resounding, somehow, the word of God"[544]. And again: "The Prophets were seeing through the imprinting done within their mind". And Gregory the Speaker about God, he says: "Then within parent and prophets, amongst which some of them were imagining God or they knew Him and others knew the future from before, being imprinted the Ghost to them and being, to them, the future things as the present things"[545].

68. Again about imprints and about the kinds of views.

If some people doubt this, by receiving the imaginings and the many and diverse views, they resist us, by reckoning that they follow to the saints. Thus, they argue that the Speaker about God says that God makes Himself known to the mind as through some shades, and not out of Himself, but out of the things surrounding Him, the imagination gathering, out of each of those things, another feature and composing, thus, some kind of unique image of the truth etc. And about the godlike Maximos they argue that he reckons that the mind cannot become dispassionate only by doing, if it is not crossed through by many and diverse views[546]. They also argue that other saints too, they say things alike.

[544] Commentary to Isaiah the Prophet, head 6, verse 8; G.P. 30, 440. The images seen by Prophets aren't those ones which fall under the senses, and therefore they aren't limited. Those images are like some states, the states of the interlocutor are prolonged in. Like the state of an interlocutor are "imprinted" in the one who listen to him with trust, or in the one who is in a loving relation with him, so are "imprinted" the powerful states of God, of a great communicative force, in the ones who open themselves to Him.

[546] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Capita alia, 142; G.P. 90, 1433 B-C. Are targeted here the ones who do not recognize a direct encounter with the One God, by deserting the multiple thoughts, but they only admit the possibility of knowing God from distance, by combining the

Let some people like these to know that these words were said by those Fathers not about the work and the grace of knowing and seeing received from God, which unite a man with God through the experience itself, but about the work started from man, namely out of his wisdom, causing a seeing harvested out of the resemblance and of the harmony of the things. This seeing reaches, in a shadowy manner, to some understanding of God. This one can be achieved and understand by many, and even by all, as the one who studied with understanding this kind of sayings of the saints, he know it well. This is for it was written: "Out of the size and the beauty of the creature it can be known, by resemblance, the Maker" (The Wisdom of Solomon[547] 13: 15). But neither this kind of knowledge is born out of that crafted and vain teaching, from outside, of the world. This is because this one, like an indecent servant, swallowed up with the demonstrative and sophisticated haughtiness, with pretentions of all-knowing, which doesn't want to take account of the evangelical faith, of humbleness, and of consenting the truth, it has been banished away from the porch of the holy dwelling place.

But our word is consecrated to the consummate worshipping, started out of hypostasis (en-hypostasized)[548]. For through this, the chiefs of the Apostles, who went up on the Tabor Mountain, together with Jesus, they suffered, being diverse ideas about His features as they can be deduced out of creation. These ones do not accept the teaching of the Fathers that, for this unmediated knowing of God it is necessary the working or the doing stage or the cleanness of the soul by fulfilling the commandments, or the consummation of the soul through this work. They reckon that the knowing of God it is a matter of correctly using the rationality. It is here targeted the scholastics Saint Gregory Palamas clashed with, in the person of Barlaam. The knowledge of God doesn't achieve a general rationality, an abstract one, but a concrete person - on the measure he has cleaned himself of sins, he has humbled, and he has reached to love. That's why it cannot be fully communicated, but everyone must achieve it by his own experience. Although, the authors of the present writing admit also a knowledge of God by human initiative, before such a cleaning as the mentioned one, but they reckon it as inferior to the usual one done by the grace of God, and therefore through the initiative of God to communicate on Himself to the ones who are cleaned in their hearts, within whom He dwells.

[548] So, our authors know besides that illumination that comes from God in an unmediated manner, also the illumination gained out of creatures by deductive cogitation, namely besides the mysterious-apophatic illumination, also that one rational-cataphatic. In the last one, watching the images of the things it has its positive importance, unlike in the first one, in which the mind must get above any imaginings. That light is called "en-hypostatized" for it has its source in the hypostasis of Christ. It is the light that comes out of His Person, and not a subjective imagining.

transformed in an untold manner, the good and truly blessed transformation (Ps. 76: 10)[549], and they were found worthy of looking at the unseen kingdom and godhead, even with the feeling eyes, elevated to a more godlike state and made spiritual through the right hand of the Holy Ghost (Mt. 17: 1 and 5). This is for as far as the sunrises are from sunsets (Ps. 102: 12)[550] and the sky from earth, and as much as the soul is above the body, that much, the received work and the grace, are above the work done through nature[551]. This is because, that one done through nature, as I've said, it has the possibility to advance from the outside things and from the well ordered movement of the existing things (from creatures), from their order and connections, through the imaginings born out of all of them, towards a certain image of the true, and thus to stretch himself towards God through faith. And the received one it appears in an unmediated manner, from God Himself, or out of His hypostasis, as a real presence within heart, but sometimes also from outside, and it transmits in an unseen and above understanding way, also to the body, from the all-godlike illumination and light. This is for the heart suffers, according to the most-wise Maximos, in an above nature manner, but the heart doesn't produce itself the not-made deification.

For this Saint says: "I call not-made deification the illumination of the godhead in an en-hypostatized mode (coming out of hypostasis)[552], illumination that is not created, but it is

[549] Ps. 77: 10: KJB: "And I said, This is my infirmity: but I will remember the years of the right hand of the most High."; Ps. 76: 10: ROB: "And I said: Now I have started to understand; this is the changing of the right hand of the Most High."

[550] Ps. 103: 12: KJB: "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us."; 102: 12: ROB: "As far away as the sunrises are from the sunsets, He removed from us our lawlessness."

[551] If there is a gradation in the created things, but still the superior ones do not annul the inferior ones, but the first ones show the true purpose of the second ones and help them fulfilling that purpose, much more there is a superiority of the godlike work towards the spiritual work of the highest created being, which helps the last one to fulfill its true purpose.

[552] The deification is a light, but a transforming light, and not-produced by the human effort, but an illumination of the entire human being out of the godlike hypostasis, which makes also the human hypostasis to be illuminated and capable of irradiating the light of the godlike hypostasis; or it is a communion in light of both persons, an interpersonal light and therefore also a joy and light between them, without being possible to distinguish the frontier between the joy and the love of one and of another. But this light it has its origin in the godlike hypostasis, as ultimate and full of initiative source, as ultimate personal source of the love and of the existence, which irradiates as light.

shown in an understood manner in the worthy ones"[553]. Resembling things says also the Great Dionysus: "We must know that our mind has, on one hand, the power of understanding, through which it sees the thought things (intelligible), and on the other hand, it has the union which surpasses the mind's nature, through which it unites itself to the things beyond itself"[554].

And Saint Isaac says: "I have gained two eyes of the soul, as the Fathers say; and we do not need each one for the same purpose. This is for with an eye we see the things hidden into creatures, namely the power of God and His wisdom and His Providence regarding us, and with the other ones we look at the glory of His holy nature, when God deigns to introduce us the spiritual mysteries"[555]. The godlike Diadochus says also: "Of the Same Holy Ghost are the charismas of the wisdom and of the knowledge, as also all the godlike charismas (gifts). But each of them has a special work. That's why, someone was given the wisdom, and some other one was given the knowledge, through the same Ghost, as the Apostle confesses (1 Cor. 12: 8). This is for the knowledge unites the man, through the experience itself, with God, by not moving the soul towards the things' rationalities. That's why, some of the people who has chosen the philosophy (the wisdom) of the lonely life, they are illuminated by it into feeling, but they do not reach the godlike rationalities[556].

And the wisdom, if given to somebody, together with the first one, into fear - a thing that rarely takes place - it shows the works themselves of the wisdom, and this is because the [554] Unidentified. The mind cogitates and understands, but does not cogitate and does not understand only on itself, but also the other realities. As such, it has the tendency and the power to somehow touch those ones, to unite itself with them, but without getting confounded to them. Especially the mind, as knowing expression of the subject, it tends towards other subjects and unites itself with them; in the upshot, the mind tends towards the personal God as ultimate source of the existence and of the love; the mind tends to unite itself with Him. Proper-said, the mind tends towards Him in the most essential mode and it tends towards the other things only because it tends towards Him; the mind finds in the other things some love, but it actually tends towards the absolute degree of the love, which is God.

[555] Quoted work, Word 72, p. 281.

[556] The knowledge has here another meaning than the modern one. This it means knowing, through experience, on God Himself, and not the rationalities or the meanings of the things. The spiritual people do not know God in a mediated manner – through the rationalities of the things, but they know God in an unmediated manner by uniting themselves with Him, or by experiencing Him. That's why regarding the second knowledge - that is rational, or general, and from distance, and therefore much surpassed by them -, we are not even interested in.

knowledge uses to illuminate, through work, while the second one, through word. The knowledge is brought by prayer and by much quietude into the consummate lack of worries, and the wisdom brings the studying of the words of God, lacking the vain glory, and, firstly, the grace of the Giver God"[557]. To these, Saint Maximos adds in "Scholia": "The fountain of Jacob is the Scripture, the water is the knowledge out of the Scripture, and the deep is the difficult to penetrate understanding of the Scripture's mysteries. Getting water out with the bucket it means finding out the word of God by learning the letters. The Lord didn't have this bucket (Jn. 4: 6, 11). This is because, He being the Word Himself, he didn't give to the believers the knowledge out of learning and study, but he gave to the worthy ones the eternal and ceaseless wisdom out of the eternal grace. This is for, the bucket elevates the teaching, by taking a very small part of it and then it leaves the whole untouched by any word. And the knowing by grace it has the entire wisdom, as much as it is possible to the human beings, without study, by sprouting out in a diverse manner, according to the men's needs"[558].

And Diadochus says again: "It is often difficult to keep our mind to prayer due to the heavy narrowness and tribulation of the work while praying. But to the speaking about God (the theology) the mind joyfully surrenders itself[559], due to the [557] Diadochus, quoted work, head 9; The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. I, p. 337. We have seen before the difference between the unmediated knowing of God and the rational knowing of God through the things' rationalities, now it is about the difference between the unmediated knowing of God and the wisdom that studies and expose in words the works which take place in the frame of the unmediated knowing. Thus, the unmediated knowing is a mysterious work of God within the man's soul, but this work is interpreted in words by the wisdom. That's why the wisdom is also the studying of the words of the Revelation, which expose the unmediated knowing of God. In continuation it is said that the Word of God had the wisdom through which he was interpreting on Himself, from Himself, and not through study. Only that one who doesn't enjoy in himself the encountering with God, he needs to study the words of the one who enjoys this encounter in order to interpret the words.

[558] Saint Maximos the Confessor, The Five Heads II, 29; G.P. 90, 1231 AB. Whilst the knowing through study it takes now a part from a whole, and then another part of the whole, and it never intuits the specific mystery of the whole and it doesn't even know the parts in their living connections, the intuition being a gift of the grace, it notices the whole in its specific mystery, a mystery that never can be expressed by words, no matter how many words one would use.

[559] That's why the rationalist-scholastic theology prefers the speculation instead of prayer. This theology is variety and fickleness in thinking and it is free and arbitrary movement. The prayer it means persevering towards the face of God. And only that one who has power to deepen himself in experiencing the infinity of God, he feels well and not bored whilst praying.

broadness and to the liberty of the godlike contemplations learnt by experience. Therefore, in order not to let the mind saying many things, and not to allow the mind flying with unmeasured joy, let's occupy the mind, as much as possible, with the prayer, with the singing, and with the reading of the Holy Scriptures, also not overlooking the interpretations done by the taught men in the words matters. By doing this, we won't let our mind to mix its own words in the words of the grace, and neither will we allow the mind to be stolen by the vain glory, as one which would be filled up with joy due to the much-speaking, but we are going to guard our mind in the time of the seeing (contemplation) and by doing so we are going to make almost all its thought accompanied by tears[560]. This is for by resting in times of appeasement and by sweetening itself especially with the sweetness of the prayer, the mind not only will liberate itself from the shortcoming mentioned before, but it also renew itself increasingly more in order to surrender itself nimbly and without tiredness to the godlike views (contemplations), by advancing, in the same time, in the knowledge of the discernment, with much humbleness. But we must know that there is also a prayer which is above any broadness. This is, though, characteristic only to those ones who have been filled up with the holy grace, into the whole feeling and trust"[561].

[560] The rationalist-scholastic theology is the theory of the man who considers himself as self-standing; the prayer is the living of his smallness and of his sinfulness before God; that's why the prayer is not theoretical, but existential. Thus it is the patristic type theology, which is based on experiencing God in prayer.

[561] Quoted work, head 68; The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. I, 364. The prayer is above the theology - as thinking and speaking about God. This if for the prayer must remain in the tight conscience of the presence of God, whilst the thinking about God and the speaking about God it subjectively slip from before God, from the conscience of the presence before Him; the theology moves freely, by escaping the conscience that it stays before the face of God as Subject and it escapes the dialogue with Him by reckoning Him as object, towards which the human mind behaves freely. But the narrowness of the prayer it is above the broadness of the theological thinking, for it is a more accentuated living in the endless density of the presence of God. The prayer lives God incomparably more intensely and more deeply, for it lives Him as claiming, loving, and eternally new Subject in the manifestations of His power and love; the prayer doesn't reduce God to some permanent laws or a subject, who becomes at his turn absent to the conscience of the theological thinking. In prayer God is "felt", namely he is "experienced", "touched" by the whole being, as through a sense, in the intensity of his presence, and not only thought - or as a not-experienced reality. In the prayer the man experiences the irradiation of the grace or of the energy of God upon him. The authors of this writing aren't against the theological contemplation, but they consider it as having to come after much prayer. Only then the godlike meanings will be deep and alive, and they will be based on the feeling from the prayer and they will be accompanied by discernment, through

Have you heard that? There is, he says, a prayer above any broadness, which is characteristic only to those ones who have been filled up, into the whole feeling and trust, namely in within heart, in an above nature manner, with the all-godlike illumination which irradiates out of hypostasis[562]. This one is called also by Saint Isaac as not-sealed memory, or without shape, without image, and simple[563].

69. About the five powers of the soul. Also, about the imaginings characteristic to the soul and to the mind, and about the need to totally shun ourselves against imagination, imprinting, and shapes, in the clean prayer and in the simple and unitary work of the mind.

But as we have shown before, the imaginings come not only from demons, but the soul has also, from itself, in a natural manner, the impulse towards imagining, through the five senses the soul is endowed with. These are: the mind[564], the understanding, the opinion, the imagination, and the feeling; likewise, the body has also five senses: the sight, the smell, the hearing, the taste, and the touching[565]. Therefore, one of the soul's powers is, like we've said, the imagination, through which the soul imagines things. That's why, the ones who want to rule upon and to clarify well the things of his soul, he must strive to get winged and to totally elevate, towards God, especially the powers which unite him with God in the present age; and he

which the man will discern the things based on the reality of an experience and not built up only on a speculation that is detached from the experience of the contact with God.

[562] There is a light that irradiates out of the hypostasis, or out of the Person of Christ, in the hypostasis or in the person of the one who prays. It is the light of the godlike Person, a light received by the human person in the loving communication between them; it is the light of the Supreme Person, of the hypostasis, or of the ultimate personal source of it.

[563] Place not found. The prayer is a memory of a ceaseless remembrance of God. It is the ceaseless feeling of his presence, but not the seeing of an image of His, because the image has a limited character. And this doesn't correspond to God.

[564] The mind is the power of the intuitive knowing of the whole, corresponding to the vessel of the body, whilst the understanding is the knowing of the connections between the aspects of the things, looked one at the time, like the smell distinguishes the qualities accor5ding to their fragrances.

[565] It is to be noticed the fact that the body's feeling it is reckoned as parallel to the body's sense of touching. This is for, through touching, the body makes contact with the sensitive things; likewise, the mind comes in touch with God, through a feeling of itself. This is the so-called "understanding feeling" or "the mind's feeling".

We must try, therefore, what the fathers tell us about these things and to memorize what it is appropriate to us.

Therefore, says Saint Maximos: "Because the soul is, by itself, namely by its being, rational and understanding, the soul is, of course, also self standing[567]. And if it is self-standing, it will work by nature for itself and by itself and together with the body, by understanding and by reasoning through itself and never ceasing to work with its understanding powers, which belong to it in a natural way. This is for the things belonging by nature to a unity that exists in a certain way, and those things cannot be taken from it as long as that unity exists and subsists. Therefore, the soul, by existing and subsisting forever, since the soul has been created for God Who has created the soul in this manner, that soul understands, reasons, and knows forever, both by itself and together with the body for itself and for its nature. So, there cannot be found any cause which to separate the soul from the things belonging to it naturally, and not for the body, after the soul's detaching"[568].

Therefore, because we know and feel, as we have been taught by Saints, that the mind and the understanding move and work both in the present age and in the future age, around God[569], and the other powers we know as belonging to the soul only in the present age, the soul has - like a skillful helmsman, and as one who naturally has the mastery upon all of these - to want to keep these working, not only in the present time, but to strive himself to extend also in the future, especially the mind and the understanding, wholly towards God, and, for that, to unite them with Him in the time of the clean prayer and of the understanding, unitary, and simple work. And let him totally [566] The imagination, generally, it ties the soul to the sensitive world, by building up the images in their likeness. That's why the soul mustn't use it when thinking at God. This is because the imagination impedes the soul to elevate to God, or it builds about God inadequate hallucinations. The symbols applied to god must be liberated from what they have material; although, some imprinting of God it takes place within soul. In this sense it is used also the imaginative capacity of the soul (its nature that can be imprinted).

[567] The soul is spelled "ανυπόστατος", or self-standing, namely it is not a power or a quality of a substance. That's why the soul is the basis of the human "hypostasis". The soul is the basis of all the powers and the qualities of the man and even the basis of the body.

[568] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Epistle no. VII; G.P. 91, 432 D, 439 A.

[569] It is moving and it is working, in the last analyze, by being preoccupied with God.

detach his mind from imagination and from the other powers[570]. This if for according to Saint Nilus: "The state of prayer is a dispassionate habit that kidnaps, through the fieriest love, towards the thought height, that mind loving wisdom and spiritual"[571]. By working thus, the soul will keep his due and honored worthiness.

70. Also about the mind.

Likewise, the mind must keep itself not taking part and being separated from imagination, as one that is undivided, simple, standing by itself, and luminous being[572]. This is for the mind has from itself a natural power towards this and to turn back, to gather itself, and to Move towards itself, by not being impeded by anything else. This is the state of the mind that comes out of the godlike grace[573]. This is for Climacus says: "Fixing the mind it belongs only to the Holy Ghost"[574]. This is because, though, as power of the soul, the mind is moved and mastered somehow by the soul, but the mind is also and it is also called the eye of the soul, and the mind has, as we've said, a [570] Out of the fact that the soul will have the mind and the understanding active also in the future life, for they are essentially directed towards God, as towards the ultimate reality the mind wants to understand on the purpose of understanding everything, the author of this writing deduce that also in the prayer from the present age, prayer that is directed towards God, the soul must keep active especially the mind and the understanding, and in what regards the imagination, which works with the images of the seen world and keeps the soul tied to these ones, the mind must separate from it.

[571] Evagrius Pontius, About Prayer; The Romanian Philokalia I, p. 80. Nilus of Sinai; G.P. 79, 1177.

[572] The imaginings, or the products of the imagination, and, generally, any kind of images, they divide the mind, or the mind's attention, and they make the mind to cross from a state to another; more than that, these images not only divide and limit the mind, but they also lower the mind from the luminous borderless state the mind is in by its nature, by shadowing the mind according to the sentiments inspired by those images.

[573] The mind is not impeded by anything in its turning back towards itself, when it searches for and it encounter God within itself, God Who is above all things, and Who virtually comprises all the things. If the mind wouldn't encounter in itself anything else but only on itself, the mind couldn't detach itself from all things, because the mind is created by its nature to tend towards something, to surpass on itself, to be in a continual getting out of itself either towards the things form within world, or towards God, the transcendent One. Towards God the mind is attracted, like by a magnet, by His grace, or by His river of love. Therefore the mind is helped by the grace even when turning back towards itself.

[574] Only the Ghost can stop the mind from the mind's straying. For He is God, the One Who comes within soul with an overwhelming power and he open the mind's eyes towards the endless horizon of God.

certain own, natural, simple and independent power[575]. That's why, when the mind feels itself naturally depending on the soul and on the soul's powers, that mind is a mind in potency. From here comes also the name of human soul (1 Cor. 2: 14)[576]. But when the mind takes back its natural, simple, and essential worthiness, and its undivided and independent brightness, and the self-control, or when the soul liberates itself from the attachments and from the bodily and from the soul's natural movements, and when it is found worthy of becoming from mind in potency to become mind in work, or it advances to the state of above nature and spiritual man, then it turns, steadfastly, back to itself in an not-deviated manner and through itself ascends not-impeded by any tie, wholly and consummately, to the understanding of God, by being shapeless, imageless, and simple[577]. This is for the Great Basil says also: "That mind that is not-scattered towards the external things and that is not poured through senses towards the world, that mind turns back to itself, and through itself that mind ascends to the understanding of God, and, by being surrounded and inundated by the beauty of the light of That One, that mind forgets even about itself"[578]. And thus, the mind regains and preserves its [575] The mind is a power of the soul. But by being the eye of the soul, the mind it is, on one hand, moved by the soul, and on the other hand, the mind cannot stand still, namely the mind cannot but be in the exercise of the act of seeing.

[576] Even when the mind is attached only to the senses connected to the world and the mind doesn't fill these senses up with the love for God, the mind still remains mind, but it is overwhelmed by the psychic senses related to the body, and therefore that mind is not actualized as mind. That's why such a man is called as a "soul's man".

[577] On one hand this state of the mind in work it is the mind's natural state, and on the other hand, it is an above nature state. This is a balancing we always found at the Holy Fathers. This is an above nature state for it achieved only by entering the ambiance of the endless simplicity of God, which gives the mind also its simplicity, open to the godlike infinity, by being filled up with this infinity. For the mind's simple being it is functionally actualized when encountering the above nature God, this mind's state is on one hand natural, and on the other hand it is above nature. Likewise, the bodily and the soul's movements, when they overwhelm the mind, they are naturally functional, but on the other hand they found their true being, of their natural being, when they are overwhelmed by the mind, and through the mind, by the godlike energies. This is because they only then discover the purpose they have been created for, as environments of irradiation of the godlike Ghost. The whole this thinking about mind is tributary to the Greek philosophy, but it becomes Christian when the unified, simple mind, it is understood as indefinite and unitary subject, open to the unitary and infinite godlike Subject.

[578] The light of God that baths the mind and inundates the mind, it is, in the same time, His beauty, or His beauty is smooth light. But who can describe the mystery of the beauty as light, or vice versa? The light covers the real depths and the rich, harmonious, and loving depths, they are beautiful.

state "in the image" and "in the likeness", as one that is mind and through itself it unites itself and enter the cohabitation, in an understanding manner, with the godlike mind, namely with God[579]. And this is the circular work, or movement, namely the new ascension of the mind to it and the movement of turning back towards it and towards the union with it and through it with God, the only movement that is truly not-wandering and without mistake, as one that is free from any relation. This is an unmediated and above understanding union and a seeing above any sight[580].

67. How the imprinting of the prophets was being done.

Is some people reckon that the visions, the images, and the unveilings of the prophets were born out of imagination and by natural development, let these people know that they are being carried away from the truth, This is for the prophets and the teachers from now of the holy things, they have seen and they have caught what they have seen in images, not according to some natural order and development, but their mind has been imprinted in a godlike and above nature manner, through an untold power and by the grace of the Holy Ghost. This is for the Great Basil says: "The ones who have their mind not-scattered and clean, they receive in it imprints through a certain untold power and they hear within themselves resounding, somehow, the word of God"[581]. And again: "The Prophets were seeing

[579] The mind regains His "image" and "likeness", for it unites itself with its model, and for it becomes the simple and endless understanding of The One Who is understanding and endless intelligible and simple, original understanding.

[580] The swirling and ascending movement of the mind towards itself, and through it towards God, and, through this, the mind's increasingly tight union with itself and with God, it has as model the spinning ascension of the angelic steps from around God, as described by Dionysus the Areopagite. The one who turns back towards himself, he turns towards God, and vice versa. In the endlessness of this circular ascending movement of the mind around itself and around God, and in the increasingly tight union with itself and with God, it is shown again that the mind is made "in the image" of God, by having in its union with God and endless work which the mind never finishes to understand it, because the mind never finishes to unite ever more with itself and with God. The human being remains, eternally, an apophatic abyss, for he endlessly deepens and enriches himself in the apophatic abyss of God. But this is a magnetic abyss, which attracts the mind to an always increasing understanding. But by understanding and seeing the endless character of this mystery, the mind's understanding is, in the same time, above understanding, and, likewise, its seeing is above any sight. Then we must not forget that the mind, by increasingly deeper gathering in itself, it gathers itself into the mind Christ, and Christ's mind though is human, it belongs to the godlike hypostasis, The One Who is thinking His godlike infinite, increasingly more, through His mind.

through the imprinting done within their mind". And Gregory the Speaker about God, he says: "Then within parent and prophets, amongst which some of them were imagining God or they knew Him and others knew the future from before, being imprinted the Ghost to them and being, to them, the future things as the present things"[582].

68. Again about imprints and about the kinds of views.

If some people doubt this, by receiving the imaginings and the many and diverse views, they resist us, by reckoning that they follow to the saints. Thus, they argue that the Speaker about God says that God makes Himself known to the mind as through some shades, and not out of Himself, but out of the things surrounding Him, the imagination gathering, out of each of those things, another feature and composing, thus, some kind of unique image of the truth etc. And about the godlike Maximos they argue that he reckons that the mind cannot become dispassionate only by doing, if it is not crossed through by many and diverse views[583]. They also argue that other saints too, they say things alike.

Let some people like these to know that these words were said by those Fathers not about the work and the grace of knowing and seeing received from God, which unite a man with God through the experience itself, but about the work started images are like some states, the states of the interlocutor are prolonged in. Like the state of an interlocutor are "imprinted" in the one who listen to him with trust, or in the one who is in a loving relation with him, so are "imprinted" the powerful states of God, of a great communicative force, in the ones who open themselves to Him.

[582] Saint Gregory of Nazianzus, Word no. 28, head 6; G.P. 36, 32 C-33A.

[583] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Capita alia, 142; G.P. 90, 1433 B-C. Are targeted here the ones who do not recognize a direct encounter with the One God, by deserting the multiple thoughts, but they only admit the possibility of knowing God from distance, by combining the diverse ideas about His features as they can be deduced out of creation. These ones do not accept the teaching of the Fathers that, for this unmediated knowing of God it is necessary the working or the doing stage or the cleanness of the soul by fulfilling the commandments, or the consummation of the soul through this work. They reckon that the knowing of God it is a matter of correctly using the rationality. It is here targeted the scholastics Saint Gregory Palamas clashed with, in the person of Barlaam. The knowledge of God doesn't achieve a general rationality, an abstract one, but a concrete person - on the measure he has cleaned himself of sins, he has humbled, and he has reached to love. That's why it cannot be fully communicated, but everyone must achieve it by his own experience. Although, the authors of the present writing admit also a knowledge of God by human initiative, before such a cleaning as the mentioned one, but they reckon it as inferior to the usual one done by the grace of God, and therefore through the initiative of God to communicate on Himself to the ones who are cleaned in their hearts, within whom He dwells.

from man, namely out of his wisdom, causing a seeing harvested out of the resemblance and of the harmony of the things. This seeing reaches, in a shadowy manner, to some understanding of God. This one can be achieved and understand by many, and even by all, as the one who studied with understanding this kind of sayings of the saints, he know it well. This is for it was written: "Out of the size and the beauty of the creature it can be known, by resemblance, the Maker" (The Wisdom of Solomon[584] 13: 15). But neither this kind of knowledge is born out of that crafted and vain teaching, from outside, of the world. This is because this one, like an indecent servant, swallowed up with the demonstrative and sophisticated haughtiness, with pretentions of all-knowing, which doesn't want to take account of the evangelical faith, of humbleness, and of consenting the truth, it has been banished away from the porch of the holy dwelling place.

But our word is consecrated to the consummate worshipping, started out of hypostasis (en-hypostasized)[585]. For through this, the chiefs of the Apostles, who went up on the Tabor Mountain, together with Jesus, they suffered, being transformed in an untold manner, the good and truly blessed transformation (Ps. 76: 10)[586], and they were found worthy of looking at the unseen kingdom and godhead, even with the feeling eyes, elevated to a more godlike state and made spiritual through the right hand of the Holy Ghost (Mt. 17: 1 and 5). This is for as far as the sunrises are from sunsets (Ps. 102: 12)[587] and the sky from earth, and as much as the soul is above the body, that much, the received work and the grace, are above the work

[585] So, our authors know besides that illumination that comes from God in an unmediated manner, also the illumination gained out of creatures by deductive cogitation, namely besides the mysterious-apophatic illumination, also that one rational-cataphatic. In the last one, watching the images of the things it has its positive importance, unlike in the first one, in which the mind must get above any imaginings. That light is called "en-hypostatized" for it has its source in the hypostasis of Christ. It is the light that comes out of His Person, and not a subjective imagining.

[586] Ps. 77: 10: KJB: "And I said, This is my infirmity: but I will remember the years of the right hand of the most High."; Ps. 76: 10: ROB: "And I said: Now I have started to understand; this is the changing of the right hand of the Most High."

done through nature[588]. This is because, that one done through nature, as I've said, it has the possibility to advance from the outside things and from the well ordered movement of the existing things (from creatures), from their order and connections, through the imaginings born out of all of them, towards a certain image of the true, and thus to stretch himself towards God through faith. And the received one it appears in an unmediated manner, from God Himself, or out of His hypostasis, as a real presence within heart, but sometimes also from outside, and it transmits in an unseen and above understanding way, also to the body, from the all-godlike illumination and light. This is for the heart suffers, according to the most-wise Maximos, in an above nature manner, but the heart doesn't produce itself the not-made deification.

For this Saint says: "I call not-made deification the illumination of the godhead in an en-hypostatized mode (coming out of hypostasis)[589], illumination that is not created, but it is shown in an understood manner in the worthy ones"[590]. Resembling things says also the Great Dionysus: "We must know that our mind has, on one hand, the power of understanding, through which it sees the thought things (intelligible), and on the other hand, it has the union which surpasses the mind's nature, through which it unites itself to the things beyond itself"[591].

[588] If there is a gradation in the created things, but still the superior ones do not annul the inferior ones, but the first ones show the true purpose of the second ones and help them fulfilling that purpose, much more there is a superiority of the godlike work towards the spiritual work of the highest created being, which helps the last one to fulfill its true purpose.

[589] The deification is a light, but a transforming light, and not-produced by the human effort, but an illumination of the entire human being out of the godlike hypostasis, which makes also the human hypostasis to be illuminated and capable of irradiating the light of the godlike hypostasis; or it is a communion in light of both persons, an interpersonal light and therefore also a joy and light between them, without being possible to distinguish the frontier between the joy and the love of one and of another. But this light it has its origin in the godlike hypostasis, as ultimate and full of initiative source, as ultimate personal source of the love and of the existence, which irradiates as light.

[591] Unidentified. The mind cogitates and understands, but does not cogitate and does not understand only on itself, but also the other realities. As such, it has the tendency and the power to somehow touch those ones, to unite itself with them, but without getting confounded to them. Especially the mind, as knowing expression of the subject, it tends towards other subjects and unites itself with them; in the upshot, the mind tends towards the personal God as ultimate source of the existence and of the love; the mind tends to unite itself with Him. Proper-said, the mind tends towards Him in the most essential mode and it tends towards the

And Saint Isaac says: "I have gained two eyes of the soul, as the Fathers say; and we do not need each one for the same purpose. This is for with an eye we see the things hidden into creatures, namely the power of God and His wisdom and His Providence regarding us, and with the other ones we look at the glory of His holy nature, when God deigns to introduce us the spiritual mysteries"[592]. The godlike Diadochus says also: "Of the Same Holy Ghost are the charismas of the wisdom and of the knowledge, as also all the godlike charismas (gifts). But each of them has a special work. That's why, someone was given the wisdom, and some other one was given the knowledge, through the same Ghost, as the Apostle confesses (1 Cor. 12: 8). This is for the knowledge unites the man, through the experience itself, with God, by not moving the soul towards the things' rationalities. That's why, some of the people who has chosen the philosophy (the wisdom) of the lonely life, they are illuminated by it into feeling, but they do not reach the godlike rationalities[593].

And the wisdom, if given to somebody, together with the first one, into fear - a thing that rarely takes place - it shows the works themselves of the wisdom, and this is because the knowledge uses to illuminate, through work, while the second one, through word. The knowledge is brought by prayer and by much quietude into the consummate lack of worries, and the wisdom brings the studying of the words of God, lacking the vain glory, and, firstly, the grace of the Giver God"[594]. To these, Saint other things only because it tends towards Him; the mind finds in the other things some love, but it actually tends towards the absolute degree of the love, which is God.

[592] Quoted work, Word 72, p. 281.

[593] The knowledge has here another meaning than the modern one. This it means knowing, through experience, on God Himself, and not the rationalities or the meanings of the things. The spiritual people do not know God in a mediated manner – through the rationalities of the things, but they know God in an unmediated manner by uniting themselves with Him, or by experiencing Him. That's why regarding the second knowledge - that is rational, or general, and from distance, and therefore much surpassed by them -, we are not even interested in.

[594] Diadochus, quoted work, head 9; The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. I, p. 337. We have seen before the difference between the unmediated knowing of God and the rational knowing of God through the things' rationalities, now it is about the difference between the unmediated knowing of God and the wisdom that studies and expose in words the works which take place in the frame of the unmediated knowing. Thus, the unmediated knowing is a mysterious work of God within the man's soul, but this work is interpreted in words by the wisdom. That's why the wisdom is also the studying of the words of the Revelation, which expose the unmediated knowing of God. In continuation it is said that the Word of God had the wisdom through which he was interpreting on Himself, from Himself, and not through study. Only that one who Maximos adds in "Scholia": "The fountain of Jacob is the Scripture, the water is the knowledge out of the Scripture, and the deep is the difficult to penetrate understanding of the Scripture's mysteries. Getting water out with the bucket it means finding out the word of God by learning the letters. The Lord didn't have this bucket (Jn. 4: 6, 11). This is because, He being the Word Himself, he didn't give to the believers the knowledge out of learning and study, but he gave to the worthy ones the eternal and ceaseless wisdom out of the eternal grace. This is for, the bucket elevates the teaching, by taking a very small part of it and then it leaves the whole untouched by any word. And the knowing by grace it has the entire wisdom, as much as it is possible to the human beings, without study, by sprouting out in a diverse manner, according to the men's needs"[595].

And Diadochus says again: "It is often difficult to keep our mind to prayer due to the heavy narrowness and tribulation of the work while praying. But to the speaking about God (the theology) the mind joyfully surrenders itself[596], due to the broadness and to the liberty of the godlike contemplations learnt by experience. Therefore, in order not to let the mind saying many things, and not to allow the mind flying with unmeasured joy, let's occupy the mind, as much as possible, with the prayer, with the singing, and with the reading of the Holy Scriptures, also not overlooking the interpretations done by the taught men in the words matters. By doing this, we won't let our mind to mix its own words in the words of the grace, and neither will we allow the mind to be stolen by the vain glory, as one which would be filled up with joy due to the much-speaking, but we are going to guard our mind in the time of the seeing (contemplation) and by doing so we are going to make almost all its thought doesn't enjoy in himself the encountering with God, he needs to study the words of the one who enjoys this encounter in order to interpret the words.

[595] Saint Maximos the Confessor, The Five Heads II, 29; G.P. 90, 1231 AB. Whilst the knowing through study it takes now a part from a whole, and then another part of the whole, and it never intuits the specific mystery of the whole and it doesn't even know the parts in their living connections, the intuition being a gift of the grace, it notices the whole in its specific mystery, a mystery that never can be expressed by words, no matter how many words one would use.

[596] That's why the rationalist-scholastic theology prefers the speculation instead of prayer. This theology is variety and fickleness in thinking and it is free and arbitrary movement. The prayer it means persevering towards the face of God. And only that one who has power to deepen himself in experiencing the infinity of God, he feels well and not bored whilst praying.

accompanied by tears[597]. This is for by resting in times of appeasement and by sweetening itself especially with the sweetness of the prayer, the mind not only will liberate itself from the shortcoming mentioned before, but it also renew itself increasingly more in order to surrender itself nimbly and without tiredness to the godlike views (contemplations), by advancing, in the same time, in the knowledge of the discernment, with much humbleness. But we must know that there is also a prayer which is above any broadness. This is, though, characteristic only to those ones who have been filled up with the holy grace, into the whole feeling and trust"[598].

Have you heard that? There is, he says, a prayer above any broadness, which is characteristic only to those ones who have been filled up, into the whole feeling and trust, namely in within heart, in an above nature manner, with the all-godlike illumination which irradiates out of hypostasis[599]. This one is [597] The rationalist-scholastic theology is the theory of the man who considers himself as self-standing; the prayer is the living of his smallness and of his sinfulness before God; that's why the prayer is not theoretical, but existential. Thus it is the patristic type theology, which is based on experiencing God in prayer.

[598] Quoted work, head 68; The Romanian Philokalia, Vol. I, 364. The prayer is above the theology - as thinking and speaking about God. This if for the prayer must remain in the tight conscience of the presence of God, whilst the thinking about God and the speaking about God it subjectively slip from before God, from the conscience of the presence before Him; the theology moves freely, by escaping the conscience that it stays before the face of God as Subject and it escapes the dialogue with Him by reckoning Him as object, towards which the human mind behaves freely. But the narrowness of the prayer it is above the broadness of the theological thinking, for it is a more accentuated living in the endless density of the presence of God. The prayer lives God incomparably more intensely and more deeply, for it lives Him as claiming, loving, and eternally new Subject in the manifestations of His power and love; the prayer doesn't reduce God to some permanent laws or a subject, who becomes at his turn absent to the conscience of the theological thinking. In prayer God is "felt", namely he is "experienced", "touched" by the whole being, as through a sense, in the intensity of his presence, and not only thought - or as a not-experienced reality. In the prayer the man experiences the irradiation of the grace or of the energy of God upon him. The authors of this writing aren't against the theological contemplation, but they consider it as having to come after much prayer. Only then the godlike meanings will be deep and alive, and they will be based on the feeling from the prayer and they will be accompanied by discernment, through which the man will discern the things based on the reality of an experience and not built up only on a speculation that is detached from the experience of the contact with God.

[599] There is a light that irradiates out of the hypostasis, or out of the Person of Christ, in the hypostasis or in the person of the one who prays. It is the light of the godlike Person, a light received by the human person in the loving communication between them; it is the light of the Supreme Person, of the hypostasis, or of the ultimate personal source of it.

called also by Saint Isaac as not-sealed memory, or without shape, without image, and simple[600].

69. About the five powers of the soul. Also, about the imaginings characteristic to the soul and to the mind, and about the need to totally shun ourselves against imagination, imprinting, and shapes, in the clean prayer and in the simple and unitary work of the mind.

But as we have shown before, the imaginings come not only from demons, but the soul has also, from itself, in a natural manner, the impulse towards imagining, through the five senses the soul is endowed with. These are: the mind[601], the understanding, the opinion, the imagination, and the feeling; likewise, the body has also five senses: the sight, the smell, the hearing, the taste, and the touching[602]. Therefore, one of the soul's powers is, like we've said, the imagination, through which the soul imagines things. That's why, the ones who want to rule upon and to clarify well the things of his soul, he must strive to get winged and to totally elevate, towards God, especially the powers which unite him with God in the present age; and he must also take care of the other powers, to use them, and to work them[603].

We must try, therefore, what the fathers tell us about these things and to memorize what it is appropriate to us.

Therefore, says Saint Maximos: "Because the soul is, by itself, namely by its being, rational and understanding, the soul

[600] Place not found. The prayer is a memory of a ceaseless remembrance of God. It is the ceaseless feeling of his presence, but not the seeing of an image of His, because the image has a limited character. And this doesn't correspond to God.

[601] The mind is the power of the intuitive knowing of the whole, corresponding to the vessel of the body, whilst the understanding is the knowing of the connections between the aspects of the things, looked one at the time, like the smell distinguishes the qualities accor5ding to their fragrances.

[602] It is to be noticed the fact that the body's feeling it is reckoned as parallel to the body's sense of touching. This is for, through touching, the body makes contact with the sensitive things; likewise, the mind comes in touch with God, through a feeling of itself. This is the so-called "understanding feeling" or "the mind's feeling".

[603] The imagination, generally, it ties the soul to the sensitive world, by building up the images in their likeness. That's why the soul mustn't use it when thinking at God. This is because the imagination impedes the soul to elevate to God, or it builds about God inadequate hallucinations. The symbols applied to god must be liberated from what they have material; although, some imprinting of God it takes place within soul. In this sense it is used also the imaginative capacity of the soul (its nature that can be imprinted).

is, of course, also self standing[604]. And if it is self-standing, it will work by nature for itself and by itself and together with the body, by understanding and by reasoning through itself and never ceasing to work with its understanding powers, which belong to it in a natural way. This is for the things belonging by nature to a unity that exists in a certain way, and those things cannot be taken from it as long as that unity exists and subsists. Therefore, the soul, by existing and subsisting forever, since the soul has been created for God Who has created the soul in this manner, that soul understands, reasons, and knows forever, both by itself and together with the body for itself and for its nature. So, there cannot be found any cause which to separate the soul from the things belonging to it naturally, and not for the body, after the soul's detaching"[605].

Therefore, because we know and feel, as we have been taught by Saints, that the mind and the understanding move and work both in the present age and in the future age, around God[606], and the other powers we know as belonging to the soul only in the present age, the soul has - like a skillful helmsman, and as one who naturally has the mastery upon all of these - to want to keep these working, not only in the present time, but to strive himself to extend also in the future, especially the mind and the understanding, wholly towards God, and, for that, to unite them with Him in the time of the clean prayer and of the understanding, unitary, and simple work. And let him totally detach his mind from imagination and from the other powers[607]. This if for according to Saint Nilus: "The state of prayer is a dispassionate habit that kidnaps, through the fieriest love, towards the thought height, that mind loving wisdom and [604] The soul is spelled "ανυπόστατος", or self-standing, namely it is not a power or a quality of a substance. That's why the soul is the basis of the human "hypostasis". The soul is the basis of all the powers and the qualities of the man and even the basis of the body.

[606] It is moving and it is working, in the last analyze, by being preoccupied with God.

[607] Out of the fact that the soul will have the mind and the understanding active also in the future life, for they are essentially directed towards God, as towards the ultimate reality the mind wants to understand on the purpose of understanding everything, the author of this writing deduce that also in the prayer from the present age, prayer that is directed towards God, the soul must keep active especially the mind and the understanding, and in what regards the imagination, which works with the images of the seen world and keeps the soul tied to these ones, the mind must separate from it.

spiritual”[608]. By working thus, the soul will keep his due and honored worthiness.

70. Also about the mind.

Likewise, the mind must keep itself not taking part and being separated from imagination, as one that is undivided, simple, standing by itself, and luminous being[609]. This is for the mind has from itself a natural power towards this and to turn back, to gather itself, and to Move towards itself, by not being impeded by anything else. This is the state of the mind that comes out of the godlike grace[610]. This is for Climacus says: “Fixing the mind it belongs only to the Holy Ghost”[611]. This is because, though, as power of the soul, the mind is moved and mastered somehow by the soul, but the mind is also and it is also called the eye of the soul, and the mind has, as we’ve said, a certain own, natural, simple and independent power[612]. That’s why, when the mind feels itself naturally depending on the soul and on the soul’s powers, that mind is a mind in potency. From here comes also the name of human soul (1 Cor. 2: 14)[613]. But when the mind takes back its natural, simple, and essential

[609] The imaginings, or the products of the imagination, and, generally, any kind of images, they divide the mind, or the mind’s attention, and they make the mind to cross from a state to another; more than that, these images not only divide and limit the mind, but they also lower the mind from the luminous borderless state the mind is in by its nature, by shadowing the mind according to the sentiments inspired by those images.

[610] The mind is not impeded by anything in its turning back towards itself, when it searches for and it encounter God within itself, God Who is above all things, and Who virtually comprises all the things. If the mind wouldn’t encounter in itself anything else but only on itself, the mind couldn’t detach itself from all things, because the mind is created by its nature to tend towards something, to surpass on itself, to be in a continual getting out of itself either towards the things form within world, or towards God, the transcendent One. Towards God the mind is attracted, like by a magnet, by His grace, or by His river of love. Therefore the mind is helped by the grace even when turning back towards itself.

[611] Only the Ghost can stop the mind from the mind’s straying. For He is God, the One Who comes within soul with an overwhelming power and he open the mind’s eyes towards the endless horizon of God.

[612] The mind is a power of the soul. But by being the eye of the soul, the mind it is, on one hand, moved by the soul, and on the other hand, the mind cannot stand still, namely the mind cannot but be in the exercise of the act of seeing.

[613] Even when the mind is attached only to the senses connected to the world and the mind doesn’t fill these senses up with the love for God, the mind still remains mind, but it is overwhelmed by the psychic senses related to the body, and therefore that mind is not actualized as mind. That’s why such a man is called as a “soul’s man”.

worthiness, and its undivided and independent brightness, and the self-control, or when the soul liberates itself from the attachments and from the bodily and from the soul's natural movements, and when it is found worthy of becoming from mind in potency to become mind in work, or it advances to the state of above nature and spiritual man, then it turns, steadfastly, back to itself in an not-deviated manner and through itself ascends not-impeded by any tie, wholly and consummately, to the understanding of God, by being shapeless, imageless, and simple[614]. This is for the Great Basil says also: "That mind that is not-scattered towards the external things and that is not poured through senses towards the world, that mind turns back to itself, and through itself that mind ascends to the understanding of God, and, by being surrounded and inundated by the beauty of the light of That One, that mind forgets even about itself"[615]. And thus, the mind regains and preserves its state "in the image" and "in the likeness", as one that is mind and through itself it unites itself and enter the cohabitation, in an understanding manner, with the godlike mind, namely with God[616]. And this is the circular work, or movement, namely the new ascension of the mind to it and the movement of turning back towards it and towards the union with it and through it with God, the only movement that is truly not-wandering and without mistake, as one that is free from any relation. This is an

[614] On one hand this state of the mind in work it is the mind's natural state, and on the other hand, it is an above nature state. This is a balancing we always found at the Holy Fathers. This is an above nature state for it achieved only by entering the ambiance of the endless simplicity of God, which gives the mind also its simplicity, open to the godlike infinity, by being filled up with this infinity. For the mind's simple being it is functionally actualized when encountering the above nature God, this mind's state is on one hand natural, and on the other hand it is above nature. Likewise, the bodily and the soul's movements, when they overwhelm the mind, they are naturally functional, but on the other hand they found their true being, of their natural being, when they are overwhelmed by the mind, and through the mind, by the godlike energies. This is because they only then discover the purpose they have been created for, as environments of irradiation of the godlike Ghost. The whole this thinking about mind is tributary to the Greek philosophy, but it becomes Christian when the unified, simple mind, it is understood as indefinite and unitary subject, open to the unitary and infinite godlike Subject.

[615] The light of God that baths the mind and inundates the mind, it is, in the same time, His beauty, or His beauty is smooth light. But who can describe the mystery of the beauty as light, or vice versa? The light covers the real depths and the rich, harmonious, and loving depths, they are beautiful.

[616] The mind regains His "image" and "likeness", for it unites itself with its model, and for it becomes the simple and endless understanding of The One Who is understanding and endless intelligible and simple, original understanding.

unmediated and above understanding union and a seeing above any sight[617].

75. About that godlike joy springing out of heart

It is, though, more appropriate to be said: Who will be able to describe the sweetness of the honey to those who haven't tasted it? But, one can say so much more about this godlike joy and about the joy from above nature and springing of life, which gushes up like always jumping water, out of the clean and true prayer of the heart. This is for, says God-Man Jesus: "He who will drink the water I will give it to him, he won't get thirsty forever. For the water I will give him, it becomes, within him, spring of jumping water, towards the eternal life" (Jn. 4: 14). And again: "If somebody gets thirsty, let him come to Me and drink. The one who believes in Me, rivers of living water will flow out of his heart". "And this He said – says the beloved disciple – about the Ghost, the ones who believe in Him, will receive" (Jn. 7: 39). The Great Paul says at his turn: "God sent the Ghost of His Son within our hearts, and the Ghost shouts out: Abba Father" (Gal. 4: 6).

76. This spiritual joy has many meanings and it still is nameless.

This spiritual and life springing joy, it has been called before, also as en-hypostatic illumination (started out of hypostasis) and most-luminous darkness, and indescribable beauty, and the highest good thing amongst the desired things, godlike view and showing, and deification; it remains untold

[617] The swirling and ascending movement of the mind towards itself, and through it towards God, and, through this, the mind's increasingly tight union with itself and with God, it has as model the spinning ascension of the angelic steps from around God, as described by Dionysus the Areopagite. The one who turns back towards himself, he turns towards God, and vice versa. In the endlessness of this circular ascending movement of the mind around itself and around God, and in the increasingly tight union with itself and with God, it is shown again that the mind is made "in the image" of God, by having in its union with God and endless work which the mind never finishes to understand it, because the mind never finishes to unite ever more with itself and with God. The human being remains, eternally, an apophatic abyss, for he endlessly deepens and enriches himself in the apophatic abyss of God. But this is a magnetic abyss, which attracts the mind to an always increasing understanding. But by understanding and seeing the endless character of this mystery, the mind's understanding is, in the same time, above understanding, and, likewise, its seeing is above any sight. Then we must not forget that the mind, by increasingly deeper gathering in itself, it gathers itself into the mind Christ, and Christ's mind though is human, it belongs to the godlike hypostasis, The One Who is thinking His godlike infinite, increasingly more, through His mind.

even after it has been expresses in some measure; it remains unknown even after it has been known and understood in some extent[618]. This is because, says the Great Dionysus: "We pray in order to reach within this supra-luminous darkness and to see and to know, through not-seeing and not-knowing, the One Who is above seeing and knowing, even (just) by not seeing and by not knowing[619]. For this is to really see and know and praise in an above being manner, on the One Who is above being, by removing all the existing things"[620]. And again: "the godlike darkness it is the godlike light, they say God is dwelling within, and that is unseen due to above everything and unapproachable brightness of it, for the overwhelming and above being overflowing of light. Within this, it reaches everyone who has been found worthy to truly know God even by not seeing Him, and by not knowing Him, once he has been elevated above seeing and knowing, just by knowing that he is beyond all the known with the senses and with the mind things"[621].

And the Great Basil says: "The rays of the godlike beauty are consummately untold and unspeakable. No word can describe them and no ear can receive them. Either you would speak about the morning star's rays, or about the shininess of the mood, either about the sunlight, all of these are helpless when it comes to compare that glory, and they are very much below the godlike light than the deep and moonless night in comparison to the cleanest noon. This beauty cannot be seen with the bodily eyes. This light can be cogitated only by the soul and by the mind. And if this light lightened some of the saints, [618] "Hypostatical illumination": for it has its spring in the hypostasis of Christ, and it is not an inconsistent apparition; it is the light of His love, of His openness towards man. "Most-luminous darkness: because of its intensity, the godlike light cannot be seen or understood by our soul's eyes, namely due to its infinity, the love of God cannot be defined. But in an insufficient way, it still is known, understood, and expressible. That's why it still is light. And it is light, for we feel good within it, and it fills up our existence and the existence of everybody.

[619] On one hand, through our knowing, seeing, and experiencing, the unknown, the unseen, and the inexpressible, it becomes transparent and known and expressed; on the other hand, even by not-knowing, by not-seeing, and by silence, we realize that we are knowing and seeing and making also other to feel and to know the unknown, the unseen, and the inexpressible One. It is a seeing of the unseen through not-seeing, but also a transparence of His through seeing.

the needle of the longing would leave within them an unfulfilled thirst. Being retained in this life, they were saying: "Woe to me, that my estrangement it has been prolonged" (Ps. 119: 5)[622]. And: "My soul got thirsty towards the powerful, towards the living God; when will I come and show myself before the face of my God?" (Ps. 41: 2)[623]; and: "It is much better to detach myself and to be with Christ" (Phil. 1: 23); and: "Now release Your servant, Master, according to Your word, in peace" (Luke 2: 29)[624]. They reckoned the life from here like being a prison. And because they couldn't get enough of the seeing of the godlike beauty, they wanted that the seeing of the shininess of the Lord to be extended to them in the whole eternal life"[625].

And the Speaker about God says: "Where is fear, there is the keeping of the commandment; where is the keeping of the commandment, there is the cleanness of the body by removing the cloud that envelops the soul and it doesn't allow the soul to cleanly see the godlike ray; where the cleanness is, there is the illumination; and the illumination it is the fulfilling of the longing of the ones who desire the high things, or the Highest One, or above anything that is high"[626]. The godlike Gregory of Nyssa says at his turn: "If you wash, by taking care of your life, the defilement laid down on your heart, godlike beauty it will rise up to you, as it happens to the iron. This is for when the rust from the iron it is cleaned up by polishing it, that thing that it has been black a little time before, it will spark in the sun, full of shininess, and it will spread rays. Likewise, the inward man, called heart by the Lord: when he will be cleaned up of the rust of the defilement, and his image - worn down by the cunning one – it will flourish again, that man will achieve again his likeness to the model and he will become good. This is for he who follows the Good One, he becomes also good like That One"[627].

And Saint Nilus says: "Bless is him who has achieved that nescience that is not-separated from prayer"[628]. Climacus says at his turn: "The depth (the abyss) of the crying it has seen the comforting; and the heart's cleanness it has received the illumination. The illumination it is an untold work, seen in an unseen way and understood in an unknown way"[629]. That's why, they are threefold blessed the ones who, like Mary of yore (Luke 10: 42), have chosen the good part and the good living, that spiritual living that won't be taken away from them, and they have been found worthy of the good likeness to God, as being engulfed by great and ecstatic joyfulness, to get out of themselves and, like the godlike Paul, to shout out full of enthusiasm: "The kindness and the love for people of our Savior God it has been shown to us, not out of the righteous deeds, done by us, but according to his mercy he has saved us with, through the bath of the rebirth and through the renewal of the Holy Ghost he has poured upon us plentifully through our Lord Jesus Christ the Savior[630]. We are being justified, thus, by His grace, to become inheritors, through hope, of the eternal life" (Tit. 3: 4-5). And again: "The One Who has anointed us and Who has sealed us and Who has given the earnest of the Ghost within our hearts" (2 Cor. 1: 22); and: "We have this treasure in clay pots, for the overwhelming of the power of God and not out of us" (2 Cor. 4: 7).

So lived they, and let it be to us - at least partially - through their prayers heard by God, to enjoy His mercy and His grace.

77. The one who wants to appropriately appease himself, he necessarily ought to be gentle in heart.

It is the time now for you, my son, to find out also this, before and after other things, like the one who wants to learn how to correctly shoot his arrow, he doesn't pull the cord

[628] Cf. J. Hausherr, Ignorance infinie, in "Orientalia Christiana Periodica" II (1936), pp. 315-362. This "nescience" means to forget of all the things which are not God; or the "imageless" knowing of God, above any knowledge. This nescience doesn't oppose to that "illumination" praised by Saint Basil and by Saint Gregory of Nazianzus. This is for the illumination means the presence and the work of the most-luminous darkness.

[629] The Ladder VII; G.P. 88, 813 B. The "abyss of the crying" it is a cry - not held between margins - the one who is crying he doesn't play with, and he thinks he won't be able to stop crying and he also thinks that he won't ever be able to come at the end of that crying.

[630] Not out of deeds without grace are we corrected, but by grace, which, though, it must bring fruits in our deeds, with our collaboration.

without a signal, likewise the one who wants to learn how to appease himself, he must have a sign to always be gentle in heart. This is for Saint Isidore said: "It doesn't suffice to live in ascesis for virtue, but you also must be balanced in your ascesis. This is because of, while striving ourselves in the struggle for a virtue, we wear that virtue with a disturbed heart, this isn't anything else but that we want to achieve that virtue and not wanting to do the things which help for the salvation"[631]. But the Prophet David said even before: "He will guide the gentle ones into judgment: He will teach the gentle one His ways" (Ps. 24: 9)[632]; and Sirach says: "To the gentle are the mysteries unveiled" (22: 7)[633]. Finally, the Most Sweet Jesus says: "Learn from Me that I am gentle and humble in My heart and you will find rest to your souls" (Mt. 11: 29). And: "Towards whom will I look at, if not towards the gentle and appeased one who trembles because of My words?"(Isa. 66: 2). And: "Blessed are the gentle ones, for those one will inherit the earth" (Mt. 5: 5), namely the heart, which makes a seed to bring fruits out of the grace, thirtyfold, sixtyfold, and hundredfold (Mk. 4: 20), as the man is in the group of the beginners, or of the middle advanced ones, or of the consummate ones. One like this doesn't disturb for, or he is not disturbed by anything, except the word of the awe.

78. How could we achieve the gentleness, and about the three powers of the soul: the wrath (the anger), the lust, and the cogitation.

You will easily achieve the gentleness, if you turn your soul from all things and you move your soul towards love and you keep your silence as much as you can, by nourishing yourself with measure and by always praying, as the Holy Fathers said: "Brake the wrath of your soul with the love, wither the lust of your soul with the restrain, and wing the cogitation of your soul with the prayer; and the light of your mind won't ever get darkened"[634]. And: "Braking the wrath it is done by keeping your silence at the right time; braking the irrational lust it is done through eating with measure; braking the disordered thoughts it is done by the prayer of one thought"[635]. And again: "Three are the virtues always bringing light to the mind: to not see the evilness of a man, to endure undisturbed the things coming upon us, and to do good to the ones who do evil to us. These three virtues give birth to other three even bigger virtues: thus, not seeing the evilness of a man it gives birth to love; enduring without being troubled the things coming upon us, it gives birth to gentleness; and doing good to the ones who do evil to us, it earns the pace". And Again: "Three are the more general moral states of the monks: the first one consists in not committing sins, the second one, in not letting the soul to tarry in passionate thoughts, and the third one, in looking with the mind, without passion, at the faces of the women and at the faces of the ones who upset us"[636].

79. You must quickly repent for any deviations happened to you and thus to wisely strengthen yourself for the future.

And if it happens to you to get troubled, or to slip in a falling and to deviate from what is appropriate, you must quickly reconcile with the one who has upset you and with the one who is upset with you and to repent in your soul and to cry and to shed tears and to rebuke yourself. And thus, to earn the taking heed for the future and to strengthen yourself with wisdom, as the Lord Jesus teaches us: "If you bring your offering to the altar and there you remember that your brother has something against you, let your offering there and go and first reconcile with your brother and then, by coming, bring your offering" (Mt. 5: 23-24). Apostle Paul says also: "The whole bitterness and wrath and shouting out, together with the whole evilness, let them cease amongst you. Make yourself good to each other, merciful, by giving to each other like God and Christ has given to us" (Eph. 4: 31-32). And: "Get angry and do not sin; let not the sun to set, upon your anger" (Eph. 4: 25); and: "Do not do justice by yourselves, my beloved ones, but give place to the anger of God" (Rom. 12: 19): and: "Do not let yourself to be defeated by the evil one, but defeat the evil with the good" (Rom.

12: 21). And these things have been said about the reconciling ones with others.

80. About slipping and repentance.

About slipping, Saint Isaac says: "Let's not get sad when we slip into mistake, but when we persevere in it. This is because the slipping happens sometimes even to the most consummate. But persevering into mistake it means full death. The sadness we get sad with, due to our slipping, it is counted to us instead of a clean and out of grace work. But the one who slips for the second time hoping that he will repent, he behaves cunningly with God. To this one his death comes unnoticed and he doesn't reach the time he hopes to fulfill the deeds of the virtue"[637]. And again: "We must know on each moment that during the twenty four hours of the night and of the day, we need to repent. And the meaning of the name repentance, as we have found it out from the true way the things are in, it is this: repentance is strained asking, on very moment, it is full of crushing of heart prayer for forgiveness for the past mistakes, in order to come closer to God; and sadness in order to protect us in the future situations"[638]. And again: "The repentance has been given to the people as grace after grace. This if for the repentance is the second birth out of God and, according to the earnest we have received out of faith, we also receive His gift [637] Quoted work, Word 60, pp. 243-244. Each moment must be taken seriously, like it would be the last one. We mustn't commit sins willingly, by hoping that we are going to have, in the future, time for repentance. We won't have the future time at our disposal, but God does. That's why we mustn't try to use the present time for working against God, by hoping that he is going to give us other moments for working for Him and for reconciling Him. If he has given us the present moment, it means that he has given us the condition for declaring ourselves in favor of Him, or against Him. Kierkegaard highlighted the importance of the present moment, for us to decide in favor of salvation, but arguing that that one who becomes accustomed to postpone the decision of doing good, he keeps postponing it (Der Augenblick). But the importance of the present moment it is related especially to the fact that it is the only moment God has surely given us. Therefore we must do the good in each present moment, for each of these moments is the last one that we surely have it as gift from God. If God gives us a long string of moments, He gives it us in this way, namely like a string of moments each of which seeming to be the last one, or it may be the last one, for He offers us the whole time like an occasion for declaring us in favor of God or against Him, by making out of that moment an occasion to fulfill His will, or not, of coming close to him, or to grow up or not in His likeness. This is the most profound idea of Saint Isaac.

[638] Quoted work, Word no. 50, p. 205.

(charisma) through repentance[639]. The repentance is the door of the mercy, open to the ones who are searching for it. Through this door we enter the godlike mercy and without this entrance we won't find mercy[640]. "This is because everybody committed sin, according to the godlike Scripture, being corrected, as a gift, by His grace" (Rom. 3: 24). The repentance is the second grace and it is born, in the heart, out of faith and fear. And the fear is the parental staff that guides us until we will reach the spiritual Paradise. And when we reach there, it leaves us and it gets far from us. This is for the Paradise is the love of God, within which there is the sweetness of all blessings"[641]. And again: "As it is not possible to cross the great sea without a ship or without a boat, likewise one cannot cross towards love without fear. The covered by salty steam sea, that is placed between us and the thought with the mind Paradise, we can cross it by the ship of the repentance, that has the fear as oarsmen. If these oarsmen do not steer the repentance's ship, through which this world's sea of crosses towards God, we sink in the covered by salty steams sea"[642].

81. Again about repentance, fear, love, crying, tears, and the self-rebuking.

"The repentance is the ship, the fear is this ship's whelm, the love is the godlike shore. The fear places us in the ship of the repentance and crosses us over the life's sea, that is covered by salty steams, towards the godlike shore, which is the love, by guiding us towards The One towards Whom cross all the ones who toil and who are burdened (Mt. 11: 28), through repentance.

[639] In a persevering and on any moment repentance, it is shown the fruit of gift of the grace we have received at Baptism, namely our answer to this gift. The repentance is a true charisma that grows up by grace and through our collaboration with the grace. The repentance is the perpetuated and continuously deepened fruit of the Baptism's grace. The Church considers, also because of this motif, the Mystery of the Repentance as one that gives us the grace of the continuous growth into Christ, as an always new help in this growth, or it leads us on the road of the consummation. The Protestantism, by not knowing about this new life in growing into Christ, naturally, it rejected this Mystery.

[640] Only through repentance we actively and deeply achieve the work of the grace, we become aware, in a painful feeling, of our sinfulness God has forgiven to us and he continuously forgives it to us, by feeling the need for His mercy on us and the coming of His mercy upon us.

[641] Quoted work, Word no. 72, p. 282. The godlike staff of the fear and of the repentance sprouting out of fear, it leads us to the Paradise of the love or of the full communion with God. There it is no longer used. This is for we have reached in the arms of God, where we no longer live anything else but only His love.

This is for when we reach the love, we have reached at God and our road has come to an end and we have crossed to that island from beyond world, where is the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost"[643].

And about that crying after God, the Savior says: "Blessed are them who cry, for they will be comforted" (Mt. 5: 4). And about tears, the same Pious Isaac says: "The tear accompanying the prayer are the sing of the mercy of God, the repented soul has been found worthy of[644], and of the fact that he has been received and he started to enter the land of the cleanness, through tears. This is because, if the thoughts do not get far from the perishing things and the thought do not cast away from them their hope in the world, and the despising of the self doesn't move within these thoughts, and if they do not start preparing the good victuals for the exit of the soul, and if the thoughts at the things from the future things do not start moving, the eyes won't be able to shed tears. This is for the tears spring out of the clean and not-scattered cogitation, out of the long, ceaseless, and not-scattered meditation, and out of the memory of any thin sin that has occurred in the mind and it saddens the heart with its memory. Out of these things the tears are multiplied and they constantly increase"[645].

And Climacus says: "Like the fire consumes the reed, likewise the tear cleans up every seen and thought stain"[646]. And [643] Saint Isaac the Syrian, Quoted work, Word no. 72, p. 283. Only the endless love of God can rest us.

[644] The tears are the sign of the man's deep repentance, but also of the comforting the man feels, for God has mercy on his repentance and He forgives him. Generally, the man cannot cry from himself, except because of inconsideration, of offences, of misfortunes, or of some unfavorable circumstances, all of these being egotistic motives. But the comforting crying is born within man out of the sincere mercy of another man for him; the more is this out of the mercy of God.

[645] Quote work, Word no. 33, p. 145. In the prolonged state of soul's repentance, there occurs within mind the memory of the thinnest sins and of the thoughts about sins, we have never thought at before. The fabric of forgetfulness that settles upon our brief daily conscience and upon our past gathered within us and kept in a state of unconsciousness, that fabric of forgetfulness becomes increasingly transparent and we see increasingly clearly in this pantry all the filthiness we have gathered in. In addition to these, even during the time of the repentance there can appear new thin sinner thoughts: of pride, of self-content about repenting, of being attached to something from the world, of weakening the thinking at God. The repentance is thus a struggle through which we notice the smallest impure details from within us; the repentance is the greatest introspective power, for it is upheld by the emotion of the fear for the judgment of God, and also by the love of God.

again: "Let's strive for the clean and non-cunning tears, by thinking at our detaching (death). For it isn't in this any deceit, or self-appreciation, but it is rather cleaning and advancing in the love for God and in washing up of the sins and advancing in the removal of the passions"[647]. And again: "Do not trust the springs of your tears, before the consummate cleanness. Because it mustn't be trusted the wine recently passed from grape presses into barrels"[648]. And again: "the tears due to fear (of God), they have in themselves their guarding (against sin). But the tears of the love, before the perfect love, they might be easily to steal out of some people, if the fire of the ceaseless remembering (of God) doesn't burn strongly within heart in the time of their working. And it is amazing how the humble tear it is the surest at its time"[649]. And again: "The tear for leaving the body (for the death) it gives birth to the fear; and when the fear gives birth to the lack of fear, the joy will appear; and when the joy reaches to be non-comprisable, it will spring out the flower of the pious love"[650].

82. About Taking Heed and about the Wisely Guarding.

Likewise, about the taking heed and about the wisely guarding of the self, the godlike Paul writes: "Take care and walk carefully, not like some unwise ones, but as some wise ones, by redeeming the time, for the days are bad" (Ephes. 5: 16). And Saint Isaac writes: "O, wisdom, how wonderful you are and how you foresee all the things from before happening, and from distance! Blessed is the one who has found you. That one has [647] Quoted work, quoted place.

[648] Quoted work, quoted place. In the tears of the one who isn't consummately clean of passions, there are mixed impure motives too: spite, hypocrisy etc. only out of a clean soul will flow clean tears.

[649] The Ladder VII; G.P. 88, 816. The tears caused by the fear of God, they aren't so worthy to be praised, as are those produced by the love for God. But the last ones can be more easily stolen that the first ones, until the memory isn't consummate. In this sense, the less worthy to be praised tears, those out of fear, are surer and more worthy to be praised than those of the love. The love is a high thing, and that's why it cannot be achieved so quickly in its fulness. Therefore, let's not reckon ourselves, too soon, as reached at the state of love, but let's rather reckon ourselves as much as possible in the state of the ones who have motifs of fear, because they aren't totally clean of sins.

[650] Place not found. The fear of God lasts until we reach His love. This love, once achieved, it will get the fear out. But here is expressed in a concise manner, the fact that the joy of the union with God, it has no longer fear within; and out of the joy for the union with God, it will be born the love. This is for any union produces, for the joy it brings, the love. Of course, the inverse can take place too. The union and the love cannot be easily separated.

liberated himself from the youth's carelessness. If somebody buys at a price, or with a small worry, the medicine for healing of great passion, he will do right. For this is the true philosophy (the love for wisdom), that somebody, in both too small and small things he does, to always take vigil. That one gather to himself a great resting, and he doesn't sleep, in order not to happen to him something from the enemy, but he cuts off the causes from before. He suffers for the small things a small pain, in order to remove through that pain, the bigger pain and thus preventing the bigger pain. That's why, the wiseman says: "make yourself watchful and awake for your life. This is because the sleep of the cogitation is a kinship and a way of the true death"[651]. Basil the Speaker says also, about the holy things: "If one is cumbersome in his small things, you won't trust him to be as he owes, in the big things"[652].

83. The One Who Works Quietude He Must Strive in All the Mentioned Thing; but First of All, Let Him Be Serene and Gentle and Let Him Strive in a Clean Manner to Call on Lord Jesus Christ within His Heart.

For all of these, you strive in all the mentioned aspects. But, before all, strive yourself to call with serenity and with gentleness and with a clean conscience, on Lord Jesus Christ, in the depth of your heart, as we've said. By this you'll have, by advancing on this way, the godlike grace resting within your soul. This is for Climacus says: "Let nobody ever dare to have any trace of resting, while he still is troubled by anger, by self-appreciation, by hypocrisy, and by keeping the evil in his mind; he must gain, firstly, the exit from all of these. And if somebody is clean of all of these, that one will know, by himself, what is beneficial to him. But, I reckon, this is impossible even to such a man"[653].

Actually, in this case, you'll have not only the grace resting within your soul, but also you soul consummately resting due to absence of the devils and of the passions which have been tormenting your soul before. This is for even if they disturb your soul again, they won't work any longer within your soul, for your soul won't be any longer attached to them, neither will your soul want pleasure from them.

[651] This text from Saint Isaac highlights the feature of the wisdom of being an insurance for a good future and of having, thus, a prophetic character. The wiseman knows the future of his good or bad fellow human, as the unwise man doesn't know it, for the unwise advances towards his future like he would be a blind man.

84. About the Good Death and which Gets the Man Out of Himself (Ecstatic) and about the Spiritual Beauty.

This is for the whole longing of such a man and the love from within his heart and which gets him out of himself and the whole his feeling, they are searching for the overwhelming and all-happy beauty, one called by the Holy Fathers as the peak of all the desired things. Actually, says the Great Basil: "When the love of the faith engulfs the soul, all kinds of wars seem to him as worthy to be laughed at, and all the ones who harass him due to the Desired One, they rather make him glad than hurt him". And again: "What could be more wonderful than the godlike beauty? What thought is more pleasant than the one about the greatness of God? What soul's longing is so powerful and unbearable than that one coming from God, within the soul that has been cleaned of all evilness and within which there is a true feeling like the one expressed as: "Am I wounded by love?"" (Song of Songs 2: 5)[654].

85. About Temptation and about the Withdrawal of God, in Order to Correct Us, and about the Forsaking by God, by Turning His Face Away from Us.

The temptation is, either because of God's lenience or because His withdrawal, in order to correct us, or because God turns His face away from someone. Why is that? It is in order to not let the mind get haughty for the found good. But, by being the mind wared and rebuked, to always increase in humbleness. This is the only way which the mind not only defeats in, the ones who war it by bringing it haughtiness, but the mind also becomes worthy of ceaselessly greater gifts, by advancing as much as it is possible to the human nature, despite being tied with impossible to undone chains and burdened by the body's burden, towards the consummation and the lack of passions according to Christ. This is for Saint Diadochus says: "The Lord Himself says that satan fell as a lightning from heavens (Lk. 10:

[654] Saint Basil the Great, Rules, in Detail, 2; G.P. 31: 909.

19), in order the one with an ugly face (disfigured)[655] not to look at the dwelling places of the holy angels. How comes then, that the one who isn't worthy of partaking with the good servants, that one still can have as his dwelling place, together with Christ, the human mind?[656] They will say that this happens due to godlike (withdrawal) lenience. And they won't tell more than that. But the withdrawal in order to be corrected, it doesn't deprive, by any means, the soul of godlike light, but, on many occasions, as we've said, the grace only hides its presence to the mind, in order to push the soul, through the bitterness caused by demons, to ask, with the whole fear and humbleness, for the help from God, by gradually knowing the evilness of his enemy[657]. It is like a mother removes from her chest the little child who doesn't observe the rule of nourishing, so that by being scared by the face of some unknown persons or by seeing some animals around, the little child turns back, with fear and with tears, to the mother's breast. And the withdrawal of God due to some deeds we've done to other people, it somehow surrenders, chained, to the demons, the soul that doesn't want to have God within. But we aren't "the sons of the rejection"

[655] Ο δυσειδής – the faceless one, the disfigured one, the one having an ugly face. Neither satan as creature cannot reject the image given him by God, but this image is now crooked, it is disfigured, and it is made ugly from inside. Nothing is uglier than a disfigured face, one bearing the features of the cunningness, or of many other kinds of sins. This is for this disfigured face shows, in the same time, how the disfigured one should have been, and how he has reached to be, through his evilness. It is both frightening and pitiful, such a face. satan has remained understanding spirit and endowed with rationality. But what perverse his intelligence is like, and what twisted his rationality is like!

[657] Whilst some of them only know about the simply withdrawal of God, and according to them the God's presence must be felt too, Diadochus know also about a withdrawal of God that is only a hiding of God, a hiding that makes the God's presence unfelt by the soul, but God doesn't totally exit that soul. In that case, God continues working within that soul, without being His presence directly felt, but only in deeds. The authors of the present writing impropriated this idea, that is characteristic also to Mark the Ascetic, who said that Christ is present in an unfelt manner, within man, since Baptism, but His presence become felt through the man's good deeds. But also, according to them, as also according to Diadochus, to Mark the Ascetic, and to Simeon the New Theologian, the normal and the desired state is that one when itself the presence of God is felt in an unmediated manner. The hiding or entering a presence that is unfelt by man, it is an exceptional state, it is some sort of pedagogical punishment applied to the sinner. The Catholic theologians, staring with Hausherr, they consider that this unfelt presence of God within the man's soul, it is the natural one, and they reproach to Diadochus, to Mark the Ascetic, and especially to Diadochus the New Theologian, some sort of Messalianism. This shows the extent the Catholics understand to, the Orthodox spirituality.

(Hebr. 10: 39) – God forbid that! – but we believe that we are true little children belonging to the grace of God, nourished through His small withdrawals and through often comforting from Him[658], in order, through God's kindness, us to reach the consummate man, on the measure of the age of Christ's fullness" (Ephes. 4: 13)[659].

And again: "The withdrawal for correction it brings much sadness and humbleness and a measured despair, to the soul, in order the soul's loving of vain glory part, and the soul's desire to impose himself to others, to come, as it is due, back to humbleness. So, the withdrawal brings, immediately, to the heart, the fear of God and tear of confession and of desiring much all-good silence[660]. And the withdrawal caused by God's turning away (from that soul), it allows the soul to be filled up with despair, with disbelieve, with anger, and with haughtiness. So, we must have the experience of both withdrawals (of God from us) and to come closer to God according to each one of these withdrawals. In the case of first one, we owe to give thanks to God like to the One Who has punished the pride of our conscience with that withdrawal towards comforting, in order to teach us, as a good Parent, the difference between virtue and sin. In the case of the second withdrawal, we must bring God the ceaseless confession of our sins, and not-absent tears, and an even greater forsaking from the evil things, so that, by increasing the toils, to be us able to obtain God's mercy, in order Him to look at our hearts as He did before.

But one must know that, when it starts the battle between the soul and satan in an essential clash, the grace hides, out of the lenience of God and in order to correct us, as [658] In Greek language the godlike grace if of feminine genre, so that it can be likened to a mother.

[659] Diadochus, quoted work, head no. 86; The Romanian Philokalia, volume I, p. 377.

[660] These are the positive fruits of the pedagogical withdrawal, or of the hiding of God's presence, but without living the person's soul. Where there aren't fruits, God has forsaken that soul for that soul has turned away from God. The salvation isn't brought by a present, but not-working, God; the salvation isn't brought in magical manner, without God showing His transforming power upon the human being, in the human being's deeds and feelings as a new human being. Thus, the pedagogical withdrawal of God it is withdrawal only in a certain sense. In another sense, God remains present and ever working, but His work is shown in fruits like these: fear of damnation, sadness for sins, and repentance. God can be seen through these, as a hidden but efficient factor. The soul feels God, on one hand as present, and on the other hand as withdrawn, because God is discontent for that soul's sins, and for God leads that soul, through these states and feelings, towards that soul's salvation.

we've said before, but the grace still helps the soul in an unknown manner – and this is for the grace wants to show the enemies that the soul's victory belongs only to the soul"[661].

And Saint Isaac the Syrian says: "It is not possible, to the man, to become wiser, without the temptations coming by God's lenience (those temptations being allowed by God) in the spiritual wars, and to know his Care-Taker, and to feel God and to secretly being strengthened his the faith in God, except through the power of the experience that soul has received it. This is because, when the grace seen that in that soul's cogitation has started, even for a little while and with a reduced intensity, the self-appreciation, and that that soul has starter to think at his own importance, that the grace immediately allows the temptations to get strengthened against that soul, until the human being will experience his weakness and he will run to God and ha will attach himself to God into humbleness. By this, the human being reaches the measure of the consummate human being (Ephes. 4: 13)[662], through faith and through hope in the Son of God, and that human being is elevated to love. This is for the love of God for the human being, it is made know as wonderful, when it is shown in the middle of the circumstances which interrupt the human being's hope[663]. God shows His power in the deliverance He gives it to the human being. This is because the human being never knows the God's power when [661] Diadochus, quoted work, head 87; The Romanian Philokalia, volume I, p. 378. It is here given a new motif of the grace's hiding: immediately the enemy starts the fight against the soul, the grace hides, in order to show that the victory will belong only to that soul. This is because, if this hiding encourages the enemy to intensify his attacks, by experiencing this withdrawal, the soul too, he strengthens his resistance and, in the same time, the soul increasing his praying to God, for help. Thus, actually, the victory is obtained in a more accentuated manner, by the soul, than when the grace of God works within soul in an unveiled manner. By this, the enemy sees that it isn't easy to bring a soul down, and the enemy is given a respect and a fear of attacking that soul anymore, and the enemy loses the confidence in his victory. The soul himself has in this an occasion for strengthening, and on the other hand, the soul has the occasion of knowing how menaced is without the help from God. That's why the spiritual human being receive the temptations with joy, and they give thanks to God for temptations. God wants, on one hand, to have heroic souls, and He wants to show satan the strength of the human soul, and on the other hand, God wants the souls to attach themselves even more to God, and the soul to impropriate to themselves, through this dramatic feeling too, the help God gives to them. It is here a tight and thin dialectics, as in all other human spiritual feelings too.

[662] Advancing to the measure of the spiritual age of Christ, it cannot be done on a smooth road, in a continuous serenity and joy, but it can be done only through hard and dramatic battles and adventures.

[663] You do love somebody the most, when that somebody has rescued you from a great danger.

that human being is resting and feeling comfortable[664]. And God has never shown His work in a felt manner, except in the country of the quietude and in a desert place, and in places lacking the encounters and the disturbance caused by the together living with the people"[665].

86. About Dispassion and about what the Human Dispassion Is.

In addition to these, we must add here also a special word about dispassion and about consummation; and then to put an end, in a short while, to this writing.

About these things, the Great Basil said: "The one who have made himself loving of God and who wants to have, even for a little bit, the God's dispassion, and who wants to taste God's spiritual holiness, and the joy and the gladness born out of these, let him strive to remove his thoughts from all material passion which disturbs his soul; let him look, with his eyes, in a clean and not-shadowed manner, at the godlike things and let him made himself as insatiable dwelling place of the light from there[666]. B y accustoming his soul to such a state, the human being becomes himself/herself, to the extent of the achieved likeness, as familiar to God, loving of God and all-wanting of God, and, as one who has fought a great and hard battle and [664] Only in situations which the human being has no longer any hope in, in the so-called "extreme-situations" (Grenzsituationen, as the philosopher Karl Jaspers called them), but that human being still doesn't totally renounce hoping for a miracle from God, if that miracle takes places, then God will limpidly show His power to that human being. Otherwise, the human being can confound that miracle to some nature's power, or to the human skillfulness. While you are healthy, you do not feel so easily the gift from God, as after you've been ill, and then you have regained your health after you have almost renounced to hope for it.

[665] Quoted work, Word 19, p. 73. The great miracles or the showing of the supra-natural power of God, they are shown in the places which the hermits are living at, in quietude. But there is also a quietude's internal "country", which is found by some believers, especially on the moments of "extreme-situations", when their last hope is God. In such situations the believers have detached themselves from everybody and from all things, because of seeing everybody and all the things as powerless. In such extreme situations the believers are alone in front of God, in a state that, though it is a high tension there, there is, in the same time, a great "quietude" too, for nothing is of interest any longer, and nothing troubles the believers anymore. In such situations the human being is wholly only a hope directed towards God, and he lets himself totally to God's will. And even if the wonder askes for by the human being, it wouldn't take place, that human being still lets himself to God's will. "Let God do whatever he wants! What ever that would be, I feel it as being His will".

[666] The human being as dwelling place of God, he is, in the same time, a subject wanting to comprise as much as possible out of God. So that, the human being is a dwelling place that cannot be satiated with the presence of God.

who has come out of the mixing with the matter, he can speak about God with a clean cogitation, a cogitation separated from any mixing with the bodily passions"[667]. We end here our considerations on dispassion.

And about what the human dispassion is, Saint Isaac wrote like this: "The dispassion doesn't mean no longer feeling the passions, but it means no longer accepting them. This is for, due to many and diverse virtues achieved by some people, shown or hidden virtues, the passions have weakened within those people so that the passions can no longer easily rebel against the soul[668]. And the cogitation no longer needs to always take heed to passions, for the cogitation is all the time full with the godlike meanings, by occupying itself with observing the best behaving ways and by behaving in that manner. But when the passions start moving and disturbing, the cogitation is suddenly kidnapped by the passions' vicinity, because of not9icing that something has occurred within mind. So, the passions remain within is as non-working. So said the Blessed Mark: "The mind, by fulfilling, through the grace of God, the virtues' deeds, and by coming closer to knowledge, it feels only a little from the evil's part, and from the irrational impulse from within soul"[669]. For [667] Place not found. The human beings' state of dispassion, as characteristic to the saints, it is so much praised in the churchly songs dedicated to them; the dispassion could be named, by using a current name, and more appropriately to the people who cannot reach it except by removing their passions, as passions removal (removal of passions, absence of passions). It is not a neutral state, but it is a great power of cleanness and love, a great freedom from all the inferior and egotistic impulses. That's why, on this state it depends also the power of "seeing" God, of intensely feeling His presence.

[668] The will is a factor for accepting the passions, the factor making the passions as personal. Until the passions aren't accepted by own will, the passions can move within a person, or around the area surrounding the person's nucleus, but the passions still don't belong to that person. But it is not good to let the passions tarry too much within a person, at that person will's door. This is because the door, when forced too much, it may cede. The virtues must be strengthened against the passions, in order the virtues to become like some soldiers coming out and rejecting the passions.

[669] According to Ammann, quoted work, p. 143, note 1, it would be not about Mark, but about Evagrius. Ammann quotes A. J. Wensink, Mystic treaties by Isaac of Nineveh, Amsterdam, 1923, p. 345. The quotes from Saint Isaac describes a very refined process from within mind. The cogitation, as mind's function, it doesn't cogitate at passions until the passions move with disturbance within the soul. When the passions disturb the soul, the cogitation's attention is drawn by them, or by the tempting image projected by the passion within mind. But the mind that has been occupying itself until then, with clean cogitation, it sinks even more into those clean cogitations and the passion remain powerless and they cannot influence the cogitation. This is for those cogitations are so high and so beautiful, that they make the cogitation not feeling the temptations offered by the passions.

that, the sight being within them, it easily and quickly takes over each one of them and it guides them towards the wonderful things related to it. And through this, they will be much enriched in their views and their cogitation won't ever be deprived of the knowledge's content; and they won't ever be outside the things seeded within them by the fruit of the Ghost. And by cultivating this habit for many years, they will be erased the memories which move within their souls the passion and the strength of the devil's mastery. This is for when the soul doesn't' negotiate with the passions and when the soul doesn't accept the thought starting from within passions, for the soul is being ceaselessly occupied with another preoccupation, the strength of the passions' nails cannot grab the soul's feeling within the spiritual people"[670].

And Saint Diadochus said: "The dispassion doesn't mean not being us warred by demons, because for that, according to the Apostle, we should get out from the world" (1 Cor. 5: 10), but the dispassion means to remain us undefeated, even when we are warred by demons. This is for the warriors who wear breastplates, though they are the target of the enemies' arrows and they hear the noise of the arrows hitting them, and they even have a close sight of the arrows sent against them, they still aren't wounded, due to the strength of their military vestments; for, by being those ones defended with breastplates, despite being warred, they remain undefeated. And us, through the whole light's armor and through the salvation crest, armed with all the virtues, we defeat the darken gangs of the demons (Ephes. 6: 11, 17). This is for the cleanness comes not only from not committing the evil deeds, but it comes also out of the complete defeat of the evil things by accomplishing the good things"[671].

Saint Maximos spoke about a fourfold dispassion, for he told: "I call as first dispassion the impulse towards a body's sin, but that impulse isn't satisfied with the deed; I call as the second dispassion the total rejection of the passionate thoughts from within soul, and that withers the passion's movement from the first dispassion; I call as the third dispassion the total motionlessness of the lust towards passions, due to which the second dispassion is produced too, one consisting of the thoughts' cleanness; and I call as the fourth dispassion the total rejection of all the sensitive imaginings from the cogitation, out of which it is born the third dispassion, by the fact that it hasn't the imaginings of the sensitive things as causes which to produce within it the images of the passions"[672]. And again: "the dispassion is the peaceful state of the soul, due to which the soul is difficult to be moved towards sin"[673].

87. Again about Dispassion and Consummation.

And Saint Ephrem speaks about dispassion and consummation like this: "The dispassionate ones, by stretching above themselves without ever get satiated, they pursuit the endless consummation. This is for the eternal good things don't have an end"[674]. And again: "The dispassion is consummate [672] Saint Maximos the Confessor, The Five Hundred Heads, III, 36; G.P. 90, 968 A. The consummate dispassion, or the fourth one, it is the absence of the sensitive images from within cogitation. By being these images absent, the lust which the third dispassion gets rid of, it doesn't have the possibility to give images to the passions which it could move towards. For the lust doesn't move towards such images, there are absent also the passionate thoughts from the second dispassion. And for those thoughts are absent, neither the sin with the deed is committed, and that constitutes the first dispassion. Actually, the dispassion is reduced, in its last instance, to emptying the mind of sensitive images, as also the highest and direct knowing of God Who is without images. Thus, the dispassion and the unmediated knowledge of God, they coincide. But there is also a dispassion that looks at things, at people, and at images, but without passion. But that is more fragile, more unsure, and it is the third dispassion, namely second to the highest dispassion. From here comes the opposite too: the passions start from senses, in order to ascend through images to the mind, where they descend from, through body, as formed passions.

[673] The same one, Heads about Love, I, 36; G.P. 90, 968 A; The Romanian Philokalia, I, p. 42.

[674] Place not found. The dispassion is defined here in a positive sense, as consummation. And as such, the dispassion is reckoned as having no end, as the consummation doesn't have an end too. This is for the consummation means enriching in all the good things, and those things have no end. As such, the dispassion isn't indifferent to other people, but it is a clean kindness. Only the passionate one minds his own things, of he suffers because of others not offering him enough means, or they do not offer themselves as sufficient means for the passionate one's pleasures. The dispassionate one isn't indifferent to others, but he duffers relatedly to them, but not because the others do not offer him enough means for his pleasures, but he only suffers because those ones suffer. The passionate one has in common with the other people, the fact that he suffers like those ones too, in being ceaselessly insatiate in their search for pleasure, but he is in a separation from them and he is indifferent to them. The dispassionate one suffers for others' sufferance, and not for himself. The dispassionate is in a real communion, in a real partaking to others' sufferance. The one liberated from the pleasure-passions, he suffers - for others - of clean, painful, non-egotistic passion. In this regard we have the supreme model in Christ. But for the sufferance for others, it ceases when those ones no longer suffer, and for the love which the sufferance for other springs out from, it has no end, the consummation connected with the dispassion has not end too. God and the people can eternally be in love, and regarding the extent of the human power, but it is endless (not-consummate), as one that always it elevated itself, through the ceaseless adding which ceaselessly ascend through the ascensions towards God"[675].

Likewise says Saint Nilus the Ascetic, about consummation: "We must understand two consummations: one temporary and one eternal. About the last one, the Apostle writes: "And when it will come the consummate one, it will cease what is partial" (1 Cor. 13" 10). The word: "When the consummate one will come" it means that here (on earth) we cannot comprise the godlike consummation[676]. And again: "Two consummations were experienced by Saint Paul and he knows the same human being as consummate and non-consummate. For the present life he calls that human being as consummate, and relatedly to the one Who is really consummate, he calls the human being as non-consummate" (Philip. 3: 12). And a little further: "So, how many as we are consummate, let us think at tis" (Phil. 3: 15)[677].

88. About the Tendency towards Passion, about the Pleasure Caused by Passion, about Accepting the Passion, and about Dispassion.

But Saint Elijah the Edict, he says too: "The tendency towards passion is the bad matter of the body; the pleasure provided by passion is the bad matter of the soul; accepting the passion is the bad matter of the mind. The organ of the first one it is the touch; the organs of the other one, are the other senses; and the organ of the last one it is the contrary disposition"[678]. And again: "The one feeling pleasure for passion, he is close to increasingly fuller. The love from within the dispassionate ones it can eternally grow, for it is being nourished out of God's love, a love that is inexhaustible and borderless.

[678] Collection of sentences, 71; G.P. 127, 1142; The Romanian Philokalia, volume IV, p. 291. The body tends towards passion. This is a content of the body's movement. This tendency drives the body towards feeling the wanted things. The soul feels pleasure for passion. This is the content of the soul's movements until the soul isn't free of passions. The impulse towards passion, it has taken through soul, a more conscious character. The soul tends towards fulfilling the passionate pleasure through other more conscious senses (sight, hearing etc.). The mind is the one deciding to accept the passion. And the mind does that in some freedom. The organ the mind works through, it is a disposition contrary to the good, or to God. Here are described three phases in passions' development.

the one who tends towards passion; and the one receiving the passion, he is close to the one feeling pleasure for passion. But the dispassionate (without passion) thought is far from both of them"[679].

89. Who is the one tending towards passion, who is the one feeling pleasure for passion, who is the one accepting the passion, and who is the dispassionate one (who lack the passions, who has no passion)? About the healing of the first ones and about producing the last one.

"The passionate one is that one who has the impulse towards sin stronger than his rationality, even if he doesn't commit sin for now. He has the pleasure for passion, who has the work of the sin weaker than the rationality, even if the suffers it externally[680]. Receiving the passion is the one who is rather free than he is slave to the means (to the sin). And dispassionate is the one who doesn't receive anything from the diversity of these ones"[681].

Likewise, about the healing of the first ones he says the following things: "The tendency towards passion, it can be removed from the soul, by fasting and by praying; the pleasure produced by passion, it can be removed by taking vigil and by keeping silence; the accepting of the passion can be removed by appeasing and by taking heed. And the dispassion is born out of remembering God"[682].

The addiction of the body can be healed through the main body's virtues; the restraint and the prayer, as act of will, exercised upon the body, and as act of calling upon God – and act also stopping the body from passionate deeds; the pleasure for passions, it can be healed by taking vigil and by keeping the silence, as acts of will exercised upon the soul; the accepting of the passion it can be healed by appeasement and by taking heed, as Acts of will exercised upon cogitation. The dispassion is born out of remembering God, for that gives the mind an imageless content, and it keeps the mind hanging on God's beauty and on His endless meaning.

90. About Faith, about Hope, and about Love.

But the beginning, the middle, and the end, and, if you want to say so, also the givers and the guides towards all the good things (virtues) are: the faith, the hope, and the love, this threefold rope, intertwined by God; and the love is more than all of them, for "God is love" (1 Jn. 4: 8). That's why, it wouldn't be fair if we didn't fulfill the need of the present work also through love. Better said, according to Saint Isaac the Syrian: "the consummation of many fruits of the Ghost, it is received by somebody when he is found worthy of consummate love"[683]. Actually, writes Saint John Climacus: "After all the things mentioned before, there remain these three ones: the faith, the hope, and the love. "And greater than all of them, it is the love" (1 Cor. 13: 13). This is for "God is love" (1 Jn. 4: 8). That's why I see the first one as a sunray, I se the second one as luminous light, and I see the third one as a circle. But all of them are a unique luminous light and brightness. This is for the first one can make them and it can build them up; the second one embraces the mercy from God and it doesn't shame us[684]. And the third one never fails, neither it ceases seeing (contemplating), nor it lets the one nourished by it to be satisfied with its insanity"[685].

[683] Saint Isaac the Syrian, quoted work, Word no. 85, p. 384. The consummation consists of love. The love is the highest amongst virtues. And for somebody usually reaches the love by crossing through all virtues, the love is too, a culmination of each virtue, and the love is also in harmony with all virtues. One won't have consummate love, if he is greedy, if he is haughty, and if he is lazy, or if he is impatient and if he doesn't have humbleness. All the virtues brought to their peak in synthesis, they mean love, or they are animated by love.

[684] Through faith, we can do everything; the faith is strength in working. Through hope, we embrace with our sight the whole endless mercy from God, with all its powers; the hope never shames us before others, because we had hope; this is for even if it hasn't become reality what we hoped for, something else still is fulfilled to us; if something hasn't been fulfilled to us today, we will hope that it will be fulfilled tomorrow; and, in the last instance, all the things will be fulfilled to us in the eternal life; then we will be proven to everybody that we haven't remained ashamed.

[685] The Ladder XXX; G.P. 88, 1153-1156. The love never finishes deepening itself in looking at the infinite mystery of the fellow human whom it loves, or in the infinite mystery of God. The one who loves somebody, by forgetting about all things and by crossing over all things, he seems "insane" to others. But he has founded in that fellow human the priceless "treasure", which is unseen by others. There were and there are so many human beings "insane" for Christ, able to sacrifice everything for Him, even their life on earth, for they are sure they will achieve the new life on the plan of the eternity (Matthew 10: 39). The beloved one is more valuable than himself the one who loves him.

And again: "The word about love is known to the angels; and to them, on the ground of working the illumination, God is love" (1 Jn. 4: 8). But the one who wants to define this word, he is like a blind one counting the sea's sand. The love, according to quality, it is the likeness to God, as much as it is possible to mortals; according to the work, it is a drunkenness of the soul[686]; and according to the feature, it is the source of the faith, the endless deep (the abyss) of the long-suffering, it is the humbleness' sea. The live is, mainly, the total rejection of the thinking-against, for the love doesn't reckon the evil (1 Cor. 13: 5). The love, the dispassion, and the adoption, they differ only according to their names. Like the luminous light and the fire and the flame are gathered in one work, you think likewise at these ones"[687].

And Saint Diadochus says: "Reckon, brother, that to each spiritual view it precedes the faith, the hope, and the love, but mostly the love. This is for the first ones teach us to cherish all the seen goods. But the love unites the soul himself with the virtues of God, by intuiting - through a feeling of the mind – the unseen God"[688]. And again: "Other is the soul's natural love and other is that love added to it form the Holy Ghost. The first one moves by our will, gradually, when we want. That's why, it is too, easily kidnapped by the evil ghosts, when we do not hold that love strongly, with our will. The second one it sets so much the soul in fire, towards loving God, so that all the parts of our soul are attached to the untold kindness of the longing for God, in an endless simplicity of the feeling[689]. The mind, that has reached [686] Like the love can be reckoned as "insanity", likewise it can be reckoned as "drunkenness". Through drunkenness it is highlighted, even more, its enthusiasm. The love sees the beloved one so beautiful, so that all the other things are nothing in comparison to that one. It is like the drunk one sees the reality differently than other people who are sober. But the love is a "sober drunkenness" (Saint Gregory of Nyssa), for the one who loves is the only one seeing the beloved one as that one really is; and the one who loves, he can make the beloved one to be, as he sees him.

[687] The Ladder XXX; G.P. 88, 1156. We see here affirmed the idea that the dispassion isn't a passive state, but it is a state of fiery love, a state contrary to the egotistical chocking that belong to the passionate one. The dispassionate one, he loves God, as he is God's son, as sone who, without being God's son according to God's nature, he still has been adopted through love, so that's why he has a greater reason to love God.

[688] Quoted work, head. no. 1; The Romanian Philokalia, volume I, p. 335.

[689] Only the simplicity is endless, for it comprises everything in a concentrated mode. "The simplicity of the feeling" it is the most intense feeling, for it isn't divided in differentiated and diminished feelings. The simplicity is the concentration in a unit, of all soul's powers and senses, which have, through God, an endless depth and richness.

then as one that has given birth out of the spiritual light of the grace, it has become source of love and of joy"[690].

Saint Isaac says, at his turn: "The love produces by some things, it is like a small candle, nourished with oil, and likewise it is its light; or it is like a creek, nourished with rain, and whose flowing stops when is misses the content that upholds it. But the love that has God as its cause, it is like a water source which flowing never interrupts. This is for only God is its source and its inexhaustible content"[691]. And when asked: "When one reaches at the consummation of the many fruits of the Ghost?", he answered: "That is when somebody is found worthy of the consummate love of God". And asked again: "Where can someone know from, that he has reached at that?", he said: "When the remembrance of God moves within his cogitation, immediately his heart moves in the love for God and out of his eyes start flowing plenty of tears. This is for the love usually brings tears when recalls about the beloved ones. Being thus, that one never stops crying, for he never lacks the content that brings him to the remembrance of God. So that he is in dialogue with God even when sleeping. This is for it is a characteristic of the love to produce such things. And this is the people's consummation in this life of theirs"[692].

And he said again: "The love from God is a guide by nature, and when it comes within somebody, without measure, [690] Quoted work, head no. 34p; The Romanian Philokalia, volume I, p. 348. The capacity of intimate union and of collaboration, between the mind and the grace, or between our subject and the godlike Subject, it is so great, that it is compared to the union in which the godlike Subject, by seeding His grace within our subject, it sets our soul in a state of pregnancy, our soul developing the grace's seed, with the soul's powers which are thus set in movement, in fruits of love and of joy. The human subject doesn't passively receive the grace, but the soul develops the grace, as the grace make the human subject fruitful.

[691] Quoted work, Word no. 33, p. 143. Our natural love is born out of some deeds done to us by somebody, or out of some natural ties. Such a love gets, sooner or later, tired, and it weakens, more or less. The love that God has for us it never weakens, for God has no interest which we to serve to. That's why His love lasts eternally and equally intense, and it upholds our love for Him, as always tireless and not-disappointed.

[692] Saint Isaac the Syrian, quoted work, Word no. 85, p. 348. So, the consummation of the human being consists of the love for God. The love belongs to the heart and the love is shown in tears, when it is a powerful feeling, and it is not only a theoretical conviction. But the heart is set in fire by love and it is melted down in tears, when in cogitation moves the remembrance of God. So, the heart doesn't work without cogitation. Of course, the name of God remembered into cogitation, it touches the heart to a love to tears. So, neither the cogitation at God is a purely theoretical cogitation. Out of all of these it comes that the ceaselessly remembered God, He is thus remembered for Hs is loved as a loving Person, and this is for a person awakens the love, within another person, through his love.

it makes that soul to get out of itself (ecstatic). That's why the heart of the one who feels that love, it cannot comprise that love and still remain as it is, but, depending on the quality and of the love that has come within him, he sees within himself an unusual change. And the felt signs of that love are these ones: the face of the one having that love, it becomes as fire and full of joy and his body is being warmed up; the fear and the shy are removed from him and he becomes as one out of himself (ecstatic); and the power that gathers his mind in itself, it leaves him, and he becomes a one who went out of his mind[693]; he/she reckons the most fearsome death as a joy; and never his/her mind gets interrupted from understanding the heavenly things; and, to the absent one, he/she speaks as the absent one would be present, despite that one not being seen by anybody[694]. His natural knowledge and sight have vanished and he/she no longer feels his/her own movement, when he/she moves amongst things; even if he/she does something, he/she doesn't feel what he/she is doing, for he/she has his/her mind occupied with the sight of some things which aren't present. And his/her [693] The mysterious connection between soul and body it is shown also in the warmth comprising the body of the one who is conquered by a great love. He is like one who has gone beyond himself, as one who has forgotten about himself; the whole his attention is focused upon the beloved person. He is like one who has gone out of his mind, but not in a bad sense, namely by trespassing the good rules of the society, but in a good sense, being able to renounce at everything that the "sapient" man searches for, in the egotistic meaning of the word. Such a person is able to give his/her life for the beloved One. "Now I am no longer living, but Christ lives within me" (Gal. 3: 20). He lives for another self, and not for his own self. Christ's Self has become his/her self. While within the "natural" human being, the self as subject, it is identical to the object of his worry, within the human being filled up with the love from above, the "self" as subject remains, but the self as object of his love is another, it is the one loves by Christ's Self. In the same time, he is maintained as loving self; within him there isn't an egotistic reduplication, but there is a real twoness: I as subject, and you as the one whom I am existing for. This is the "going out" from the self, the exit from the mind from himself, namely the elevation of the mind for another. The one who love no longer fears to renounce to himself, neither is him/her ashamed to behave like that, even if he is reckoned by other as insane. But in the fact that the self as subject still remains, it is shown that though, even the most total love, it doesn't mean confounding with another in impersonal, but it is about a bi-personal unit. But you have become dominant within me by the will of my own self, and you have installed yourself within my own self with a major role, and hugely increasing the powers of my own self that has received you.

[694] He/she speaks to the beloved absent as to a present person, for he/she has that one within himself/herself, and the beloved absent speaks to him/her as a present person. The space has vanished for the ones who love each other; the space has become a simple appearance. The other people see the space - he/she doesn't. The "insanity" of the one who loves it consists of this.

cogitation is always occupied with the Other[695]. Of this spiritual drunkenness were yore the Apostles and the Martyrs filled with: the first ones crossed (mastered by it) the whole world, toiling and being they mocked (1 Tim. 4: 10); the last ones, enduring the cutting off, of their limbs, they shed their blood as the water; and while enduring the most dreadful torments, they didn't lose their courage, but they manly endured everything. And, while being wise, they were reckoned as mindless (2 Cor. 11: 38). And others wandered through wilderness, and through mountains, and through the caves of the earth (Hebr. 11: 38), restlessly, they who were the most sapient"[696]. Make us too, God, worthy to reach this insanity.

91. About the Holy Impartation and about the Greatness of the Good Things which Are Caused to Us by Continuous Impartation, Done with a Clean Conscience.

Nothing helps us so much and nothing contributes so much to the cleaning of our soul and to the illumination of our mind and to the sanctification of our body and to transforming both our body and soul towards a mode godlike state and to immortality, and even to defeat the passions and the demons, or, better said, to our above-nature union, with God, as the continuous impartation does it, done with a clean heart and with a clean feeling, as much as it is possible to the human being, with the most-clean and immortal and of-life-maker Mysteries, with itself the honored Body and Blood of the Lord and God and our Savior Jesus. For that, it is as beneficial as one can get, to specially speak about those too, in the present description, and then to end our speech. And this is proven not only by what the Holy Fathers said, but, much more, by the words of the Life Himself, and of the Truth Himself. For He says: "I am the bread of the life" (Jn. 6: 48). "And this is the bread descending from heavens, for the one who eats out of it, not to die. I am the living bread descended from heavens. If somebody eats this bread, that one will be alive forever. And the bread that I will give, it is My body, that I give it for the life of the world" (Jn. 6: 50-52). And: "If you do not eat the body of the Son of Man and if you do not drink His blood, you won't have life within you. The one who eats My body and who drinks My blood, that one has eternal life" (Jn. 6: 53-54). And again: "This is for My body is true food and My blood is true drink. The one who eats My body and who drinks My blood, that one remains into Me and I into him. Like the living Father has sent Me, I am living too, through the Father; and the one who eats Me, that one will be alive through Me. This is the bread descended from heavens and the one who eats this bread of Mine, that one will be alive forever (Jn. 6: 53, 58).

[695] Knowing and seeing the things from around, the movement amongst the things, they are done without that person to be aware of them, for that person's attention is totally focused on the beloved One, but Who is unseen to the natural sight. Poet Coșbuc says about the mother who were preoccupied with her absent son: "You dropped the spindle, saying nothing…. And the girls wonder about that". "You fall asleep thinking at me, in order you to dream as I do". (Poet George Coșbuc was a great Romanian poet, writing especially about countryside aspects and about the village's world, E. l. t.'s n.)

And, of-Christ-bearer, Paul, he says the followings: "Brothers, I have received from the Lord, what I have taught you too, that the Lord Jesus, in the night He was betrayed, He took the bread and, after blessing it, He broke it, and He said: "Take, eat, this is My body, that is being broken for you; do this into My remembrance". Also, He took the cup, after dinner, saying: "This cup is the new covenant, into My blood. You do this, each time you will drink, into My remembrance. For, on each time you will eat this bread and you will drink this cup, you will be heralding the death of the Lord, until He will come. So, anybody who unworthily eats this bread and drinks the Lord's cup, guilty will be him of the Lord's body and blood. Let the man inquire himself, and so him to eat this bread and to drink this cup. This is because the one who eats and who drinks unworthily, he eats and he drinks judgment upon himself, because of not honoring the Lord's body. Therefore, amongst you are many helpless and ill, and many of them die. This is for, if we judged ourselves, we wouldn't be judged. And by being judged by the Lord, we are corrected, in order not to be condemned with the world" (1 Cor. 11: 23-33).

92. It is Necessary to Know the Wonder of the Holy Mysteries, and what that Wonder Is, what It Has Been Given Us for, and what We Benefit of It.

This is for Saint Chrysostom writes too, that "it is necessary to learn what the wonder of the Mysteries is, and what we have been given with it for, and what its benefit is. We are a body (Rom. 12: 5) and limbs of our Lord Jesus Christ, and out of His bones (Ephes. 5: 30). And the ones who have found out these, let them follow the said things. So, in order this not to be done only through love, but also with the work itself, let's united ourselves, by eating it, with that body that He has given us, for he wanted to show us the longing He has for us[697]. For this, He has united Himself with us, and He has given us His body, in order us to become a body united with the Head. This is characteristic to the ones who love strongly. This thing let Job us to understand, when speaking about his familiar friends, who loved him in an overwhelming manner, so that they were saying, when expressing their love: "Who will give us the possibility to have enough of his flesh?" (Job 31: 31). That's why, Christ did the same thing, elevating us to an even greater friendship, and showing us His longing for us, for He doesn't give Himself to the ones who want Him only in order they to see Him, but also in order they to touch Him, to eat Him, and to be they planted in His body and to be they united with Him, in order they to satisfy their whole longing"[698].

And again: "The ones imparted with the all-holy Body and with the honored Blood, they stay amongst Angels and Archangels and amongst the Powers from above, and they are dressed up in the itself imperial vestment of Christ, and they have the spiritual weapons. And, by saying this, I still haven't said anything: for they have put on the Emperor Himself. But as great and fearsome and wonderful is this Mystery, equally much you will must come close to it with cleanness, if you want to come close to your salvation. This is because if you come close to it with an evil conscience, you will come close to damnation and to punishment. This is because "the one who eats and who drinks unworthily the Body and the Blood of the Lord, that one eats to himself and drinks to himself judgment." (1 Cor. 11: 27). This is because, if the ones who stain their imperial purple, are punished like are the ones who shred it, it isn't inappropriate, by any means, that also the ones who receive the Body with unclean thought, to suffer the same punishment like the ones who broke it through spikes. Regarding the fearsome punishment, Paul showed that: "The one who transgressed the Moses's law died on the ground of two or three witnesses.

[697] Not only through love as feeling, it is upheld the communion within the Church, regardless some people would highlight this, but also through an objective power, and ontological power, a godlike power, coming to us through Christ's body. By this, it attaches even our bodies into this union.

[698] Saint John Chrysostom, Homily no. 46 to John, 2, towards the end; G.P. 59, 260.

Reckon, what greater punishment will be found worthy of, the one who disregarded the Son of God, and who reckoned, as an unimportant thing, the Blood of the New Covenant, which the New Covenant has been sanctified through?" (Hebr. 10: 29)[699]. Or: "As many of us, therefore, we are imparted with this Body, as many of us taste this Blood, let's know that we taste out of That One Who sits above, and Who is worshipped by Angels - we taste out of the One having to the limitless power. O, how many roads lead to our salvation! He has made us His Body. He has given us His Body. But none of these gets us far from our evil deeds. O, what indolence, o, what insensitiveness!"[700]. And again: "A wonderful priest told me that he was found worthy of seeing and hearing this: that the ones who will pass away from here, after they have been imparted with the Mysteries with a clean conscience, when they will die, the Angels will take them from here in a procession, for the One Whom they will have been imparted with"[701].

And the godlike Damascene says: "Because we are twofold and composed, it must our birth to be twofold too; likewise, the coat must be twofold too. We have been given our birth through water and Ghost. And the food is itself the bread of the life, our Lord Jesus Christ, the One Who descended from heavens". "As at Baptism, for the people use to wash themselves with water and to anoint themselves with oil, He has united the oil with the water of the Ghost too, and it has made it as the bath of the birth anew, likewise, for we use to eat bread and to drink wine, He has united with them His godhead and he has made them as His body and Blood, for through the usual and according to the nature ones, us to reach in the above-nature ones"[702]. "His body is truly united with the godhead, but I mean His body out of Virgin, and not a body descended from heavens, and the bread and the wine are transformed in Themselves the Body and the Blood of God. But, if you try to find out what is the mode like, which these ones take place in, it is enough to you to hear that this happens through the Holy Ghost, like the Word has brought to existence Itself His Body, out of the Holy Birth-Giver of God, through the Holy Ghost; we do not know anything more, except that the Word of God is true and working and almighty, and the mode is impenetrable". "To the ones who are imparted worthily, this is done therefore, towards the forgiveness of their sins and towards eternal life and guarding their souls and bodies; and to the one who are imparted unworthily, towards damnation and punishment". "Both the bread and the wine aren't image of the Christ's Body and Blood, God forbid that, but the bread and the wine are Themselves the Body and the Blood of Christ. This is for "My Body, He says, it is true food and My Blood is true drink" (Jn. 6: 55). "For there are the Body and the Blood of Christ entering the composition (the constitution) of our soul and body, by not being melted, but not being broken, by not passing into what we eliminate, but by remaining without our being, as reason for our preservation, as means for cleaning the whole defilement[703]. Even if the gold has been stained, it can be cleaned through the burning of the judgment, in order us not to be condemned in the future age, together with the world (1 Cor. 11: 52)[704]. BY being us cleaned

[703] The Body of Christ, which we receive when being administrated the Holy Impartation, it isn't another body than the one received by the Son of God out of the Holy Virgin, but it is deified towards resurrection and ascent. That's why it is also a pneumatized body, and unseen, and overwhelmed by the Holy Ghost, and though it is a real body, in order to be within us too, the source of the full Ghost and in order to pneumatize us too, increasingly more, in order us to gradually overcome the nature's laws and the dependence to the material things, and in order us to overcome the corruption process and the definitive death. This is for the Body of Christ is no longer submitted to the corruption process, due to the Holy Ghost dwelling within Christ's Body. That's why the relics of the Saints remain undecomposed, and that's why we will resurrect too, for the resurrected Christ remains with His Ghost within our souls, with His power of incorruptibility, giving our soul the power to resurrect his body. The Orthodoxy has kept the meaning of the salvation as effect stretched also upon the body and upon the cosmos, by affirming that the full salvation is the liberation of the body from corruption and from death, through resurrection, due to its filling up with the Holy Ghost. The whole Church's hymnography speaks about that. This is for, like our soul is within our body, likewise is, in some manner, our body too, through the roots od its rationality and sensitiveness, within our soul. But then, how much more will be the resurrected Christ too, namely with the endlessly thinned and spiritualized body, in some manner, within our soul, even after our death, if we often received Him within us, during our life on earth, and if we live within Him, through our will and through our deeds, which worked to our soul's spiritualization. By eating the pneumatize and spiritualized Christ's body, we have nourished itself our soul, by strengthening through spiritualization, the rational and sensitive roots of our body, into Him. By eating, we have assimilated, in some way, the Itself body of Christ within our soul, or vice versa. The separation between soul as body it isn't as total as we imagine it. All the more is this valid, when our soul and our body are within Christ, in Whom the osmosis between soul and body, and therefore between godhead and the human composite, it has reached the culminant state.

[704] The pneumatized, resurrected body, and therefore clean, of the Lord, assimilated within our soul and within our body, It brings those ones towards consummation, often by enduring the through this, we are united with the Body of Christ and with His Ghost and we become Body of Christ. This is the bread, which is the firstfruits of the heavenly bread, of the bread towards existence (Mt. 6: 11). This is for the bread "towards existence" shows either the future bread, namely the bread of the future eon, or the bread received towards preserving our being[705]. The Lord's body is of-life-maker Ghost, for it has been conceived out of the of-life-maker Ghost. "This is for what is born out of Ghost, Ghost it is" (Jn. 3: 6). And I am saying this not in order to abolish the body's nature, but because I want to show that the body is of-life-maker and godlike[706]. These ones are called images (anti-types) of the future realities, and not as ones which aren't truly the Body and the Blood of Christ, but we are imparted, through them, with Christ's godhead, and then we will be imparted only in our understanding, through sight"[707].

And the godlike Makarios says: "Like the wone mixes in all the limbs of the one who drinks it, and it is transformed, and that one becomes wine at his turn, likewise the one who drinks Christ's Blood, he is watered with the Holy Ghost and the Ghost cross, which He imprinted also us with, out of Himself, by actualizing it within us. That's why Christ's body works within us through a judgment too, namely through trials and tribulations, in order us to endure them with the power Christ endured His cross with, to be us cleaned up and not to be us condemned, at the end, together with the world, namely with the ones who will be found, at the final judgment, as unclean. Only to the extent we are thus cleaned up, we are intimately united with Christ, in one body, and we become clean as He is.

[705] The resurrected body of Christ, it is the bread that will nourish with its imperishable power, our soul, and within our soul the rational and sensitive roots of our body, bringing our body towards resurrection. Christ is the Hypostasis, or the ultimate and living foundation of our hypostases, who believe in Him.

[706] Christ's body is so spiritualized, so overwhelmed by the Ghost, so thinned through the Ghost and so irradiating the Ghost through all its pores, so that it can be called as of-life-maker. Christ's body is this also by the totally special fact that it was conceived out of the Holy Ghost Whose power was united with the power of Virgin Mary. The Holy Ghost strengthened so much the Virgin Mary's power of conceiving and forming a new human being, that it wasn't needed the man's seed. Thus, the body of Christ it has been bearing within itself, since the beginning, the constitutive power of the Holy Ghost. That's why Christ's body is of-like-maker.

[707] Our body from then, no longer needing to eat, it won't eat either the body of the Lord through the image of the bread, in order us to be imparted with Christ's godhead. We will be invaded them by the godhead through the totally transparent, totally overwhelmed by godhead, Christ's body. That would be as an impartation through absorption, through His intimate living within us, but this living will be an understanding, or a sight above understanding and above seeing. It is like the ones who love one another, in this world, in a superior manner, they communicate through contemplation, through understanding. The communication is mysterious understanding, and the mysterious understanding is communication.

is mixed, in a consummate manner, within the soul, and the soul within Him. And being thus sanctified, the soul becomes worthy of the Lord. For "all of us, he says, we have been watered out of the same Ghost" (1 Cor. 12: 13). And through the Eucharist of the bread, the one who are worthily imparted, they are made worthy to be partakers of the Holy Ghost and thus, the worthy souls can live forever[708]. And as the body's life, it isn't from the body, but from outside the body, namely out of the earth, likewise the soul has been made worthy, by God, to have food, drink, and vestment, which are the true soul's life, and not out of God's nature, but out of His godhead, namely out of His Ghost[709]. This is for the soul has the godlike nature towards the bread of the life, namely The One Who said: "I am the bread of the life" (Jn. 6: 48) and the living eater towards which the wine gladdens (Ps. 103[710]: 15) and as oil of the joy" (Ps. 44[711]: 8)[712].

[708] What we especially receive through the Holy Impartation, it is the godlike Ghost, as God Who strengthens the man's soul, in order to defeat the unfree processes of the nature, and Who unifies the creature with God. We firstly receive the Ghost within our soul, and from there He passes within our body too. This is for within soul, there are the rational and the sensitive roots of the body. Our soul becomes pneumatized, and it is strengthened in what it has as superior to the nature, and it can pneumatize our body too, or the body's roots from within soul. The soul achieves, thus, an unparalleled power of spiritualization, of thinning the body. The union between soul and body, it becomes increasingly greater, and deeper, within Christ's body that has been pneumatized, and spiritualized, and deified, and fully transfigured by the Holy Ghost. If, according to Saint Maximos the Confessor, within saints the duality is overcome (the functional duality, and not the duality of substance, of course), the more is so within Christ. And by being imparted with Christ's Body and Soul we start too, the overcoming of that duality, if we are imparted while having a clean conscience. By that, the soul brought to the union with God, that soul will live forever, and it will partially give to the body too, the strength to overcome the natural processes while still living in this world, and by strengthening the body's rational and sensitive roots within soul, it will be possible to the soul to resurrect the body to a life unsubmitted to decomposition, at the end of the world.

[709] This means that the soul of the person who is imparted with the Lord's body, that soul is imparted through the body, actually, with Christ's godhead. Bu, on the other hand, the Christ's body is so intimately crossed through, by the Holy Ghost, or by Christ's godhead, so that one cannot say that only Christ nourishes the human body. Besides, the Holy Ghost as fire of the love of the Trinitarian Persons, He makes out of Lord's body a complex of organic energies which this warmth of the love is manifested through, so that, by this, Himself has totally become a love's fire. Then, if the Lord's body has remained only within the man's body, the incorruptible body of the Lord should have directly upheld the man's body in incorruptibility, and that doesn't happen. On the other hand, the body's life isn't being upheld only out of the earth, but also out of the soul. So, the body's deified life too, it is upheld – in a limited degree on earth and fully in heavens – through the deified soul. But, in order the soul to be able to upheld the body with his life, he has to have, in a way, the roots of the body in himself, so that the soul receives within himself, in a way, the Lord's body, or the deified roots of the Lord's body.

Saint Isidore says too: "The impartation with God and with the Mysteries has been called communion (Latin: communicatio) for it gives us – as a gift - the union with Christ and it makes us having in common with Him, His Kingdom"[713]. And Saint Nilus says: "It will be impossible to the believer to be save and to receive the forgiveness of his sins and to achieve the Kingdom of Heavens, if he isn't imparted - fearfully, with faith and with love - with the mysterious and without blemish Body and Blood of Christ"[714]. Likewise writes the Great Basil, in his letter sent to Patricia Caesarea, limpidly, that "it is good and beneficial to somebody, to be imparted (to receive the communicatio) - even on a daily basis – with the holy Body and with the holy Blood of Christ. This is for Christ Himself said: "The one who eats My body and who drinks My blood, that one remains within Me and I within him, and he has eternal life" (Jn. 6: 56). And would doubt about the fact that being somebody continuously imparted with life, it would be something else than living in a multiplied manner? We receive the impartation for times a week: on Sunday, on Wednesday, on Friday, and on Saturday, and on the other days, if on those days we commemorate a Saint"[715]. I reckon that, in those days, the Saint was liturgizing too. Because he couldn't do it on other days, due to the fact that he was hindered by so many responsibilities. That's why Saint Apollo says too, that "the monk must be imparted with the Mysteries of Christ, on each day if possible. This is because the one who gets himself far from these ones, he gets far from God. And the one who does this continuously, he is [711] In King James Bible we have: Psalm 45: 8: "All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made thee glad.", corresponding to Psalm 45: 10 in the Romanian Orthodox Bible: "The myrrh and the aloe are embalming Your vestments; out of ivory palaces theorbo songs are gladdening You:". [715] Saint Basil the Great, Epistolarium classis, II, 93; G.P. 32, 484. The idea that through often impartation, the human being can multiply his life into God, it is a valuable idea. On each time the human being lives with his/her soul an effort of strengthening his connection with Christ, from another perspective, in an effort to sanctify by this another side of his connection with his body, of his connection with his fellow humans, in an effort of achieving, through special deeds required by other circumstances too, one more virtue. If this is the general preoccupation of his/her life, the "communication" with the Lord's body and with His power, it will uphold him/her, on each time, in doing another effort.

continuously dressed up in the Lord's body[716]. This is for itself the savior voice says: "The one who east My body and who drinks My blood, he remains into Me and I into him" (Jn. 6: 56). So, this is beneficial to the monks who ceaselessly remember the savior sufferance[717]. Therefore, one owes to be ready on each day and to prepare himself so that to be him worthy of each day, always, for receiving the Holy Mysteries. This is for thus we are imparted also with the forgiveness of our sins"[718].

Saint John Climacus says at his turn: "If a body, by touching another body, it gets changed in its working power, how much more won't be changed the one who touches the Lord's body, with innocent hands? This is for it has been written in Paterikon: "John of Bostra, a holy man, one having power upon the unclean ghosts, he asked some devil which were inhabiting some furious little girls, whom they were tormenting with evilness, saying: "What are the things you fear of, at [716] Being dressed up into Christ it means being dressed up in power. The image is similar to putting on some weapons; this is for Christ is like a weapon, or like an armor. But we must understand that we are dressed up into Christ when we receive Him within us; this is because somebody's power won't be communicated to you if that one doesn't become, somehow, interior to you. But the same thing means being us imparted with the body of Christ: it means being us dressed up in His power. The idea is that the body of Christ that we are imparted with, or that we are dressed up in, it isn't something that remains within us, or stuck with us, as a passive thing, but it is like a source of power, which we use, for we actively impropriate this power. But in order us to always be kept in state of power, we must be in continuous communication with Christ; we must always stay in communication with the Sun of the spiritual power.

[717] One can notice the natural connection between ceaselessly remembering Christ, so hat also His sufferance, through prayer, and between continuously being imparted with the crucified and victorious upon death, through cross, Christ's body. The continuous communication with the Lord's body it maintains His continuous remembrance, for it is a remembrance with the work, with the deed, and not only with the word. At its turn, the ceaseless remembering of the Lord with the word, as His communication with the human mind, with the human ghost, and with the human heart, it needs the full communication with Christ by being imparted with His body.

[718] Historia Lausiana Palladii, head. no. 72: vita Abbatis Apollo; G.P. 73, 1611. The often impartation with the Lord's body, as communication of His power towards us, as communication of His Ghost within our soul and within our will, it mustn't be, therefore, a magical receiving of Him, as he would work by Himself and without us. The active human factor communicates with the active factor that is Christ, in order to become even more active. That's why is needed a preparation in this sense, form the man's part. "The one who is imparted unworthily, he eats judgment to himself, for not honoring the Lord's body" (1 Cor. 11: 29), because of not co-working with Him. That's why better is a rarer impartation, but a well prepared one, one received with great concentration of power and of decidedness for co-working with the power from within Lord's body, than an impartation in a lax and careless state of our own powers.

Christians?". Those ones answered: "You truly have three great things: one that hangs on your neck; one which you are washed with within Church; and one that you eat in assembly". And he asked those again: "And amongst these three things, which are you the most afraid of?", and those answered: "If you guarded well what you are imparted with, nobody from us could do any harm to a Christian". So, the things the malefactors fear of the most, are: the cross, the baptism, and the Impartation"[719].

93. The End of all the Broadly Presented Themes and Urge towards the One Who Has Asked for Them.

Behold, my beloved son, that we have reached, with the help of God, at the end of your requests. We don't know if the answers match your will and you purpose. But they are according to our power. And what is according to the power, it is pleasant to God too. You only take care that your love for learning and your toil not to stop at this, but you continue to show yourself as loving of learning and zealous with the deed. This is for the brother of the Lord says too: "My beloved brothers, make yourselves fulfillers of the word and not only listeners of it, for otherwise you deceive yourselves. This is because, if there is somebody listener of the law but not fulfiller of it, he is like a man looking at his face in a mirror. So that he looked at himself and then he left, and he forgot how he was. But the one who looks into the consummate law of the freedom and who perseveres into it, that one hasn't made himself only a listener who hears and then forgets, but a fulfiller with his deed; that one will be happy in his work" (James 1: 22-26).

94. What One Must Hear Like and to and Understand Like, the Spiritual Words of the Fathers.

Before all, you must hear and understand in a faithful manner and with the due awe, the godlike and spiritual rules of the Fathers. This is for Saint Makarios says: "Untouched remain the spiritual things by the untried ones. But the holy and the believer soul is imparted with understanding from the Holy Ghost. And the heavenly treasures of the Ghost, they are shown only to the one who received them with experience. To the one who hasn't experienced them, it is impossible even to understand them"[720]. Therefore, you listen with awe, about them, until you will be given, for you believe, to be found worthy of achieving them. Then you will know by itself the experience of your soul's eyes, what great good things and mysteries the souls of the Christians can be imparted with, even from here. By doing so, you will soon harvest the fruit and the benefit of the hear and read things; and from finding them out and from fulfilling them with your deed, you will advance to the capability to urge and to guide, through itself your experience, also many other believers, towards the godlike and unknown things. May this to be destined to you too, the upheld and the urged one, by the powerful hand of Lord Jesus Christ.

And because to get fed up with hearing the word, it is unpleasant to the hearing, alike the too much food given to the bodies, and for the best thing is the temperance, we owe too, to avoid the satiation and to chose the temperance as being the best, to tarry a little mor in our word and, by presenting a summary of the present writing, then to cast the anchor of this word.

95. Recapitulation of the Way which We Must Pray In, and of the Teaching about the True Light and about the Godlike Power.

The Fathers say: "The ones who want to be awake within their cogitation, let them strive to always pray, in a clean and non-scattered manner, within their heart, by inspiring the air through their nostrils, and by taking heed and cogitating only to the prayer's words: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me"; and let they do this until the time comes for the illumination of the mind inside their heart. This is for Saint Diadochus says: "All the ones who ceaselessly cogitate at the most glorified and much desired name of Lord Jesus in the deep of their heart, they will be finally able to see the light of the mind"[721]. By taking this place with God's benevolence, since then, the other walk of our living according to God, we will commit it in an undeceived and unimpeded manner, by walking into light, or, better said, by being sons of the light, as the Giver of the Light, Jesus, says: "Until you have the light, believe in [720] The good things of the Holy Ghost cannot be known except by experience. Only the one who has had their experience, only him understands them. This is because the experience is above any theoretical cogitation.

light, in order you to become sons of the light" (Jn. 12: 36); and: "I am the light of the world, the one who follows me, he won't walk in darkness, but he will have the light of the life" (Jn. 8: 12). And Davis shouts out towards the Lord, the followings: "Into Your light we will see light" (Ps. 35[722]: 9).

Actually, by this, as through an unquenched and all-luminous candlestick, the true believers are guided and they look at the things from beyond senses, and it will be open to them as to ones who are clean in their heart (Mt. 5: 8) the heavenly gate of all high living, and high state, equal to the angels' one. And thus, it emerges to these ones, again, as from a sun's disk, the capacity of judging, of discerning, of intuiting, of foreseeing, and the things like these ones. And, saying so, by this it emerged to these ones all the showing and the unveiling of the not-shown mysteries, and they are filled up with the godlike and above nature power, into the Ghost. And through his above-nature power, their clay will be made lighten too, or, better said, the burden of the body it will be thinned to them and they will float, by being elevated.

Through this illuminating power, into the Holy Ghost, some of the Fathers too, while still being into body, they crossed, like some immaterial and bodiless beings, with their feet remaining dry, over rivers and seas which were crossed by ships, and they traveled many days' walk in an instant and they committed also other wonderful things in heavens, on earth into sun, into sea, in deserts, in cities, in every place and countries, in wild beasts, in crawling animals, and, simply, in all the creation and in all natural element, and by all of those things they made they were glorified. And staying at prayer, their clean and honored bodies were hovering above ground as they would have had wings, for they were disrobed of their bodily thickness and weight, melted down by the godlike and immaterial fire of the grace[723]. Under the work of this one, they easily raise from the ground, o, wonder, as transformed and recomposed in a more godlike state, through the deifying hand of the power and of the grace, that dwells within them. And, after their death, the all-honored bodies of some of them they remain undecomposed, [723] We must understand that everywhere it is about the love's fire, and about the mysterious connection or about the influence had by the soul's powers upon the body. The body becomes light in weight when the soul is clean and transparent, through the lack of passions and through the love that has nothing to hide.

by plainly showing the grace and the power dwelling into them and into the ones who are strong in their faith. And after the general resurrection, by somehow growing wings to them, out of itself the Ghost's power dwelling within them, they will be kidnapped into heavens, in order to welcome the Lord into skies, as the knower of the untold things – the godlike Paul – says; and thus, they will always be with the Lord (1 Thess. 4: 17). In addition to these, the speaker into Ghost, David, he sings: "Lord, into your light their will proceed and into Your name they will gladden themselves the whole day, namely eternal, and into Your righteousness they will be elevated, for the praise of their power You are" (Ps. 88[724]: 16-18). "The strong ones of God, they have been very elevated above the ground" (Ps. 46[725]: 9). And the much-speaker about the great things, Isaiah, he says: "The ones who wait for the Lord, to them will grow up wings; their power will be changed" (Isa. 40: 31).

Saint Makarios says at his turn: "Every soul who has been found worthy of consummately be dressed into Christ, into power and into entrustment, while they still lived in the material body, through faith and by striving in all virtues, and who have been united with the heavenly light of the incorruptible body[726], he is found worthy of always receiving the knowledge about the heavenly mysteries in hypostasis[727]. And on the day of the

[725] In KJB we have: Psalm 47: 9: "The princes of the people are gathered together, even the people of the God of Abraham: for the shields of the earth belong unto God: he is greatly exalted."; in ROB we have: "The leaders of the peoples have come together with the people of the God od Abraham, for to God belong the mighty ones of the earth; He has been extolled very." As one can notice, the text as quoted by the Greek author it speaks about different things than the text of the Psalms does. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[726] In the light that irradiated out of Christ it is implied also the incorruptibility of His body; or inversely, in His incorruptibility it is implied the light irradiating out of Him. The human body into Christ, especially after His resurrection, it has come back, through the Holy Ghost, to a state of energy, or to a state of organic complex of energies, that is incorruptible, and that's why it is luminous too. In the body thus pneumatized, the soul is too, on a supreme level, on the vertical of the conscience, of the clean and loving feeling, and that is an energy that cannot weaken, so that it cannot be corrupted. And His love irradiates as an imperishable light.

[727] He receives the light not as a light floating suspended, or as an imaginary product of the own subject, but as springing out of the hypostasis, or out of the Person of Christ, Who, as Creator and upholder foundation of every creature, of the whole energy and of the whole love, He irradiates the light. That's why the light received by the human being who is in ceaseless connection of prayer, with Christ, it is a light of supreme spiritual consistency, it is the light that springs out of its ultimate foundation, out of the supreme Person or out of the Trinity of supreme and creator Persons, Trinity that cannot but be source of light, for the Trinity is source of love.

resurrection, as reached into itself the heavenly mode of the glory, the body together glorified with the soul and kidnapped by the Ghost in order to welcome the Lord into skies (1 Thess. 4Ş 17), and found worthy of becoming of-the-same-image with the body of Lord's glory, that one will forever be reign, together with the soul and with the body of the Lord"[728].

96. Another Recapitulation.

The origin and the sign of all these new and above-word features, it is, as we mentioned before, the quietude, accompanied by the taking heed and by prayer into the total lack of worry. These ones have as their basis, the fulfilling, according to the power, of all the deifier commandments. And out of lack of worry, out of quietude, out of taking heed, and out of prayer, it is born within heart the full of warmth movement that burns out the passions and the demons, and that cleans the heart as in an oven. And out of this it is born the longing and the immeasurable love for the Lord Jesus Christ. And out of these ones it is born the sweet flowing of the tears from heart, as from a spring, one that cleans the soul and the body, through repentance, through love, with thanksgivings and confession, filling all of the up. Out of these ones it is born the serenity and the peace of the thoughts, which have no limits, as one that surpasses the whole mind (Philip. 4: 7). And out of these ones it is born the light shiny as the white snow. And, at the end, it is born the dispassion and the resurrection of the soul before the resurrection of the body[729]. And the new composition of the [728] Place not found at Makarios. On the day of the resurrection, not only the soul will be filled up with the light of Lord's model, of Christ's soul, but the body too, it will become together glorified with the soul, namely the body will be filled up with the whole glory of the deified soul of Christ, and of the human body own soul. This is for the believer's body too, it will reach into the glory of itself its glorified model, namely into Christ's body, and together with Christ's body bathed into the deified soul of Christ. The believer's body will be together-image with Christ's body, and become together with the soul as consummate image of the godlike hypostasis of Christ. As such, the believer will reign together with Christ, both as body and soul, in unity with Christ as body as soul, in their unity as consummate by the deified power of the Ghost.

[729] Out of the chaining of these states that rea bot one out of another, starting from quietude, form taking heed, and from prayer, one can see that the quietude isn't a motionlessness of the soul, but it is a great focusing power, and of creating a whole string of spiritual tensions, of repentance, of cleaning up of passions, and of love. The lack of passions, of the removal of the passions, which is at their top, it is united with the soul's resurrection, which is a total filling up of the soul with the totally new life out of the fullness of the Holy Ghost. Only out of this force of a totally new life into the soul, it will result the body's resurrection too, for within this resurrected soul there have been brought out of disorder, and restored, and resurrected, image and the return of the human being back to his/her image and likeness, through doing and through seeing, according to these ones, through faith, through hope, and through love; and with this, his/her total stretching towards God, the unmediated union with God, the getting out of the self, the stopping and the resting, in the present time as in a mirror and in a riddle (1 Cor. 13: 12) and in earnest, and in the future age the consummate impartation and the eternal joy for seeing God as face to face (1 Cor. 13: 12)[730].

97. This Is the Living According to God, the Undeceiving and True Living, as Taught by the Fathers: The Appeasing, out of Obedience, that Has Been Called, Rightly So, by Saints, also as the Hidden Life into Christ (Col. 3: 3).

This is the path and the understanding living, that according to God, and the sanctified work of the truly Christian ones; this is the true life, undeceiving and unstained, and proven to be hidden into Christ (Col. 3: 3). This one has been opened and it has been taught by God-the Man and the All-Sweet Jesus, and it was traveled by the godlike Apostles, it was followed by the Apostles' descendants, renown guides of ours, those ones who illuminated as illuminators within world (Philip.

themselves the rational and sensitive roots of the body. The effort for removing the passions, united with the prayer of Jesus, it shows that this prayer doesn't need only a formal method, as sometimes it is interpreted in the West ("Methode de la prière de Coeur"), because there it has been lost the understanding for the purpose of the passions' removal. On the other hand, introducing the mind within heart, by ceaselessly remembering Jesus, it has the purpose of reunifying the rational roots of the body which are within mind, with the body's sensitive roots which are within heart, namely it has the purpose of getting the human rationalities out of their tearing apart into the abstract rationality, and in disordered sensitiveness, and make them by thing to be reunited with their models form the godlike Logos, and to truly become luminous and loving, as the ones of Christ's soul and body has become, into the Word's hypostasis.

[730] Although to the end, this ascending movement towards God, a movement that increases to the extent that the human being becomes increasingly more according to his/her godlike model, it ends in the total getting out of the self towards God, and to the resting of all the world's passing things, it still isn't a petrification, but it is an endlessly intense and plenary joy of the face-to-face communication with God, with the Person or with the communion of infinite Persons. It is the resting of the love, or the resting in that love that is without shortcoming, without voids, without imperfection, without toils and boredom, resting that is in the same time sipping endless joy and happiness. This is the last perspective of the salvation in Christian sense. The movement towards it, it starts from here, through quietude and prayer, as forms of the tension towards God, the Partner and the sources of the inexhaustible love. As one can see, this chapter is a beautiful recapitulation of the entire road of the spiritual ascension of the ones who appease themselves, composed on the ground of the previous chapter, mainly out of texts belonging to the Holy Fathers.

2: 15) from itself the beginning of the first coming of Christ on earth and until these days, through the rays of the spreading of life words, and through their wonderful deeds; the ones who taught to the believers from our time, and to one another, this good seed (Mt. 13: 24), the sanctified dough (Mt. 13: 33), the holy firstfruits (Rom. 11: 16), the not-rubbed treasury (1 Tim. 6: 20), the grace, the power from above (Lk. 24: 49), the pearl of great value (Mt. 13: 46), the godlike parental inheritance, the treasure of great value hidden into the field (Mt. 13: 44), the earnest of the Ghost (2 Cor. 1: 22), the imperial sign, the living and jumping water (Jn. 4: 14), the godlike fire, the honorable salt, the charisma, the seal, the light and the ones alike these. This inheritance will be taught in the future too, mysteriously, from generation to generation, to the second coming of Christ one earth[731].This is for non-liar is The One Who has promised: "And behold I am with you on all days until the end of the time. Amen" (Mt. 28: 20).

98. Even If there Are other Savior Ways, but This Is the Main and Imperial One, that One that Leads to Life.

There are other paths and ways of living too, and if you want, there are good works too, which lead towards salvation and which rest the one who travels them. There are those ways, which urge and lead to serving while not receiving any payment. According to them, the Savior said that there are many dwelling places at His Father (Jn. 14: 2)[732]. But the way we are speaking about, it is imperial[733] and main, as one that renews towards adoption, the one who is made of dust and ashes (Gen. 18: 27) and it transforms in a wonderful manner, in a god, the human [731] In addition to the inheritance of the teaching, of the rules of congregational Christian life, ands of the Church's Mysteries, it is being continued also the teaching of the higher living and of the craftsmanship of the ceaseless praying. But this isn't being done publicly, but in a secret and practical manner, by the spiritual Father, to his spiritual son. Even if describing this kind of life, it can be done in writings which can be read by many, learning it, it must be done in a living manner, practically, and in many aspects in a manner that is unknown to the many, from the spiritual Fathers to their disciples.

[732] The authors mention here, amongst other possible ways for salvation, also the disinterested serving of the fellow humans, in society, besides that one of striving for cleaning up of passions and of ceaselessly praying.

[733] According to J. Pascher, 'Η βασιλική οδός'. Der Königsweg zur Wiedergeburt und Vergottung bei Philon von Alexandrien, in: Studien zur Gesichte und Kultur des Altertums XVIII, Heft 3-4, Paderborn, 1931.

being who follows it, as it is due[734]. This is because, says the Great Basil: "The Holy Ghost, by coming tin the human being's soul, He has given life, he has given immortality, He has elevated the one who was lingering"[735]. And the one who is moved, by the Holy Ghost[736], in an eternal movement, he has become a holy creature[737]. The human being has been having, once the Ghost has been dwelling within the human being, worthiness of [734] "In a wonderful manner", so translated, the Holy Fathers, the Greek expression: "in paradoxical manner". The human being is paradoxically made god in Ghost, because of, though he/she has become a god, he/she still remains, according to the nature, a human being. The paradox is the union of the two things, or of the two states, or of the two contrary aspects. The Ghost makes the human being a god, but without annulling the human being's humanity. It is a humanity with godlike works. The human being is and feels as god, or he/she is felt like god, but he/she is and feels like that in a way that doesn't break his/her connection with the other people; or he/she is felt like god, by the others, but this is because he/she doesn't left the connection with them. The practically lived paradox, it is a theme deserving a more extended description. But the human being is made God and in the godlike Ghost, without ceasing to be a human being, like the animal is made man, without annulling its animalic side, through the conscious soul. Although, the Ghost doesn't enter the human being's constitution, like the soul does. The Ghost is transcendent to the human being, but still the whole human being is elevated on the Ghost's plan, elevated up from on the plan of the natural life. But the human being is, even on the natural plan, by excellence, a paradoxical, or wonderful, being. The human being's mouth speaks meaningful words, like the animal's mouth doesn't; but physiologically, the human being's mouth still remain an animal mouth, swallowing up food and making sounds. If the human being is, by excellence, a paradoxical being, why wouldn't be accomplished in him, all the way to the end, the paradox he aspires to? Why the human being wouldn't become a deified human being or a deified speaking animal? The deified human being proves new functions for all his/her limbs, which do not come out of the human being's nature. Still, the subject of these functions remains the human being, and the human being feels those functions, somewhat, in his/her quality as human being, and, as such, he/she remains in an existential connection with the other people, as Christ Himself has remained too.

[735] Place not found.

[736] The eternal life is, on one hand an eternal resting, for it is a remaining in the same endless God, and it isn't a passing from on an unlimited level on another level; on the other hand, it is an eternal movement, for one never reaches the edge of God, or the getting satisfied with His endless love. Here is rejected the Platonism and the Origenism, with their theory of the successive fallings from the pleroma from above, due to the boredom.

[737] «ζωον αγιλον εγένετο». The exact translation would be: it has become a holy animal. But by this, the human being would be confounded to the "holy animals" from the pagan temples (for instance: the "holy cow" of the Hindus). Besides that, not the simple animal has become "holy" and "deified" in Christendom, but the "speaking animal", rational, conscious, free: namely the human being. Only through the human being, God can manifest Himself speaking, and thinking. That's why, one could say at most "speaking, holy and deified, animal". That's why the Son of God too, He has taken the human nature, or the speaking animal nature, and not the simple animal nature. That's why we are translating here the Greek expression as "holy animal" with the expression "holy creature".

prophet, of apostle, of angel, though the human being is dust and ashes[738].

99. These Living Has Many Meanings, Due to Its Height.

That's why the godlike Fathers praise and glorify this living with many and diverse names. They called it as knowledge, worthy of praise doing, and good sight of the target, and prayer above any width[739], the watchfulness of the mind, understanding work, the thing of the future age, angelic living, heavenly living, godlike behavior, the country of the living ones, mysterious view, spiritual feast, deified Paradise, heavens, heavenly kingdom, Kingdom of God, supra-luminous darkness, hiddenly living into Christ (Col. 3: 6), seeing God, and deification, one that is totally above nature, and many other things like these.

Following to these godlike Fathers, us, who are living with the mud and with the clay, with the thoughts, with the evil and unclean words and deeds, we have been zealously striving to accomplish you request, for you are our beloved one. And, as you asked for, we haven't been burdened to tall even the things from above our measure, as I said in introduction too, due to your love and to the commandment of the Fathers. But the Teacher of this living totally according to the one of the angels, He is the Word and Son of God, through His oikonomia and embodiment, as also the benevolence of the without-beginning Father, and together with the work of the Holy Ghost.

100. Moral Teaching.

With the help and with the grace of God, we too, must strive and toil ourselves, according to our capacity, in order us to be found worthy since now, as of an earnest, of these too great and above nature gifts, lest, because of our idleness, to be us, woe to us, deprived of them; and we don't want that to happen.

For there are in front of us – my beloved ones – so many and such good things, not only as hopes and promises, but also in truth and in existence, still from here, let's strive, let's hurry

[738] Place not found at Saint Basil the Great. The paradox is described a little further. Through the Ghost dwelling within the human being, the human being can achieve the quality as foreseer Prophet, of heralding Angel of the godlike needs, though he is dust and ashes.

[739] One could understand: prayer that comprises everything. But also, as prayer that leaves the scattering and it is narrowed to only the name of Jesus, but for this name it comprises everything.

up, let's run until we still have time to toil, for us too, to be found worthy of them, through a small and temporary perseverance, but mostly by the grace of God. "Because the sufferings of the present time aren't worthy of the glory which is to be unveiled us." (Rom. 8: 18), as says Paul, the preacher of God. Better said, if we strive, we will find them, according to Paul, even since now and as an earnest (Rom. 8: 23). This is for, if the ones who are called from a lower state to imperial kinship and partaking, they do everything, through deeds, through words, and through thoughts, to achieve those, and not only they often do not value their life at all, in order to be they given such a glory and honor, even if that is flowing and temporary, how much more must we work and strive for the partaking and wedding and union which we are called to, with God Who is the Emperor and the Maker of all emperors and Who is the Only One incorruptible, and Who lasts for ever and He gives, as gifts, steadfast and illustrious honor and glory, to the one who belong to Him? And not only that much, but we have also received the power to be made sons of God. "This is for, to everybody, as many as accepted Him, He has given them power to become sons of God to the ones who believe in His name" (Jn. 1: 12).

God gives us the power. He doesn't forcedly attract us, against our will. This is for the power give arms to the ones who are kept in tyranny to liberate themselves form the one who tyrannize them, by healing the evil with evil. But we are given the old worthiness of the self-control - in order the good to be committed fully - with His benevolence and grace, but also to be reckoned to us as feat of our striving and zeal.

And That One, despite being God and Master, He has done everything from His part, for He has done all of as alike and for He died for all of us, in order to equally save everybody. But is falls to us to come closer, to believe, to impropriate what he has given us, to serve with fear, with zeal, and with love, to the Loving of people and care taker Master Who loves us so much that He even death willingly suffered for us, and even a shameful death. And this was in order to deliver us from under the tyranny of the devil and of the all-evil enemy, and to reconcile us with the Father and God, and to make us inheritors of God and together-inheritors of Him, this being the most wonderful and happy thing.

Therefore, let's not estrange ourselves, through a tiny and short idleness and carelessness, neither through some liar pleasure of any kind, from such great and abundant good things, rewards, and joys. But let's do and commit everything and, if necessary, let's not spare even our life for Him, as He did for us, though He is God, so that, thus, to be us found worthy of the gifts from here and of all the gifts and crowns. That be it, to all of us, to achieve them, by His benevolence and grace, of the all-good and merciful our Lord and God and Savior Jesus Christ Who humbled Himself so much, for us, and for He rewards, the ones who humble themselves, even since now, in a working and rich manner, with His above-nature and deifier grace. For Him is due the whole glory, the honor, and the worshipping, together with the without-beginning His Parent and together with the eternal and All-Holy and of-life-Maker His Ghost, now and always and in the endless ages of the ages. Amen.

Of the His Beatitude Kallistos the Patriarch

Heads about Love

1. If you want to find out the truth, you will follow the example of the guitar player. This is for, that one, by looks downwards and, by focusing his hearing on the song, he picks the strings. And immediately, for the strings vibrate, the guitar sounds that song, and the guitar player rejoices the song's sweetness.

2. May it be to you, you lover of ascesis and you worker of the vineyard, this example limpid, and you do not doubt. This is for, by taking heed, as a guitar player, to the dept of your heart, you will easily see what you are looking for, for the soul that is kidnapped by love at a peak, that soul can no longer turn back to the things from before. "For it has stuck, says Prophet David, my soul to Your trace" (Ps. 62[740]: 8).

3. Understand, you my beloved, that the guitar symbolizes here the heart; the strings symbolize the senses[741], and through strings' touching it is symbolized the mind that skillfully moves the feeling, by remembering God. Out of this movement, there emerges within soul an untold pleasure, and the clean mind makes the godlike rays to be shown[742].

[740] In KJB we have Psalm 63: 8: "My soul followeth hard after thee: thy right hand upholdeth me."; in ROB we have: "My soul has stuck on You and Your right hand upheld me." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[741] The heart's sense, and not the body's ones. It is to be noticed this likeness of Jesus's prayer to a song. The prayer is a song and that's why it brings a great joy, for it isn't only the repetition of Jesus's name, but it is a sinking into the whole endless world of meanings, of love, and of sweetness, comprised in Him. There is a movement in this world of harmonies, and that's why this world is always new. The hear vibrates with this harmony and the mind tastes its nuances.

[742] The mind itself is illuminated with the pleasure occurring within heart, for that pleasure is full of a meaning. Alike it happens to the guitar player too. The joy for playing his guitar it is reflected by his eyes as a light: "This is what I've been looking for"! The mind's light and the feeling has been unified, as the mind and the soul have been reunified. There isn't true light

4. If we do not close the body's senses, there won't spring within us the jumping water promised by the Lord to the Samaritan woman. This is for, by asking for that felt water, she has within it the jumping water of the life (Jn. 4: 14). This is for, like the earth has, by nature, the water, and in the same time the water flows out of earth, likewise the heart's earth has, by nature, this jumping and springing water. It is like the parental light lost by Adam through disobedience[743].

5. Like the water springs out from an inexhaustible spring, likewise springs out the living and jumping water from within soul. This water, for it dwelled within Ignatius's soul too, it made him say: "There isn't within me, fire loving of matter, but there is working and speaking water"[744].

6. It was likened, the happy and threefold praised watchfulness, or better said the understanding watchfulness of the soul, to the water that jumps and spring out from the bottomless depth of the heart[745]. And, on one hand, the water gushing up from the spring, it fills the spring itself up; on the other hand, the water jumping up from there, from the heart, and that, to say so, by moving itself, it is always being moved without joy, as there isn't superior pleasure without light. The blind pleasure is an inferior, a not-full pleasure.

[743] Here, the inner joy, united with the light, they are symbolized by a jumping, therefore alive, water, one non-stale, and one always new. It is so united with the light, that itself is called as light. This is for this inner live is openness towards the supreme meaning of the existence. It gushed out from the heart not because it is united with the mind, or with the understanding, but for the clean heart open towards the meaning, it is open towards the endless meaning and towards the endless godlike life. The heart has become, due to its cleanness, as transparent; like it is sincerely open to the people, it is open also towards God Who is the supreme loving Person. For this, it is though necessary that the man to not be too attached through his senses, to the things from outside, or too caught with the bodily pleasures and interests which he desires to satisfy through senses. The eye that is closed towards the external things, it opens towards the eternal things, which come in waves in the range of the understanding.

[744] He called it as speaking water, either for making Saint Anthony the God-Bearer to speak, or for it was the Holy Ghost Himself that spoke. That water jumps like the understanding jumps, from other and other words, proving the live as uninterrupted and always new.

[745] Itself the watchfulness of the taking vigil to the inner things, it is a water springing out of the heart's depth, a depth that is sunk in the endless abyss of God. This is for this vigil taking is active, it is a diver in the ever-deeper ocean. By being itself alive, it is itself always new, nourisher with other and other understandings received by it from God. It is difficult to separate this vigil taking, from its always new content. In a way, itself it is maintained by the heart's abyss, upheld by God.

through the Ghost, and it fills the whole man up, with the godlike dew and with the Ghost, and it makes the man as fiery on outside[746].

7. The mind that has been cleaned up of the things from outside, and which has entirely taken the senses under control, through the virtue with the deed, it remains motionless like the sky's axis, looking at the deep of the heart, as towards the center[747]; and by keeping its head under control, the mind looks in that direction, as having the understanding's rays as some probes, which take out from there, the godlike meanings, and which keep under control all the body's senses.

8. Let no one amongst the non-introduced ones - or who needs milk (1 Cor. 3: 2) – touch such forbidden things, before [746] This water of the life and of the light, or of the joy and of the understanding, it is, on one hand, moved by the Holy Ghost, and therefore it is move from beyond the man; on the other hand, itself it moves, while being moved by the Ghost, namely the man feels that he moves himself on the plan of the understanding and of the love. The Ghost's freedom doesn't hinder the man's freedom, but it increases it. The godlike subject encounters the human subject and He makes the human subject to receive himself the movement and to impropriate it. This water fills the man's heart up, as on a water spring, out of, or through which, it springs. But it also feels up all the man's faculties and inner senses, and it also feel the outside man with warmth in all his communications. It is shown in these text heads, an abyssal and free vision about heart, or about man. The man is subject to endless possibilities, for he has his root within God, and for he is open to the endless godlike Subject. God, for He is endless in His live and meanings, He always can communicate to the man something new out of them, and the man can impropriate those, by experiencing on himself as endless subject in these possibilities coming to him out of his connection with God, but the man himself impropriate those, freely. The man can ceaselessly pray, for in his prayer he is open to seeing the endless God. Terms as πύρινος (burning with the body), αείβλυτος (always gushing up), the accent placed on the Ghost etc., it shows the fact that the author of these text heads, as also of the larger writing "About Prayer" that follows to these ones, if he isn't identical to one of the two Xanthopol - who wrote the "One Hundred Heads", which these terms are present in, as also the vision about the preponderant role of the Ghost and about the abyssal character of the heart –, at least he knew that writing, or vice versa, those two ones knew this writing.

[747] The mind that has been cleaned up of the impressions from outside and that it has taken the senses under control, by getting accustomed to serve only the virtues achieved through st4eadfast deeds (restraint, patience, industriousness for lovingly serving others, humbleness etc.) that mind has opened its looking towards the deep of the heart which deepens into the endless deep of God and that it always springs out meanings accompanied by joy, out of the godlike transparent endlessness which that heart's deep is transparent to. That's why the mind no longer moves from this looking, but it remains motionless in its movements as the axis of the sky amongst stars, or as an interplanetary space remaining the same between planets. But the mind remains motionless only for it looks at the same deep. But otherwise, the mind deepens itself increasingly more in looking at that godlike deep.

the time has come. Some of these ones, who searched too early, the things belonging to a certain time, and who strived to enter an apparent realm of the dispassion inappropriately, the Holy Fathers reckoned them as doing an insane thing, and nothing more. This is because that one who doesn't know the letters, he cannot read a writing.

9. What is moved, consequently to ascesis, by the godlike Ghost, within soul, it makes the heart serene and shouting: "Abba, Father" (Gal. 4: 6)[748]. This one is imageless and shapeless, but it gives us an image through the brightness of the godlike light, and a due shape, since the lighting up of the godlike Ghost[749].

10. The mind that has been cleaned up through watchfulness, it will easily get darkened, if it doesn't totally detach itself from the preoccupation with the external things, and that can be done by continuously remembering Jesus[750]. And the one who has united the doing with the contemplation[751] (with the thinking at God), by guarding the mind, that one isn't deviated by noises; he doesn't wabble (because of disturbances, having or not having a meaning). This is for the soul that is wounded by the love for Christ, it follows to That One like a little brother[752].

[748] The state of quietude, or of feeling God, it comes after long ascesis undertaken by the man, but out of the Holy Ghost. Neither alone the ascesis, nor alone the Holy Ghost, are producing that. That one truly feels God and that that is from the Ghost, it is shown in the fact that the man feels the urge to shout out: "Abba, Father!".

[749] The work that is moving within soul from the Holy Ghost, it is shapeless, for everything that is godlike, it is above shape. But is gives our being a shape, namely it makes our being as kind, as quiet, as joyful, and it fills our being up with filial love etc. When the godlike work touches a creature, it gives that creature a shape, of course it will be about a spiritual shape, if that creature has a spirit or a soul within.

[750] The watchfulness cleans the mind up of all the external things, for the watchfulness actually consists of exclusively focusing one's attention on Jesus, or on God. But a mind it could be fully cleaned up, only if it totally ceases to occupy itself - with pleasure – with the images of the outside things, by continuously occupying itself with remembering Jesus.

[751] The mind cannot be kept to continuously remember Jesus, only through intellectual effort, but it must be placed in accord with that also the practical effort of no longer searching for sin through pleasures, but by preserving the mind's cleanness through good and clean deeds.

[752] The soul is the bride from the Song of Songs. The "little brother" is the bridegroom knocking on the door (Son of Songs 5: 3).

11. It can happen that the ones who live into world, they are able to stop the passions and the jumping form one to another, or they can stop thinking at those things, according to the word: "Stop and know" (Ps. 45[753]: 10). But it is impossible to them, to erase the passions or to abolish them. But the monastic life can totally uproot the passions.

12. Amongst the jumping waters, one move quicker, while the other is more serene and slow. The first one can be easily disturbed, due to the quickness of its movement. If it is disturbed for a little time, it will be easily cleaned up again, because of having such a movement. But when the flowing slows down, the water becomes very shallow, and that water almost remains motionless. Then it needs a cleaning anew, to say so, and it needs a new setting in movement[754].

13. But to the beginners, or to the ones who still are in the moral state, or in the stage of the doing, the demon comes closer to them through articulated or unarticulated noises. To the ones who are on the level of the seeing (of the contemplation) the demon brings them the shape of some hallucinations, so that it seems to them that the air is colored, as a light; some other times, the demon shows these things as a fire too, in order that through a false promise to deceive the soldier of Christ.

14. If you want to find out what you must pray like, look at the end of the taking heed and of the prayer, and you won't get strayed. For this end is, you my beloved one, the continuous pricking or crushing of the heart, and the love for the neighbor. And the contrary is, obviously, the thought of the lust, the gossip's whisper, the hatred for the neighbor, and all the things alike.

[753] In the KJB we have Psalm 46: 10.

[754] The jumping water from within heart, or out of the Holy Ghost through the heart, it is the always new joyful and understanding life, out of the endless ocean of the godlike life. This one, though implying a steadfastness of the mind's looking at inside the heart, and by the fact that the it is transparent to God, it still is moving by advancing to new and new meanings and joys, in the godlike ocean and into the communion with His bearer Person. And when this movement is full with living attention, when waves of new meanings are poured within mind, the images coming from outside, or the temptations calling the mind to pleasures, they won't be able to disturb that mind. But when the mind's moving into the new meanings and joys coming within mind, it lingers, the mind can be easily disturbed by the images coming from outside and it can be even totally seized by them.

15. The Paradise They Speak about It Is the Man's Image.

Like the man's shown things are images of the man's non-shown things, likewise the all-beautiful Paradise wisely planted by God at West of Eden (Gen/ 2: 8), it is an image of the inward man. This man has his heart as earth, and he has as trees which his mind built in the image of God, and it follows to plant them willingly, the godlike views and meanings regarding God, and the works which are worthy of God, and which are many and diverse and they have a diverse appearance and spiritual fragrance, and I am even adding here the fact that they provide also a nourishment, a delectation, and a pleasure. Thus, the heart is nourishing this "Eden" in a natural manner, and it has within itself, towards pleasure and proven joy, the godlike things. The seen Eden is planted Westwards to the seen sunrise, for the seen sun is the image of the cogitated sun. So, the heart is planted towards the lights of the knowledge of the cogitated sun. This is for the heart, according to the Holy Fathers, while lacking the light of the knowledge, it cannot produce godlike meanings and thoughts nor works which to be worthy of God and it cannot be fully filled up with simpler and more consummate godlike views, in order to be a new and above-world Paradise[756]. But without waters there cannot be a Paradise

[755] These are text heads which are missing in the First Edition of the Philokalia from Venice, as it is mentioned on the cover of the Volume IV, of the Third Edition. But they belong to the same Kallistos the Patriarch, as the previous ones too, so that they are numbered in continuation. The text from the Greek Philokalia, which we have done the translation from, it is quite altered from grammatical and syntactical points of view, in many paragraphs.

[756] The man's heart, as an inner Eden, it is planted towards the sunrise, or the mind's one, which illuminates the heart and gives the heart power to bring forth fruits. But this human spiritual sun it receives its light from the godlike sun. The godlike sun is the source of the whole light. From there it comes the human mind's light. The godlike sun is firstly seen by the man's mind, or it is reflected into the man's mind, and from the mind the godlike light is either, and it cannot produce beautiful and fruitful trees, as it is due.

That's why in the Paradise from Eden, one can see a water spring gushing up, from Paradise's middle, a water spring that id divided – as it is written – in four beginnings (of rivers) and it waters the earth's face (Gen. 2: 6), and within man, s spring of living water, there is of-like-maker movement of the Holy Ghost, which the Lord said about: "The water that I will give him, it will become a spring of water" (Jn. 4: 14), of living water within heart, gushing up wonderfully, as form an Eden, and being divided in wisdom, in temperance, in righteousness, and in manhood, as in the four beginnings, out of which every virtues is born, in a godlike manner[757]. That's why it has been told in continuation, that through this river is watered the whole surface of the earth, or of the heart, with the work towards reflected upon the heart. Only that's why one can call the man's mind too, as the spiritual sun from within man, as image and as mirror of the godlike Sun. But the mind, in its natural state, it isn't separated from the heart. And that's why it isn't separated too, from the godlike Sun. The godlike Sun, as He communicates His light through the mind, through the heart He communicates the warmth of His love. And as the mind communicates to the heart the light it received from the godlike Sun, likewise the heart communicates to the mind the love it received from the same Sun. That's why, only both of them together, like two co-working eyes, they perceive the godlike life, given that the true light is love too, and the true love is luminous light too. It is like in this world the seen sun and the earth, they brin forth fruits only for they exist together. Actually, the fruits come out of earth, but only under the sunlight, and the sun, if not lighting the earth, it won't fulfill its purpose of causing the earth to be fruitful. The non-lightened heart if brings forth only fruit of poor quality, and the mind's light, if it doesn't encounter a loving heart, that mind's light remains arid, abstract, and without a good effect upon the human life. The whole this chapter is consecrated to the of-life-maker power, of the Holy Ghost, a power that reinvigorates the heart's soil, as a water.

[757] Here is said more directly, that like the mind receives its light form the godlike Sun (from the Logos), likewise the heart receives the power of bringing forth the good fruits, of the water, from the Holy Ghost. The water's river that makes our heart fruitful, they say that it gushed up out of the man's heart itself (from the Eden's ground), but equally clear they say that it is the river of the Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost is actually the love's river, for the virtues He produced through the four tributaries of the water it culminates into love. This love going towards actualization, it works through sapience, through temperance, through righteousness, and through manhood. It is clearly affirmed here that the virtues are the fruits of the Holy Ghost, or of the co-working with the Holy Ghost with our strivings. And there isn't possible a more accentuated affirmation of the together-working between the human nature and the godlike power by and large. Our nature isn't full without being nourished from God's part, with light and with love, through mind and heart. But the mind and the heart have their role too, in activating the light and the love from God. The light and the love become belonging to the man, by being received by mind and by heart; they become human by the fact that they are communicated to the man, through his mind and heart. The man truly is a created-uncreated being, a theandric being, a paradoxical being, and a wonderful being. The Eden is being kept in its beauty and fruitfulness, by the godlike Sun and by the heavenly rain.

growing up, towards budding up, and towards producing the chosen fruits of the godlike virtues.

Wonderful, sweet, and happy thing is to understand also the things comprised in the water spring that symbolized the movement and the work of the living Ghost Who was gushing up, as I said, in an above-nature manner, from the middle of the heart. The spring doesn't belong to the trees;' nature or to the earth's nature. This is because, if that had been the case, that spring wouldn't have reached to water all the so numerous trees, and to thicken them up, and to grow them up and not only a little; because that spring was only one, and the trees were so many and so diverse, that some of them had opposite features, some of them being more withered, others more wet, others hotter, while others were cooler. Towards all of these ones, so diverse, was moving, as I said, that tiny and of only one kind spring, working, as much as possible for all those trees. And by being divided in four beginnings, it causes within each man the things depending on it.

It isn't characteristic to our nature, either somebody would think at virtues, or to knowledge and the understanding (view) depending on it, either to our heart, the godlike above-nature illumination and the movement and the work of the of-life-Maker One. This has been given, according to the grace, to the believers, but still gushed up continuously from within the heart, by being, wonderfully, only one water spring, but divided in four beginnings, or in equal virtues, as I said before; and these one and all the ones following to them, are helped by it more than the one water.

For it is Ghost, He co-works with the wisdom; for He is knowledge, it helps to the one who is imparted with righteousness; He is also called as temperance and power, as One Who is these things and Who appear form far away to be like so, and He is co-working towards temperance and manhood. And Saint Paul and Prophet Isaiah are very strong witnesses about the Ghost as co-working towards love and wisdom. The first one directly says that the love from God has been poured within our hearts through the Holy Ghost given to us (Rom. 5: 5). And Isaiah counts the Ghost of the wisdom amongst the seven works of the Ghost (Isa. 11: 2).

The Ghost isn't only co-working with the love, but He becomes to us, also, Ghost of the zeal, a fact that seems to be somehow opposite to the love. This is for the love covers, as it was said, a multitude of sins (1 Pt. 4: 8). But the zeal end sometimes in rebukes and in killings too. And this could be said also by the great Prophet Elijah, friend with God, who killed with his sword so many priests of the shame (3[758] Kings 18: 48); even before than that, Phineas cut asunder the Midianite together with the Israelite (Num. 25: 8); and before those ones, himself the great Moses, giver of the old law, who often, due to his zeal, he gave many people to death, and even some of the men from his own nation.

Amongst the things to do with the work, the most important is the knowledge, and amongst the things to be contemplated, the most important is the above-mind nescience[759]. And these ones, without the Ghost of the Truth and without the Ghost of the Knowledge into the soul, they cannot be done and achieved as it is due[760].

Both the joyfulness of the mind and the sadness opposed to the joy, are proven to be fruits of the Ghost[761]. This is for you hear the Scripture saying that the fruit of the Ghost is the joy (Gal. 5: 22); but the Scriptures says too, that God gave to some people ghost of repentance full of heart pricking (Rom. 11: 8). And, to say it shortly, according to the Holy Fathers, so much

[759] You cannot do any deed, as it is due, without knowledge. But you do not know anything as it is due, without realizing the mystery that persists in everything you know. You cannot know a person in what that person has as its own, without intuiting in that person what cannot be defined. You won't be able to realize what God is, if you do not feel His mystery as being above all the definitions which you strive to catch Him within. This nescience is above everything you know, it is above mind. So, there isn't blind doing, neither there is true knowledge, which to lack the mystery, and which to lack the above-knowledge nescience. Thus, one cannot clearly separate the doing from the knowledge, neither between knowledge and nescience. Even through nescience, one can know something. The knowledge intertwined with recognizing the mystery, and enriched by noticing the mystery, and accompanied by the respect for the mystery, it stays at the basis o any right doing.

[760] You cannot have knowledge combined with the superior nescience, namely the true intuition of the reality, without the Ghost of the truth Who is, in the same time, also Ghost of the Knowledge and of the Mystery, or of the above-knowledge nescience, and present into knowledge. Only the Ghost helps you knowing what you can become and so to work on these purposes but also only Him makes your soul to open to what is above the expressible knowledge. And especially in intuiting what we cannot define, we can realize that the knowledge of the whole truth isn't from us, namely it isn't due to our efforts.

[761] In the previous sentence and in the present sentence, and in the followings too, the author uses the paradox, namely opposite traits, in characterizing the Ghost. Actually, the human spiritual realities, especially those produced by the Ghost, of itself the godlike life, they cannot be comprised in unilateral formulas. They are so rich and so complex, that we must use contradictory terms in order to express them to a certain extent.

power has the of-life-Maker Ghost, that He co-works both to those virtues and to the moods which are seen as opposite to one another, as we said that the Scripture calls Him as fire and water, which are totally opposed to each other.

The Scriptures calls the Ghost like that, for the help given by the Ghost to all the good things and to all beauties from within soul, and for His of-life-giver-and-strengthener-work, in all these ones. For this the Scriptures calls this source, both at singular and at plural. The Savior called Him too, both as river and as rivers. That's why too, the beginning (of the rivers) is divided and it advances in all virtues[762]. And, the whole becomes as a soul's soul of new nature, namely of the soul that is imparted with Him. This is for He gives the soul an above-nature life, and He moves the soul towards all the deeds which the soul needs to do, and towards the happening things, and He consummated the soul as it is due. I suppose that the stone too, that was hit by the staff of the lawmaker[763] Moses and it sprang out rivers of waters (Exod. 17: 6), it is the heart petrified because of callousness. Out of this one, when hit by God Who wounds it and Who pricks it, with words instead of a staff, and the power of the Ghost gets out of the heart, by moving the heart in a happily way, of-life-maker creeks, by helping the heart through that towards all the great and appropriate deeds, and, we could say so, a sole water making alive the many and endless ones, who are imparted with it. Truly wonderful is this stone that, by being carried by a sole cart[764], it has spread, springing out of it, so much water carried by millions and countless other carts. Where it has this power from, and what humid earth is tarrying on, in order to be borne?[765] [762] The four virtues advance, or they grow up, and in the same time they ramify themselves in other virtues, in all virtues.

[763] We use this term because so it is given in the source text. But we feel the need to show that this term would tell that Moses actually „made" the Law, instead of only conveying it to the people of Israel. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[764] The Holy Ghost pours Himself within a soul, and He makes that soul, from callous, into alive.

[765] It is called like that, the heart that is borne by a sole body, by the body of Christ, but also by the bodies of so many people who spread, out of their hearts, the water of the Holy Ghost, or the water of the faith. This is the living Tradition: the hearts bearer and spreader of the water of the Holy Ghost. Not through book has been the Tradition kept alive, but through hearts. The books have been witnesses to this work of living transmission. This is the contribution of the human factor to preserving and transmitting the living Tradition. The heart is invigorated through the water of the Holy Ghost, but in order to be invigorated the heart must have also a

And all the more wonderful thing it is, to the ones who think, how the so tiny vessel of the heart, it spreads up, ceaselessly gushing up, so much infinity water, to the millions of ghosts and to the countless bodies, in order they to survive? Where it comes from, to the heart, this water, and so plentiful of it, that it exceeds any number? The Holy Ghost, as Himself the Truth said, He truly blows wherever He wants and you can hear His voice, but you do not know where He comes from and where He goes at (Jn. 3: 8). Actually, the Holy Ghost always blows[766].

So, if we have been found worthy of such a great honor from God, that one of having the possibility seeded within us, that, by imitating us God, the godlike Paradise, unknown with the external senses, but known with the mind, a way-above Paradise than the previous one, according to the said things, and which gives us a great happiness and Who is above any understanding to the one who hasn't experienced this sanctified worthiness, let's give ourselves as a gift, with piousness and with right faith, since the beginning of the appeasing, through commandments, and by this to Christ, the God in Trinity. And by remaining thus, with the view that gathers the cogitations and the meanings said before, and even the teachings about God, and it plants these ones within our heart and into God, let's gain His mercy, through the due prayer, and He to allow His Ghost, with everything that Has into Him, to come within us and to spring out within us godlike and above-world meanings, which you can call them as rivers. This is for "the one who believes in Me, He says, rivers of living waters will flow out of his heart. And He said this, as His beloved disciple says, about the Holy Ghost Who will be received by the ones who believe in Him" (Jn. 7: 38). His to be the glory for ever and ever, for He is the Giver of the above-mind things.

16. About the Gift of the Holy Ghost.

capacity for that. The heart must be capable of feeling, of self-giving, and of giving love as gift, towards God and towards the fellow humans.

[766] This ensures the Church's lasting to the end of the world: the fact that the Holy Ghost always blows. He cannot except to blow. The itself beginning of His blowing is from the beginning and the world and in a renewed manner and fully into Christ; it is a blowing forever and ever. He has within Himself the force of the ceaseless blowing. To this ceaseless and forever blowing, it corresponds the ceaseless succession of hearts desiring this blowing and this water of the Ghost, in order they to strengthen their own natural desire for loving their fellow humans, and their desire for the spring of love Who is God.

Look at the gifts from God Who doesn't feel sorry for giving them, and look at the gifts form the non-comprisable One, and rejoice yourself of the wonder committed by the one who resisted God. You reckon the things done by God in the first created Adam, and notice that the higher things are later done by God within us. God breaths into Adam, as breath of life, the grace of the life-Maker Ghost, and so Adam became consummate man; for Adam became "alive towards the soul" (Gen. 2: 7), and not towards a simple soul. This is for the Ghost of God isn't a soul of the man, but He is towards the soul that lives spiritually. This is for the Holy Ghost of God makes Himself truly soul to the soul that lives as the speaking (rational) soul ought to, and of godlike image.

But, by not remaining the Ghost of God together with the soul, or sadly, by leaving the soul, the godlike image of the life it has been lost – that image worthy of rational soul – and it has been introduced, unfortunately, that one of the animals, or of the beasts. This is because without God, we cannot do anything of the due things – namely without being into Ghost and into Christ, as Christ said (Jn. 15: 5). That's why, Adam was created a man without shortcoming, namely whole, for he wasn't created "towards (with) soul", but he was created "towards living soul", when God breathed within Adam "breath", in order to be "life" within the speaking souls[767].

[767] The Holy Ghost doesn't become the man's soul itself. If that had been the case, the man would have been one with God in a pantheistic meaning, and the sins committed by man, they would have been of God Himself, of there wouldn't have been possible to discern between good and bad. But without a presence and a work of the godlike Ghost, within the human soul, the man won't be able to live a life according to his rationality. This is for the man has within his soul a rationality and a freedom, but they cannot function in the full mode required by them, except in union with God, except by being watered with the living water of the godlike Ghost. It is something analogue to the fact that the man has lungs, or he has eyes, but without the air the lungs must breathe, or without the light the eyes must see, neither the lungs nor the eyes could work as it is due. The human being is created for a communion life not only with the fellow humans, but also with God. The human being is a flower, but the flower needs sun and rain in order to grow up and in order to develop the whole its virtual beauty and fruitfulness. The human creature is a virtual speaking being, but there is needed a partner of dialogue in order the speech to be developed. And the most serious dialogue the human being has, it is that with God, and that implies also the thinking and the rationality in their most serious function. That's why the rational or the speaking soul of the human being, he becomes truly "alive", or he is set in working, only through the breathing of the Ghost within him. That's why the work of the Ghost was breathed within man in order his soul to be "alive". Only thus the man has been able to really accomplish all his wonderful potencies.

Therefore, this breathe of God, breathed as it was said, within Adam, until it was within him, not little glory and brightness of godlike image produced to the one who was partaker to it. Consequently, Adam behaved towards the things with foreseeing and prophesizing power, and He was together-creator with God[768], or the second god according to the grace. And through this, Adam was also pleasing God, the Maker of all things Who is above wisdom, with his all-bright views and prophecies[769].

But, because Adam kneeled down and fell, through mistake, under the all-evil obedience, the of-life-Maker Ghost got far from Adam, and Adam no longer understood to guard the greatness of such a high worthiness, Adam got closer to the non-understanding beasts and he became like them (Ps. 48[770]: 12). Thus, Adam in a pitiful and unconscious manner, he got far from his godlike purpose, and he consented to the all-frightening darkness, because of no longer having anything - due to his proven emptiness - out of the above-nature gift of that breath instilled within him by God.

But when the time of God's mercifulness came, God sent His Word to heal us up of our corruption (Ps. 106[771]: 20). And the Word bears the Ghost united with Him by nature, and the Ghost illuminates and makes obvious the Word's godhead[772], or, [768] Until Adam kept within himself the Ghost's breath, a life-giver-breath to all Adam's potencies, he was moving himself amongst things with a great power of understanding, by seeing beyond the things' organizational surface, the God's rationalities and on God Himself. Also, Adam had the power to foresee what the things were to take place like, for he knew that the things were happening while influenced by his great force of transfiguring them, of making them transparent in their revelator beauty of their endless and mysterious depths, to God. He also knew what the relations amongst people developed like: full of benevolence, of delicacy, of love, of always new communicativeness. Adam has prophesizing power, for he was together-creator with God, regarding the things' shapes, hidden in their depths.

[769] God likes being known by another mind - even being that a created mind – regarding His wisdom and power shown into creatures, but open through creatures in its endless depths and in its always new unveilings. God likes that somebody foresees, together with Him, the good things God is continuously revealing, like a father likes that his son to know that he will give his son, in the future, other and other presents, and by this to refresh and to ever-increase the son's love for him.

[772] The Ghost illuminates and makes obvious the Word's godhead in a continuous manner, to the end of the world, depending on the increase of the human understanding, and depending on the apparition of new and new circumstances which will need explanations, in the historical development of the mankind. Thus, on one hand the Revelation ended into Christ, for the whole godlike end it has been give us into Him, in the human shape. On the other hand, this if somebody wants to say so, His power, which the Prophet David said about, in his confession towards God, that it is for the whole mankind: "You have sent Your light and Your truth, and these ones will guide me to Your holy mountain, to the unitary and all-high knowledge or Yours, and to Your dwelling places (Ps. 42[773]: 3) and the views of Your glory". By being the mind that bears God, guided to these ones, and the mind, by ascending to them and by dwelling into them, that mind reaches above the seen things, and it somehow gets closer to The All-High God. Once arrived, therefore, the true Word of God, bearing the Holy Ghost into Him, by nature, in His quality as Holy Word of God, it is given to all the ones who have received- through faith – the Holy Word of God, to immediately receive the Holy Ghost too, for the Holy Ghost is doubtlessly always together with the Word; the Holy Ghost is given them not only by breath into their face, like Adam received the Ghost form the Father, and later the disciples of Christ received the Holy Ghost through the breath of Christ (Jn. 20: 22), but, suddenly, in an unseen manner, as a breath (Acts 2: 2) of the Ghost Who obviously breaths the grace of the Ghost. As such, the ones who are imparted with Him, they see, in an understanding manner, the Ghost as always gushing out of them, like a water spring, and illuminating them. By this, the Ghost gives them to seen with their mind, in a wonderful way, the things given to them through their birth anew, and the things belonging to the godlike glory end is unveiled by the Holy Ghost, continuously and successively. The Ghost doesn't make us known something that isn't given into Christ, namely the Ghost doesn't bring us a new Revelation or a Revelation not given into Christ. The Lord said: "He will take out of Mine and He will herald to you" (Jn. 16: 14). The Revelation came to an end into Christ, but the Revelation's content it is ceaselessly being unveiled, it is being ceaselessly impropriated by people, and not only through people, but also through the godlike work of the Holy Ghost. This guiding through the Ghost it leads the mankind, on the other hand, towards the stature of the consummate man Who is Christ, but not beyond Him. Christ is the "mountain" which the Holy Ghost guides the people towards. It is about a guiding towards the full dwelling of the people into Christ, into the treasures of knowledge and of kindness, into the endlessly rich rooms of His Kingdom – namely rooms full with Him. This is the Revelation's dynamism. And so must be the Tradition understood too. Nothing of what is given into Scripture and in the Church's definitions, which have remained faithful to the Apostles, it is changed, but it is deepened, it is highlighted, and so the Revelation's endless richness is increasingly more assimilated. On the other hand, the whole power of the Ghost is out of Christ, for all the generations of people.

[773] We have in the KJB: Psalm 43: 3: "O send out thy light and thy truth: let them lead me; let them bring me unto thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles."; in the ROB we have: Psalm 42: 3: "Send Your light and Your truth; these ones advised me and guided me to Your holy mountain and to Your dwelling places."

become to them possible to know and to impropriate[774]. And by being the mind imparted – in an above-nature way – with the Ghost, through the grace, the mind entirely becomes seer, in a mysterious manner, some great good things. And, by advancing with the steadfast help of the grace, it reaches to foresights and to fore-knowing, through the illumination of the Holy Ghost, and the mind ascends, thus, on the God's plan, and it sees the hypostatical and above-mind union of the godlike nature with the human nature, and the overflow of the Holy Ghost over all things[775]. It is a union and it is an overflow unseen by Adam like that, because Adam didn't reach to be partaker to the godlike nature, neither real god through working.

17-18. About the Godlike Work and about the Human Work, and About Peace.

Let's look - according to our power - at the difference between the work of the Holy Ghost and the aspects belonging to it, and our natural work and the aspects belonging to it. We are going to immediately notice that it is impossible to us to be in peace only through our natural work. This is for the peace is the true fruit of the Holy Ghost, like the true love and the true joys it is the true fruit of the Holy Ghost, in order the ones who are imparted with the Ghost, to behave themselves with patience and with gentleness and to be wholly full with kindness and to make their neighbors too, as partakers to the Ghost's Kingdom.

[774] The Ghost is given to the ones who believe in Christ, in the same time with the grace of the baptism. But after the Ghost dwells within them through objective grace, with the whole His richness of glory and good things, the Ghost makes them gradually see these ones and to subjectively impropriate them. We enter the dialogue of deeds and of meanings with Christ, through the Ghost, like the Ghost is in a dialogue, from ever, with the Son, or the Son is, through the Ghost in an eternal dialogue with the Father.

[775] We think that here isn't about the union between the hypostasis of the godlike nature and the human nature, done by Christ, but is it about the union of the godlike nature hypostatized into the godlike Persons, with the human nature hypostatized in the human persons, namely it is about the union of the godlike hypostases of Persons, with the hypostases of human persons. In this nature persist in existence the human hypostasis or hypostases, as it doesn't happen into Christ, where the human hypostasis is replaced for the Word's hypostasis. It is a union between the godlike Person, or between the godlike Persons, and the human persons, the human persons being in an almost similar union with that of the Trinitarian Persons. It is a maximum union, but it is a union which no human person is lost within. This union is done through the full Ghost's overflow upon all of them. This is because, until the man is not united, through the Ghost, with all the others, that human person won't be fully united with God, and within that person still remains a separation sentiment.

No natural work of ours is separated, by itself, from a soul's impulse, for each of them is the movement of some part of the wrath. But neither is moved some work our ours, without our will. And the will, into the doing one, it depends on his lust, while in the seer one (in the contemplative one) it depends on his desire. That's why, in no natural work of ours will be quenched the lust and the anger, if we want to do that work as it is due.

The above-nature work of the Holy Ghost within our heart, it doesn't have its birth anywhere into nature, but it is a non-understood apparition in the ones whom He has mercy on. That's why, His work moves, or, in other words, it is lit up, in a shown manner, without the participation of our will. In order to do that, the Ghost's work doesn't need anything from us, either you will call it as illumination, or as showing of the Ghost. The Ghost's work needs only that the one who is partaker to look at it – without disturbance – into his heart, and to delight himself in an above-nature manner.

That's why, the godlike work, by not needing any will of us, neither needing a soke natural impulse in order to be set in movement, it is proven that the lust and the anger remain non-working in it. And, to say it briefly, the passionate part of the soul (the anger and the lust) lays cast away and non-working, and, out of the heart, there is working in an above-nature manner, only the breath of the life-Maker Ghost. And the mind rejoices and it is alive. That's why, the mind looks towards God, peacefully and serenely, and with the whole dispassion and with the whole soul, as it is due[776]. In this state, the soul is in a loving connection with God, by having the Ghost as source of the [776] This is an analysis a conclusion worthy of being remarked, upon the causes and upon the effects of the human and godlike works. When within us it is moving a good work without inferior lust and without anger, it is a sign that that work if from God, or from the Holy Ghost. And then we have a clean joy by doing it. We impropriate that work through this joy, but we will ascertain that that work is not from us. And the joy belongs to the mind. The mind also feels the new live shown within the soul. The passionate part of the soul, or the wrath (the anger) and the lust, it is in a non-working state. From here comes the peace which the mind contemplated God with, and which the mind rejoices with, of the Ghost's work within the soul, a peace that has brought to non-working – or to dispassion – the soul's passionate part. Thus, the dispassion is a state of peace, an absence of the passions, one giving the mind, undisturbed, the possibility of contemplating God, or even to contemplate the mystery of the fellow humans, and of the things, a mystery that is too, as hidden into God. While in the previous spiritual writings, it has been simply affirmed the need for cleaning up the passions and of achieving the dispassion, in order the mind to be able to contemplate God, here is being explained the need for the soul's passionate power themselves, to become non-working on that purpose, and the mode which one can reach that like.

illumination and of the stretching towards God. And thus, it looks towards God, for the soul has reached the knowledge of the untold and above-light godlike beauty, and the soul love God Who is above beauty and the soul rejoices in an impossible to express manner, that he knows the Father and the inheritance of the Lord Who is so infinite, so borderless, and so non-comprised, and now he knows the Lord Himself for His untold godlike mercy. Consequently, that soul experiences a wonderful peace, by seeing himself, due to the grace, as not lacking in any regards that highest and above-mind good. And the wrath (the anger), according to the said things, by not working, due to the work of the Comforter that moves by itself, the long-suffering, the gentleness, together with the greatest kindness, they are the state guiding – according to them – the soul's behavior, given they are the fruits of the Holy Ghost (Gal. 5: 22), which the ones who have found mercy[777] are imparted with. On the opposite, the ghost of the straying and of the lie, though seemingly it moves within the soul without the will and the impulse of the one who is partaker to it, it doesn't make either the passionate part to get appeased, but it moves it even more, nor sets in work the love for God, or the joy, or the peace. This is because the lie is disordered, and changing, and totally stranger to that peace and to that serenity according to God.

Wonderful You are, Lord, smooth light of the wonderful and supra-resting peace, and loved, and wonderful by nature, rejoicing the many, shining at maximum. I wonder, You Almighty, Holy Master, that the one whom You have touched through untold touches, for Your endless kindness, that one still lives to himself and not to You (2 Cor. 5: 15), to The One Who is above existence, to the life-maker-life and to the source of all good and beautiful things. This is for that woman, for she touched You, and not even You but Your vestment, and better said not even Your vestment but only a tassel of it, and even in hidden, she still was liberated from such a life of illness (Mt. 9Ş 21-22), and she received, in a wonderful way, a healthy life, what can happen to the one, and what life can he receive, oh Emperor, that one whom You touch, out of Your kindness and in a seen manner, with godlike untold touches, in order to fulfill Your mercy on him, in a wonderful way? We know that, for You touched with Your hand, the Peter's mother-in-law, her high temperature vanished, and her, for she has received full health, she immediately rose and she was serving You, full of bewilderment (Mk. 1: 30-31) and full of joy. But that touch happened to that woman only one time and from outside, for it was done with the hand. So, if that woman, according to what was said, she achieved such a full health, what should happen to the ones who You has been touching not once, but constantly, day and night, and that not from outside, but in the heart' inner chamber, with the greatest love for the soul and strengthening them, visibly, in the things happening to them and comforting them in what they need and making them thousands of good things? How, therefore, You the Highest, some like these ones will live to themselves, and no rather entirely to You, s it is due? Better said, how, even by living only to You, won't they reckon themselves as miserable and won't they bow down their heads, humbly, in front of the one who would see them ceasing, even for a short time, to show their gratitude for such a wonderful help given them through Your grace? Glory to You, to You the truly Most-Glorified, You Who glorify the ones who are humble in thought, and You make them so extolled, for, by obliging them with many and endless good things through the untold gifts, You have made them humbler in their thought. This is for, by giving them the grace, You are enrooted in a wonderful way, into their heart, as a heart belonging to one who have been glorified. This is for Yourself said limpidly, the Wisdom of God, in Solomon[778]: "I took root in glorified people, more than one can imagine. For that, I raised up like a cedar from Lebanon" (Sirach[779] 24: 14) into heart, "raising myself above the things from bellow", namely above the earthly things, "at height, or on the godlike, maintain", reaching at the height of the godlike meanings. And he says further: "I stretched my branches like a terebinth", one can understand, here, in the ones whom "I took root" within through the Ghost's grace[780]. "And My branches are the branches of the glory and of the grace" (Wisdom of Sirach[781] 24: 19). I've said the whole truth, You Who are Yourself the truth, the truths from Yourself, You Lord. For this, the clean and chosen by You soul, as a bride[782], that soul desired to seat, in cleanness, under Your shadow. And the soul immediately reached under Your shadow. You show Your fruit that sweetens it with richness, and not simply, but in her throat.

[777] The gentleness, the kindness, and the peace, they dwell within soul due to the fact that the soul's wrath is put on non-working. They are, preponderantly, the fruits of the Holy Ghost.

[778] In KJB we don't have this book. You can find it on www.academia.edu, translated by us in English language from Romanian language, from ROB. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[779] We do not know why the author speaks about The Wisdom of Solomon, and then he specifies that he quotes from The Book of the Wisdom of Joshua, the Son of Sirach (the Ecclesiastes), a book that also is absent from KJB. And we also specify, just in order not to confuse the reader, that in the ROB there are two books containing the name Ecclesiastes (one placed after The Proverbs, and the second one missing from KJB, but place on ROB after The Book of the Wisdom of Solomon. (E. l. t.'s n.)

This is because not everybody reaches, simply and suddenly, the sweetness of God, with their feeling. That's far from something like that. That is for then he says "the mandrake spread aromatic fragrance and like a chosen myrrh spread a good scent" (Son of Songs 7: 13), it doesn't do that for everybody. And this was shown by Saint Paul, by saying that "to some people, the One and the Same has become Himself fragrance of the life towards life, and to some other people as fragrance of death towards death" (2 Cor. 2: 16). Likewise, the godlike sweetness, and if you want to say so, also the God's glory, seen together with this, it doesn't allow everybody to catch it, but only some people can do that due to their understanding feelings[783].

[780] Like one can say that God took root in the ones who love Him, likewise one can say that those ones too took root in God. And one can even say more. This is for God nourishes them with true life. By taking root in to the God's infinity, or increasingly deeper into God's infinity, themselves grow up with their understanding, in their life, in the fruits they are producing. But God too, by taking root within them, He shows within them, increasingly more, the infinity of His life and His fruition within them. Even the rooting of the limitless God, within man, by creating an intimate communion between Him and man, it concretely makes the man to no longer living inside some limits, but into the godlike endlessness, by participating to the godlike endlessness. In both formulations it is shown the infinite value granted by God to the man, the perspective of the eternal man's growing up into God, without ceasing, though, to remain man by his nature and by the color the man gives it to the content which he has received it out of God. This reciprocal enrooting reached its supreme depth and it has been done for eternity into Jesus Christ.

[782] We are mentioning here again that the soul is in Greek language of feminine genre (φυχή).

[783] We've said this in another place too: the term of "understanding feeling" or of "mind's feeling", so often used by the Holy Fathers, it means understanding and experiencing in the same time, or living in the ambience of a spiritual presence, and finding out a meaning of that presence. You understand a person when living in that person's ambience, when that person becomes interior to you and when you become interior to that person. It is like a 'spiritual" touching of the spiritual life belonging to the another, of his states, of his intentions, of his soul's specificity, concomitantly to "understanding" him. Some people have this "understanding feeling" more extensively, other less than that, and others don't have it almost at all. The last ones give the impression of some spiritually blind people, like the ones who lost

These ones striving to appeasing themselves, and who, by visibly being imparted with the godlike benevolence, they have achieved the life-maker-and-illuminator Ghost[784]. And, usually, it becomes felt, as much as it is possible to human, to the ones who are clean in heart[785].

Of much honor would have been worthy the noisy, and unclean - and obviously not partaker to the Ghost - life, if such a life had received from God His glory and His sweetness into the soul's feeling. But such a thing doesn't happen by any means! In order to achieve that, one need to run away from the world, and one needs the loneliness following to that, and the appeasing, and the life in withdrawal, and the virtuous behavior, and the watchfulness, and the attentive prayer, and all the aspects characterizing the ones who repent consummately. These aspects are required in order to give place within the soul, to the limitless kindness of the godlike love, and God to dwell within the soul that is toilingly searching for Him, and He to become, out of His wonderful mercy, one Ghost with the person's soul, making root in the heart's depth, and from there He to illuminate in a wonderful manner; and He to grow up like a tree and He to raise Himself at height and He to widen Himself in mind's branches and to bring fruits like: the love, the joy, the peace, the long-suffering, the kindness, and the gentleness (Gal. 5: 22) and other tens of thousands of good things, and to nourish with these good things the one who is partaker to Him. If you appropriately judge the things which happen, you will be able to image how much feeling of the glory, of the good fragrance, and of the sweetness, which that soul will be entered by, out of yet unknown fruits of the life-maker-and-illuminator Ghost. This is why, truly happy are the ones clean in their heart due to knowing the virtues, for those ones will see God (Mt. 5: 8), their senses of: tasting, smelling, and hearing. They give the impression of some blunt spirits, of some dumb ones. Usually, the ones having their "understanding meaning" sharpened for their fellow humans, they have it also for the mysterious presence of God.

[784] Just this "understanding feeling" of the mysterious and spiritual presence of God and of the person's fellow humans, it has the character of an illumination. It is an illumination produced by the Holy Ghost, when it comes about "understandingly feeling" about God.

[785] "The heart's cleanness" it is an especially delicate and fine sensitiveness of the man who is liberated from the inferior egotistic impulses. It is characteristic to the ones who don't have their mind fille dup with all sorts of images of the objects and with the affection for those objects, or filled up with the bodily and worldly interests in those things, or even with their interest in others' persons regarded as instruments for satisfying their egotistic interests and pleasures.

more fully and more obviously in the future life, and now like in an earnest (Ephes. 1: 14), according to the Scriptures, according to which they not only see and will see, but they will accordingly live too, in an appropriate manner, the things from above nature, and they partially experience those things, and they rejoice, even from now, of those things into Christ.

19. About the Contemplative (Seer) Life; and which are the Things the Seer Must Have; and about the Fact that the Prayer Belongs to the Seer Part; and that the Sight (the Contemplation) Is Reckoned, by the Holy Fathers, as Replacing the Prayer.

The contemplative (seer) life is together-living and endlessly friend with the holy prayer. And both of them are the fullest with grace and deifier offspring of the soul. That's why they are totally inseparable deeds of that soul that is borne by God, namely of that soul that is worked by God according to the rules. Due to the told things, the sight and the prayer are so tightly united to one another, that the Holy Fathers unitarily say that those are deed and contemplation (sight) of the mind. This is for Saint Isaac says: "The mind's deed, in its thin work, it consists of the occupation with God and in the striving in prayer and in the things consequent to it. It is done in the lusting (soul's) part, and it is called as sight (contemplation)"[786].

We have here a sign of the unity, more that a sign of the unity of both of them, namely of the prayer and of the sight (contemplation)[787]. That's why the same one adds too, that "the sight (contemplation) cleans up the soul's loving work, which is a natural desire that makes the soul's understanding part to be limpid". It is about a work belonging to the soul's contemplative (seer) part, namely of prayer and sight (contemplation)[788]. That's [786] Place not found. The spiritual sight (the contemplation) is done by the mind, also through the soul's lusting part, as the sensitive sight too, for within sight there is a longing for seeing, namely for knowing. Of course, that, in the spiritual sight, the soul's lust is elevated on a spiritual level, so that one can say, on the other hand, that the lust, understood as an inferior lust, it has ceased to exist. The lust is extended on all the human being's levels, from the bodily level to the spiritual level.

[787] Between prayer and sight (contemplation) there isn't only a union as between two works, but there is a unity by the fact that they bot have become a sole work. When the soul intensely prays to God, that soul "sees" God (that soul contemplates God), and inversely, when the soul "sees" (contemplates) God, that soul prays in a non-scattered manner.

[788] The true love cleans up the mind, in order the mind to truly be able to know God. Where there is not love, there is egotism. And the egotism doesn't allow truly knowing and understanding the another, either of God. But, at its turn, seeing (contemplating) God, it cleans why says Saint Maximos too, he says: "One cannot clean up his mind without him dialoguing with God and without him seeing (contemplating) God"[789]. And again: "The withdrawal and the sight (contemplation) and the prayer, they diminish the lust and they even make it stop[790]; and the cogitating part of the soul it is again set in a blessed movement, for it directs itself towards God, by spiritually seeing and by praying"[791]. And again: "You wing up your cogitation by reading, by watchfulness (contemplation), and by prayer".

Thus, the sight (the contemplation) is in everything as a much-needed companion of the prayer. And both of them are a work belonging to the soul's understanding part – or, better said, to the soul's cogitating part – and they are inseparable when the mind is led in a healthy manner. They help to one another, when the cogitation is healthy and it perseveres in quietude with knower understanding[792]. That's why, the Holy Fathers called the mind that prays without working the sight (the contemplation) as a non-winged bird, as one unable to raise towards God with the mind's feelings set in movement, and one unable to totally separate itself from the earthly things, neither up the human nature's desire for loving God. So, we have this order: a) contemplation united with the prayer, maintained by lust; b) the love cleaned up through contemplation and prayer; and c) the mind's capacity of knowing God, when the mind is cleaned by love. But the contemplation united with the prayer, though they are maintained by lust, they still belong to the soul's contemplative (seer, knower) part.

[789] Place not found. The contemplation is dialogue in the same time, for it is prayer too. In dialogue there doesn't speak only the man, but firstly there speaks God. The man hears and he feels obliged to answer by praying. In this hearing one contemplates the God's presence and will. This cleans up the mind of the sinful impulse of locking up in itself.

[790] Here is about another lust, namely it is about the bodily lust.

[791] The contemplation and the prayer, they set the mind in the due movement, through which the mind can know God, by untying the mind from the inferior lust that impedes the mind from this natural movement of the mind.

[792] The "sight" (the contemplation) or the awareness about God's presence, and about the connection with God through prayer, it is "together-grown up" with the mind, or with the healthy, or vigorous, cogitation, one that perseveres in quietude and one that skillfully defends its quietude. Only when troubled by all sorts of worldly worries and temptations, the mind, by getting weakening, and by forgetting about itself in the bas sense of the word, that mind no longer is limpidly aware of God's presence, neither that mind has the power for persevering in the connection with God, by praying. That's why the effort towards prayer and towards the limpidness of the awareness about the God's presence, it is too, the best method of healing the mind up, of restoring the capacity of knowing God as essential reality, by serenely persevering into contemplating Him.

to come closer to heavenly things with the whole soul's vigor[793]. According to Saint Maximos, the sight (the contemplation) cleans the mind up, and the state of prayer it presents the mind, as empty (emptied), to God[794]. It is obvious that the prayer does this, through the mind's sight (contemplation)[795], which the mind wouldn't have had it if the mind hadn't had the possibility of stretching towards seeing God, as much as it is possible to the human being[796].

The mind's cleanness is shown, he says, in discovering the mysteries[797]. Then, the mind's cleanness is the consummation of the living in the heavenly sight (contemplation), that moves outside senses through the spiritual power of the world from above, of the countless wonders[798]. That's why the seer prays in a superior manner, by having his understanding cleaned up through the contemplation's science[799]. This is for, due to this cleanness, he sees God, as much as it is possible, and he reaches to be truly happy, by praying.

[793] The mind's nature isn't that of simply being in a continuous movement, but that of being in an elevating movement, like a winged-up bird, and not like a creature crawling down on earth. The mind is happy only when entering the desired wide horizons.

[794] The same thing is said by Saint Maximos the Confessor, in the Heads about Love, III, 97, where he says that the mind takes the things' images, but when arriving into God, the mind becomes shapeless, namely the mind finds then its state of limitlessness (The Romanian Philokalia, volume II, p. 97). And in the Gnostic Heads, I, 83, he says that the mind cannot come close to God except when "emptied" of all images referring to God (The Romanian Philokalia, volume II, p. 158). About the vigor which the mind is given with, by the prayer, Saint Maximos speaks in the Heads about Love, II, 52 (The Romanian Philokalia, volume II, p. 66). And about the mind's flight towards God, the mind being winged up by the love for God, a love that sets the mind free of all its connections with the material things, Saint Maximos the Confessor speaks in Heads about Love, I, 10 (The Romanian Philokalia, II, p. 38). In many heads it is shown that through the mind's cleaning we must understand the mind's cleaning up of its passionate connections with the material things (for instance: Heads about Love I, 14; The Romanian Philokalia, volume II, p. 39).

[795] Only for in the prayer, one can live the "sight" of God, the prayer can empty the mind of all things' images.

[796] In prayer there will be a sight. But only if the mind, at its turn, it stretches itself towards this sight.

[797] The Mystery of the mysteries, the Mystery comprising all the mysteries, it is God. The cleaned mind, emptied of all the images limiting the mind, for that mind regains its limitlessness, that mind live into the limitless God and it advances in Him endlessly.

[798] The power of the world from above, it is given by the Holy Ghost. That's why only through the power of the Ghost, a power received from above, the mind is moved, being done with the mind countless wonders, and the mind lives the experience of those wonders.

[799] The contemplation's science is a practical science, achieved by training and experience. In it, the seer has cleaned his understanding, and that's why his prayer is a superior prayer.

20. About: "Ghost is God and the Ones Who Worship Him They Owe to Worship Him in Ghost and Truth" (Jn. 4: 24)

"Ghost is God, he says, and the one who worship Him they owe Him to worship Him in Ghost and truth" (Jn. 4: 24). He spoke about worshippers at plural, and not about a worshiper as singular. And this is as appropriate as one can get, since "God wants all the people to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. 2: 4). And, actually, the Savior wants this, for He has prepared many dwelling places (Jn. 14: 2), towards the joy of the ones who will be found worthy. This is wanted by the Angel of the great advice, That One Who, for the abundance of His love for people, He stretches His upholder hands to the wise people, and to the unwise people, and to the people who are poorly speaking and blunt with their understanding; The One Who gives all the people His savior help, and Who works specifically, and in many ways, according to the feature and to the will of each one of them, and I would say here, also according to the power and to the learning of the one who let himself be guided by God, and who has decided, according to the said things, to worship God. This is because, sometimes, even if somebody has a good nature, because of lacking a teacher, he doesn't succeed in reaching the consummate target wanted by God, while others, on the opposite, for they have an experienced teacher in the godlike and spiritual things, they are impeded by the weakness of their nature in ascending towards consummation. But both of them, and all of them together, they will be able, if they can, to worship God in Ghost and truth, each one according to the group which he is appointed in, or according to the power, or according to the gift that person has from everybody's God. For instance, the non-endowed one, if he acts according to the commandments and to the faith, by humbly following the endowed ones, he obviously worships God in Ghost and truth. This is for the Ghost is in the faith that limpidly speaks about the godlike and unseen things. This is for he says: "The words I am telling you are Ghost and life: (Jn. 6: 63)[800]. And I cannot believe that somebody is so blunt in his understanding, so that he wants to discern by himself, the wonderful and deifier commandments of the Truth, someway, from the truth[801].

Thus, the one who follows, as it has been said, to the faith, that one worships God in truth and in Ghost, and God teaches him the faith's things. And that's why such a believer can be called as doer and seer[802]. And the one who occupies himself with knowing the creatures and the Holy Scripture, and from these ones he is elevated, appropriately, as from what is seen and spoken, to God, as one is elevated from the body to the understanding's things, that one obviously is elevated to the Ghost and, by this, in an unmediated manner, to what is above mind, namely to God Who is The Truth above any truth, and that man worships God in the most limpid manner, into Ghost and truth[803]. Likewise, the ones who sing and who pray, if they understand the meaning of the words and if they persevere in that meaning, as much as it is possible to them, they worship God in Ghost and truth. This is for the holy words of the Psalms and of the prayers, they obviously are Ghost and truth[804]. But also, the one who has gathered himself into himself, through the obvious impartation with the Ghost[805], and by being influenced by the Ghost, and the man cogitates at God in the light of the knowledge, unitarily and without sight, he also worships God in Ghost and truth in a superior manner[806]. And again, in addition [801] The Truth doesn't differ from the One Who is the Truth by Himself, namely from the supreme Subject of the Truth. A truth standing by itself, and not being thought by a Subject-Person, out of Who the whole truth irradiates, such a truth cannot be cogitated. Not even the simplest man can imagine such thing. And by seeing into truth the Subject of the truth, the man worships God in truth, or as to the One Who is the truth's Source.

---

[802] These are the two main stages of the spiritual ascent.

[803] That one who ascends from the natural knowledge to the supra-natural knowledge, he ascends on the Ghost's level. But on that level is the full Truth too.

[804] The meaning of the Psalm's words, and of the prayer, it is ghost and truth, but it becomes like this in the one who utters them, when he assimilated them to his own being, namely when he makes them intimately his. Then he is in truth and in Ghost, for through those words he not only tells the truth, but he also makes known the power of life, of the One Who has filled him up (the Ghost). Between truth and Ghost there is no separation, for the truth is alive, as one irradiating out of the living God. Any person is truth, but a person is truth because is alive. This is valid, infinitely more and by excellence, to the godlike Person or to the Person of the Holy Trinity united according to Their being.

[805] Nobody can gather himself into himself, except through the Ghost. Somehow, the man himself is transcendent to himself, or he is above nature, and that's why the man only knows his own self in relation with God Who is the supreme transcendence.

[806] In looking at the creatures, in reading the Scriptures, in cogitating at the meanings of the prayers' words, the mind is unfolded and elevated to God, by passing, one at the time, from one to another, out of His powers and gifts. But when the mind gathers itself up from all these to all of these, the one who mirrors in himself the light of the glory of Christ's oikonomia, as much as it is possible, and the following overflow of the working and comforting Ghost, at the believers, starter from the Father and through the Son, that one too, he truly worships God, in truth and in Ghost, and into Christ Jesus.

21. About Prayer

"The One Who teaches the man knowledge is God" (Ps. 93[807]: 10), as it has been written. But how does He teach the man? By giving the man prayer, in a holy breeze of the Ghost Who always blows within the one who prays[808]. Really so, this holy prayer, by being a great gift from the supra-kind grace, it becomes teacher to the one who has achieved it, and it limpidly serves, as some kind of mirror, to the soul's face[809]. In this mirror the mind can limpidly see its deviations, its wanderings, its addictions, its idleness, and its deceits; and not only these ones, but also the view of the cleanness, the extended light of the sight (contemplation), the ghost of the godlike and deifying elevation towards God, and the flame of fire fueled up by the love for God, the simplicity and the understanding's freedom of images, the silence regarding all the things following since here, and the awe full of much joy. Generally speaking, the mind knows in prayer, without mistake, its own feelings and ones ("is folded up"), that mind cogitates at God as at the endless unit. All the contents of His life are contemplated in the same time, in their unity. The mind feels then as sunken, superiorly, in the truth of the Trinity of Persons, and into the Ghost, or in Their power as communicated to the man.

[808] The knowledge is produces by prayer, for the prayer itself is a breeze blown by the Holy Ghost within soul. So, the knowledge is the unmediated contact with God Who makes Himself present within the man's being, through blowing. God makes Himself know in prayer, for He produces within soul, by His presence, the need for the man to address Him. God makes Himself present within soul as dialogue partner.

[809] The prayer gives the soul self-knowledge, by the fact that it becomes a mirror which the soul looks at himself in. But the prayer becomes mirror to the soul by the fact that God – or the grace of the Ghost - upholds it to the soul's face. The soul cannot hold that mirror up, by himself. The prayer, as the mirror too, it has an objective support. That's why the soul, by seeing himself in prayer, he is, in the same time, aware of the fact that he is kept in connection with God. But the soul knows himself in prayer, with all his good and evil impulses. And the soul will see, in the same time, his imageless simplicity, if he has been elevated to the cleanness of all connections with the things. The absorption in the sight of this untold mystery of his, it produces within the soul a silence about all things, a silence about himself too, and an overwhelming awe.

aspirations, like they are, and the mind discovers limpidly the rifts causes of the start of their movements; and the mind heals some of them, and it sticks with others of them, as much as it can, as those ones are worthy to be cared or to be healed.

Thus, he reaches at the skillful living of the monks, because he doesn't only learn out of the need for using, as it is due, his mind and his rationality, his understanding and his feeling, but also in order to give the anger and the lust the due things. And, by and large, he will know how to do, well and nice, the carefully created harmony of the soul's powers, with an unachieved skillfulness, by learning how to make them resound, in a seen manner, as a spiritual song, one sweeter than any other, in doing, and in working the sight (contemplation)[810]. Therefore, the beloved peace from God it dwells together with the full of grace joy, within the one who has mysteriously learnt the true prayer and who has been wholly adorned with the Ghost's fruits. Consequently, the one who has reckoned that he must ceaselessly pray (1 Tess. 5: 17), with the whole zeal, and on all the ways, as the Apostles says, and who strives himself, as much as possible, to work this, he will be placed amongst the Christ's disciples. This is for, by following the teachings about the holy prayer, he has become son of the Christ's grace.

22. How Many Works the Prayer Has and of How Much Honor the Prayer is Worthy.

If the holy spiritual prayer had been only the teacher and the one that shows the duties belonging to virtue, and it would still have been worthy of many praises! But as it is not only teacher and showing, but it is also the comforting urging towards all good things, won't it be above all the holy praises? But because both the teaching and the comforting urging, they remain without the due fruit, because of the weakness of the taught and urged one, there is necessary a power according to their measure, so that, by searching, you will find out, in the same time, the fact that the prayer give the soul also the Ghost's power towards work. So great is the power of the prayer of the pious ones. And this is rightly so. This is for the instilled prayer and, to say so, alive and visibly moved by ceaselessly springing out from the heart, and having this feature by being imparted with the Holy Ghost and by the work of the Holy Ghost, it has, consequently, these three works: teaching the believers the due things, comfortingly urging towards the toils for accomplishing the necessary things, and before these, the power towards making easier the things which are difficult to accomplish. That's why, our Lord ad Giver of the Ghost, He said: "You will get power when the Holy Ghost will come upon you" (Acts 1: 8). And He calls this power, limpidly, as "Comforter and Teacher", by saying: "The Comforter, the Holy Ghost, Whom the Father will send in My name, That One will teach you everything and He will remember you what I told you" (Jn. 14: 26). And the fact that through prayer, everyone is given the showing of the Ghost towards benefit, it is limpidly shown by Saint Paul's teaching, for he adds that one is given the wisdom's ghost, another is given the knowledge's ghost, and again, another is given the healing's ghost (1 Cor. 12: 8-9) and to other the other gifts, which the Apostle mentioned about. And these are worked by One and the Same Ghost, by sharing each one individually, as the Ghost wants (1 Cor. 12: 11).

[810] It is a skillfulness, or an understanding coming to the spiritual man as a gift from above, that one of not allowing a soul's power to exceed the measure in its working, and keeping all the soul's powers in a harmonious balance. This harmony is felt like a harmony, one sweeter than any other, both in deeds and in thoughts. That man won't bring out strident tones in his behavior, neither in his spiritual life, by - for instance - accentuating too much the rationality in comparison to the feeling, of by practicing a sentimentalism lacking any measure and thinking. About this sweetness we are told also in the head no. 74, from the "Centuria of Kallistos and Ignatius", as there we are also told about the joy and the love accompanying that sweetness. This makes us to reckon again, that the same Kallistos who is the author of the present writing, he is also one of the Centuria's authors.

And the ones who has become partaker, on any way, to the gift of the Ghost, and then he receives, necessarily, the three works, namely the above-nature power, the above-world teaching, and the godlike comforting, as we've shown by mentioning the holy words of the Lord. Besides, the Lord says too: "Without Me, you can't do anything" (Jn. 15: 5), and thus He doubtlessly shows that in order to commit every necessary thing, one need the godlike power. But also, when He says: "Do not call anyone as teacher on earth, for One is your Teacher and Guide, Christ" (Mt. 23: 10), it limpidly shows that the man needs the godlike teaching towards the ought things and towards the things done according to the will of God. And when He stresses that saying: "I will ask the Father and He will send you another Comforter, the Ghost of the Truth, in order Him to remain with you forever" (Jn. 14: 16), you think at the all-necessary, and non-separated from the grace, solace.

So, it has been shown the sharing of the gifts, sharing that differs, in some regards, one from another. This is for something else is the wisdom and something else is the knowledge, according to their kind. And the prophecy isn't the same thing with the things said before. And something else are the gifts of the healing. And shortly saying, each gift of the Ghost differs from one another, as the Apostle listed them (1 Cor. 12: 8-9).

Each gift is adorned with the three spiritual works of the life-maker Ghost. Otherwise, how would have been the created and tied to the body mind, partaker to its good things and to virtue, if the mind hadn't had an impartation power that is above-skies[811], while even the angles cannot do this by themselves? And how will be the mind able to be imparted with the above-skies things, without the mysterious guidance of the Ghost? It is obvious that the mind will get dizzy before reaching such a great height of the godlike generosity and of the tireless strength of the virtue, if it doesn't receive the holy urging comforting form the Good One.

So, what must we cogitate at, about the consummate prayer, that one under the influence of the Ghost, that prayer that is occasioning every spiritual gift given to the soul, that prayer bringing with itself the power of the teaching and the comforting from the Holy Ghost? What praises it isn't more than worthy such a prayer, and how much must such a prayer be honored by the ones who have received it by grace, and by the ones who are still searching for it but they do not have it yet, since such a prayer ties with holy ties the mind to God, into Christ Jesus, the One who really is the Son of God?[812]

23. About Prayer.

After the mind has achieved with the help of the grace an obvious understanding of God, by cogitating at the things from [811] The nature isn't locked up in itself. All the less is the mind such – the mind being the highest part of the human soul. The mind doesn't develop its good things, except by being imparted with the Ghost's work. But this means that the mind has in itself the power for being imparted with that work.

[812] "ιεραις σχεση". The ties which the prayer ties the mind to Christ with, are affectionate relations, ones full of feeling. They aren't only sent by above, like some anchors in the soul's ground, but they also appear from bellow, out of the soul, as some actualizations of the soul's potencies, but always with the help sent from above, as some answers to the callings from above.

around God and by being instilled with the life-maker Ghost, let the mind study itself and its helplessness and let it see how far itself is from what the mind ought to be, because it is careless and because it forgets about its duties and because the mind is nescience regarding the due things. And so, by fulfilling the righteous and true work of self-rebuking and of the humble thought, the mind to get closer to God through prayer, through humble cogitation, but also with the trust and with the hope in the above-understanding love of God for the human being, out of untold kindness. This is for the Saint Paul teaches us to come closer to the grace's throne, daringly, trusting this overwhelming love (Hebr. 4: 16). This is because God accomplishes all this according to His will. That's why, let's not look at ourselves, during the prayer, but let's look at the non-remembering-of-evil and all-merciful power of the All-Good our God and Father, in order, thus, us to have too, easily, His truly savior love[813].

24. Explanation at the Word of God towards Abraham: "Leave your land". And about sight (contemplation).

God said to Abraham, namely to the crossing-through man[814]: "Leave your land and your kinship and the house of your father and come to the land I will show you, land out of which there flows milk and honey" (Gen. 12: 1). But He says now too, in a higher meaning, to the mind that has become understanding and it has crossed from the things known with the senses to the things thought with the mind: "Leave your feeling and namely also the things submitted to the sense and, simply speaking, leave the whole seen world, and come to the land I will show you". This resembles to what the Lord said: "Sell your wealth and give it to the poor and take your cross, namely crucify yourself to the feeling and to the things submitted to the senses and to the whole world and, by coming, follow Me" (Mk. 10: 21), for I will ascend to the Father; of course, not without the guiding Ghost.

There is said: "God said to Abraham", namely the Father said through the Word, or through the Son. And, continuing, [813] The love for God dwells within us when we look at His love for us, or when we feel His love for us working within us. Looking confidently at somebody's trait, it opens you soul in order your soul to receive that trait too.

[814] The human being is a crossing-through human being (περάτης) because he cannot remain at the seen things, but he crosses through, with his mind, to a cogitated world and from there to God.

God said: "And come to the land I will show you". But the pointing out is done by using the finger. And it has been said that the God's finger is the Holy Ghost, according to the word: "And if I, with the finger of God, I cast out the devils" (Lk. 11: 20). And this He interprets is in another place by saying: "Through the Ghost of God" (Mt. 12: 28). So said the Egyptians' wisemen too: "This work is the finger of God" (Exod. 8: 19), calling like this the work of God[815]. "In the land I will show you". It is like saying: "In the land which I will guide you to, through the Word and through the Ghost". "In the land where flows milk and honey"; namely, to the understanding of God Himself and to the knowledge of what God is[816]. To this knowledge which the mind must reach at, the mind cannot reach at otherwise, except by being guided and illuminated by the illumination of the-life-maker Ghost Who comes to be seen, through the Son of God. God Who loves the people, He attracts the usual mind in order the mind to cross above the influence of the created thought beings (the angels), as on another Abraham, from the things submitted to the senses, to beyond those ones, where is the unitary looking at, and contemplation of the godhead in three hypostases. That's why, it has been shown in a very appropriate manner, that He does this through the threefold power and work, of the unique godlike source[817].

This is for God Himself is, in the main meaning, the Promised Land, which we have been promised that it will be inherited by the gentle ones (Mt. 5: 5) and by the righteous in their heart, who will strive, through the Ghost, they to become God's inheritors. God is the land out of which flow milk and honey, and the morning lights, and the twin rays, and the life and the delectation and the cleanness of the whole world. We can call as Honey the One born out of the Father, the One Who is Father's inseparable Son, through His embodiment like in a honeycomb, out of which it is sweetened and gladdened, as somebody said, everything that is human, with the teachings and with the grace from above nature and with other tens of thousands of good things and of beauties[818]. Milk is the Holy Ghost, The Unitary One, and Who isn't born but He is proceeded and He is white like the light is, and He is the One Who with His nourishment He grows up towards God the speaking creatures, creatures who have become like children, and who will enter the Kingdom of Heavens, as the Lord said.

[815] The finger is the symbol for the work of appointing. Through the Ghost, God shows us the road which we have to go on. The Ghost is our godlike inspirer. The Holy Ghost showed the future to the Prophets.

[816] God is also the "land" which the gentle ones will inherit. The earth is given here as a symbol of what is the ultimate foundation of the things built up on it, or of the things growing up on it, and it is the symbol of the ultimate source of all the good things. This is God, as the "hypostasis", or as the ultimate base of everything that exists.

[817] Because the mind is attracted not only to contemplate a God by and large, but to contemplate a God threefold in hypostases, the mind is attracted by the together-working of all the three hypostases. The mind notices, on that peak, but also on the entire road to that peak, a God of the love, namely a God in Three Persons. This is for there couldn't have been an eternal love, if there had been only an impersonal essence.

So, the land, and the milk and the honey flowing out of the land, they must be seen according to their due meaning, as the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost[819]. In this land it is totally transplanted the mind that has reached here, according to the mentioned things, by the guiding and the power and the work of the godhead in Three Hypostases.

This is like, according to Paul, no one can see "Lord Jesus" except into the Holy Ghost (1 Cor. 12: 3), likewise nobody could gather the power of understanding and of seeing, of his own soul, towards the glory and the unitary greatness of the Trinitarian Unit, except through the power, through the work, and through the grace of the Trinity, in the same time with rejecting the things he feels through senses, and the thought things (seen with the thinking, or contemplated) in Scriptures and in the things submitted to the senses[820], and by withdrawing himself from all the measurable things.

[818] The Son of God has made the humanity as sweet as the honey is, for He has embodied Himself in humanity, wanting to sweeten all the people in their relations with His humanity, and amongst themselves. To this sweetness have reached the Saints. The Holy Ghost is, at His turn too, as sweet as the honey is, as it shows us the sweetness gained by the ones who live into Him; and he is white for He is innocent, an innocence imparted by Him to all the ones who believe in Christ with the whole their heart. Those ones have become, through their innocence, like children. And only by becoming like that, they will be able to enter the Kingdom of Heavens. We cannot enter there except by having a child feeling, namely if we are sons of the eternal God.

[819] We said in the footnote no. 550 that God is the land, for He is the base and the source of the whole existence. But in a more special sense, He is the Father, the Hypostasis Whom the other Two Hypostases come out from.

[820] He speaks here about the negative theology. Not only the sensitive things, but also the things thought on the basis of the Scripture and the sensitive things, all these must be forsaken, in order us to be elevated to the unitary understanding of God in Trinity. But the author doesn't say that the negative theology could elevate the mind at God, as a simple intellectual operation of denial of the known things, but he reckons that only united with the power and with the

This is for "in Your light", namely of God, namely in Your unitary illumination, "we will see the light" (Ps. 35[821]: 9), or we will see You, the One Who lightens our hearts and our minds. And, only by looking at Your things, we could know Your things, in order nobody to be able to praise with himself (1 Cor. 1: 29). For this, as Abraham that means crossing-through, for he was the first to get out, he left everything when he heard Your command and he moved into the land where flows milk and honey, and he received the changed name as Abraham, meaning father of many nations, likewise the mind, that, in the image of Abraham, through the power and through the work of the threefold hypostatical godhead, it goes out of the things submitted to the senses and out of the world's feeling, and it moves itself to the light, namely to contemplating and looking unitarily at the godhead Trinity, it is worthy to be called as crossing-through, and it becomes birth-giver and proceeding of some great and many untold and mysterious understandings, as of some peoples, given that are unveiled to it and are born out of it wonderful things, of which the mind rejoices and gladdens as a father of children, and it lives in that peace into Christ.

25. About Humbleness and about the sight of the soul (Contemplation).

"Wonderful are Your things, Lord, and my soul has got in awe, by knowing them very". The cause of the elevation with the mind it becomes powerful occasion for humbleness and what elevated the soul endlessly, namely what humbles the soul overwhelmingly. The humbleness is beginning of the sight and the sight is consummation of the humbleness. Even if somebody knows the wisdom of the whole world, but without humbleness, it will be impossible to him to achieve that sight that elevates. I call it as the sight that elevates, for the sight (the contemplation) had by the Hellenes, it doesn't elevate. But either without the sight that elevated, the man cannot get humble, and he won't bend his neck as circle (Isa. 58: 5). O, untold understanding of the One Who has built us up like this! Who could have ever known this, before seeing the highest elevation from grace of God, this negative theology can elevate the mind at God. So, he unites with the negative theology, a mysterious positive experiencing of God.

humbleness, after the overwhelming humbling from the most-high things?

But somebody could say too, about the deified mind, that "the one who lowered himself, that one is the one who has elevated himself too"; and to this one could add that the one who has elevated himself it is the one who has lowered himself too (Ephes. 4: 10). This is for when the mind reached to be gladden through the grace, into humbleness, of the most-high things, and it reaches to rejoice of the things from above word, as they would have been its own, then that mind descends, more than everybody, into humbleness[822]. David says: "Lord, my heart wouldn't have got elevated, neither my eyes would have looked upwards, nor would I have walked into the great things, neither in the wonderful and above me things, if I hadn't humbled my thought" (Ps. 130, 1-2). But the mind could say, be3sides this, and not without a reason, the opposite too: "Lord, I wouldn't have got humbled, neither would I have called myself as dust and ashes, if my heart hadn't been elevated and my eyes hadn't looked up and I hadn't walked into the great and wonderful things, from above me". O, You the Creator and the Emperor! You put awe within my heart when I know the thing of Your wisdom, the mind that has been built up as wise by Your Providence![823]

26. About the Same Things.

[822] We have here a great paradox: the humbleness is elevation and the elevation is humbleness. In humbleness, the human being rejoices of height and the true height is known only in humbleness. The differences between these two are annulled when these two are real. You live the endless elevation in the endless humbleness, and vice versa. The one who sinks into humbleness, that one sinks in the experience of the most essential reality, namely of the highest reality. The elevation that lacks the humbleness, it is a swelling up lacking the reality's content; it is a soap bubble. Everything the one who descends from height, out of love, he touches, he feels that up with his height. The Son of God, by making Himself as man, he has made the man as god. Or, in humbleness, one can see the reality in all its greatness and density. The devil isn't humble, because the devil doesn't see the all-shiny greatness of God, the greatness of the true reality. The lack of humbleness is caused by a pitiful superficiality, or it brings up the superficiality. That's why it brings up also a boring monotony.

[823] The most wonderful thing created by God is the human mind. Wonderful is the world, with its objective rationality and with the connection tying all the things objectively. But incomparably more wonderful it is the mind that is the only one capable of becoming aware of this rationality and of gathering all the things in its cogitation; and the mind is capable even of crossing above the world too, to a Mind resembling to the human mind, but a Mind incomparably higher and more powerful.

At the beginning, the mind that turns to God, through grace, that mind is dominated by a state of discouragement. That's why, the human being whom this mind is within, that human being mourns weeping and cries with pain, by crushing the heart as much as possible, and by cleaning, on a daily basis, the heart's addiction, and humbling himself/herself, as it is due, with the whole sadness. By achieving thus, by the grace of Christ, the due cleanness, through appeasement, and reaching with understanding at the understanding's things and by reaching at God and by being elevated into His glory and by tensely looking at that glory, that mind is engulfed by the second discouragement of the understanding, following to the first one, and this second one is much greater, much more having no escape, and more ceaseless. By this one achieves a such strengthened and obvious humbleness that, if he had been able to, he would have made all the people happy, and he regards to himself as at the worst human being; he sees himself with a feeling of his soul, really, as even worse than what doesn't exist by any means. And this is because what doesn't' exist, it cannot commit sin, and he sees himself as always sinning.

But, by seeing himself like that and by humbling himself, according to this feeling, he still rejoices much and he gladden himself, but not of himself – because, how could he do that, since he reckons himself as ceaselessly sinning – but of the merciful God Who is closer to him than his own breath, or, to speak more clearly, Who gets out of his heart rivers of heavenly light and inexhaustible creeks of Ghost's wonders, which God pours within him and which fill his mind up with light, and God says him simply: "I am with you" (Jer. 1: 8)[824].

That's why, God unveils him, as to a friend, mysteries, in a clear manner, and He fille him up with joy. And this one feels the need for saying the David's words: "Not according to our lawlessness, You have done to us, neither according to our sins [824] When one experiences the greatness and the great mercy of God, it is impossible that the soul doesn't see his humbleness. Or, the humbleness cannot be born in him except out of experiencing the greatness and the great kindness of God. That's' why, the own humbleness and the God's greatness are lived together. And, consequently, the discouragement too, regarding the own smallness, and the happiness for being close to God and for His mercy. The closer is felt God, the greater the humbleness is. In the immeasurable depths of the humbleness, God is felt closer than the human being's own breath. God Himself is felt as breathing through the human being in breezes of light and life.

You have rewarded us" and the followings (Ps. 102[825]: 10); and according to Paul: "By grace we are saved" (Ephes. 4: 13), even though he fulfills the godlike commandments, as it is possible, and he hates all the unjust ways and he strives, as much as he can, not to omit anything that helps to salvation. But the one who knows himself by seeing within himself this feeling and by suffering it, that one still hasn't reach a true vision, and he still doesn't shed ceaseless tears, he hasn't seen yet the unity of the faith, and he hasn't;' achieved the knowledge of the truth (1 Tim. 2: 4)[826]. He doesn't really see the godlike grace, neither the limit of the human things. And, to say it briefly, he hasn't reached yet at the knowledge of the godlike and of the human rationalities from within things[827]. Far from that. This is for God hasn't created the world for some need of His, but He has created it out of the abundance of His kindness, according to the benefit of the ones whom He has created the world for. God knew what is beneficial to the man, and by knowing that He proceeded, with much care and with measure, by creating what gives the man the possibility to inhabit, and to live, namely by looking at the man's needs and to a joy according to the man's measures[828].

[826] The soul's vision (the contemplation) isn't therefore, a simple sight, but it is the living of the godlike presence and work within the won being, as source of joy, of light, and of understanding the high mysteries as causing tears of compassion.

[827] In understanding the things, and in deeds, there aren't only godlike rationalities, but there are also human rationalities. Of course, at their basis there are godlike rationalities. The man works with the material provided by God. But the man puts his rationalities too (the judgments, the knowledge) in understanding the things and in using them. The man answers the God's rationalities with his own rationalities, rationalities which are grown out of God's rationalities, and the man's rationalities are conform to God's rationalities, sometimes more and sometimes less, and some other times not at all. But even in the last case, the man has in front of him the data of God. The one who has reached the soul's true sight, though, he consciously sees the godlike rationalities of the things and he sets in work the righteous rationalities, the natural rationalities of his rationality, as corresponding, symmetrical answers, to the godlike rationalities. That man doesn't twist his rationalities and he doesn't cover up the godlike rationalities.

[828] God has created a world on the man's measure. The man was the criterion adopted by God for the world He has created. But the man is such a being that, by starting from the living in this world that is accommodated to him, he can endlessly grow up into the communion with God, in the godhead according to the grace. God chose a measure: the man's measure. But God has created the man on His measure too, namely capable of endlessly impropriating the content of His godhead. There was possible for God to choose other measures too, all of them infinitely inferior to God's infinity. But, on the other hand, all the being which God could have chosen according to other measures, they should have had the capacity of advancing in the same infinity of His, because of not having anywhere else where to advance.

And God created Adam relatedly to the many[829]. Thus, one can see that we don't lack the land, nor there is something missing to the people inhabiting the earth. The earth has been created on the measure of the low things, and the sky and the sun and the air and the sea, they have been created on the earth's measure. But also, each one of these it has its own measure according to the measure of all the others, from God Who knows all the things in advance, and Who has brought all the things to existence, according to a measured order and power, towards a harmony amongst them.

This is because, if the Creator hadn't started the Creation of the existing things, according to their use, but only in order to show His power, His wisdom, His glory, and His greatness, maybe you would have seen, rather, tens of thousands of worlds instead of only one. Better said, you either wouldn't have seen worlds, as the one you can see now, but some strange worlds, above nature and understanding, having such a diversity of wisdoms and of beauties, whose glory and brightness the soul couldn't have endured easily, but the soul would have left the body because of fear.

God wanted only one thing: that one of making the human being as emperor upon the earthly things and as another god of the things belonging to God. And, according to this, God has brought this world to existence, in order to be easily and in an unmediated manner, used by the human being. This is for some one of the prophets says that: "The One Who has created the earth like nothing and Who strengthened the earth on nothing" (Isa. 40: 23; Job 26: 7); or another: "The One Who stretches the sky as a sheepskin over the higher things" (Ps. 103[830]: 3). Then, if only by looking at the earth, the earth is shaken by earthquakes, what great the richness of God's power must be? That's why, God has brought to existence all the seen things, only by His Word. And the most glorifies and the best [829] God hasn't created the world for only one man, but for many. Namely for the communion amongst many. For how many? Only He knows, yet. At the end, we are going to know it too.

[830] In KJB we have: Psalm 104: 1-3: "BLESS the Lord, O my soul. O Lord my God, thou art very great; thou art clothed with honour and majesty // Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment: who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain: // Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters:"; in ROB we have Psalm 103: 1-4: "Bless, my soul, the Lord! Lord, my God, you have glorified Yourself very. // Into brightness and into great adornment You have dressed Yourself up; You Who puts on the light like a coat; // You Who stretches the sky as a tent; You Who cover with waters the things from above sky; // You Who place the clouds as Your ascension; You Who walk on the winds' wings;". (E. l. t.'s n.)

things, they are preserved for eternity. In order the soul to be able to look at those things, the body is melted down through death, into tomb, as in an oven, and it is created a new man[831] for new good things, and for new delectations and views. The things we can see now, are like a whatever shadow and, as somebody could tell, as a long dream. If somebody wants to get convinced about this, let him look, if he has the necessary power, at the angels' world, one known with the mind, and there he will see beauty, glory, wisdom, and power, and not only untold ones, but also ones not understood by us, even though that world too, despite the whole its diversity and wonders, it has come to existence through a sole thought of God.

If some of these are the thing of a sole thought, what could have been done if it had been set in movement the whole will, wisdom, and power of God, as they are? But, how could we come closer with our mind, in order to understand what is limitless? This is for the limitless had no edge and where there is no edge there is no movement either, but there is an overflow, to say so, and this is partially, of the work and of the power starting out of being[832]. That's why, also what the Scripture and the Creation show form the things of God, if compared to the power of God, it is something dark and a small droplet in [831] In the Greek text it is simply said that "the soul, in order to be able to look at the future things, it is melted into the tomb as in an oven and it becomes a new man". Directly, there is actually the body melted down. But, because of existing there, due to the cohabitation with the body, some feelings which influenced the soul, these feeling too, by being melted down, they imply a death and a sufferance for the soul too, or some sort of "re-melting" or of restoring the soul too. Actually, these feelings do not vanish without a trace, and consequently neither the soul becomes like a soul that never lived within a body. This is because the seals, or the imprinting of the feelings lived by the soul due to the cohabitation with the body, they still remain within soul. But these traces can be transfigured through the sufferance, through the "cross" which the soul too, he gets through, when getting detached from the body. That's why the soul will again receive a body, which the "co-bodily" feeling the soul is imprinted with, they will be imprinted in the new body too, and those feelings will transfigure the newly received body too. The detaching from the body it constitutes an experience to the soul, and experience teaching the soul how not to grant the "co-bodily" feelings a purely bodily importance and content. This partially explains why without death, there isn't resurrection.

[832] This idea is taken from Saint Maximos the Confessor, Answers towards Thalassius, 65: "Where there is a border according to the nature, there is a movement too. But once reached in God (the world), it will have, due to the natural monad of the One Who the world has reached into, a stability always in movement, and an identical stabile movement, eternally done around the Same One" (The Romanian Philokalia, volume III, p. 439). But the author of the present writing adds to this also the idea of the uncreated energies. In the Unlimited One there won't be a movement from and edge to another, but there will be a continuous overflow of energy, which also the soul will be caught into, in the future life.

comparison to the limitless and bottomless ocean. But, may us be found worthy at least of knowing this droplet, in order us to stretch our mind form the beauty, the glory, and the delectation we contemplate in this droplet, top what is limitless, and by extolling, according to our power, the One Who is endlessly endless and above endlessness[833], let us unite, as much as it is possible, with Him, unitarily, in an above-world state, reached simple, endless, and borderless[834] mind, like the angels are, in untold happiness and in the joy and in the gladness of the heart, through the work and grace of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

28. About the Worker (the Doer) and about the Seer (the Contemplative)[835].

The doer cannot achieve the gentleness and the watchfulness due to the doers, if he doesn't sing[836]. But the seer (the contemplative) cannot sing, or he doesn't want to. He cannot sing, because of being him under the work of the grace and he rejoices, silently, most often, of a spiritual delectation, gladdening himself with an undisturbed and peaceful heart[837]. And the seer doesn't want, for he looks at a sole thing and he moves the soul's understanding, in a deep quietude, towards the unchangeable and peaceful meanings[838]. That's why, the seer needs to deepen himself in working the sight of God with a seer [833] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Gnostic Heads, I, 49; The Romanian Philokalia, volume II, p. 140.

[834] We are borderless minds, by nature, because never our mind stops to a thought, but it constantly passes over that thought to other thoughts, making a continuity between them. But the mind doesn't have a clear conscience of its indefinite, or of its limitlessness. This is gained by the mind into God. But in God our mind gains also an infinity, one by grace, of course, for it breathes the God's infinity. The whole this vision is characteristic too, to the writing of Kallistos the Katafygiote.

[835] This is the old discerning done by the Holy Fathers between the one who still s on the level of the cleaning of passions and of achieving the virtues through deeds, and the one who has reached on the level of the seeing, or of the contemplation of God in creatures, or in an unmediated manner.

[836] The singing appeases, or it brings quietude, but it also keeps awake the one who is exhausted because of toils.

[837] When reading, by passing from a meaning to another, the mind has a divided work. In contemplation though, the mind sees everything at once, in a unitary act. This gives the mind a truer experience of what God is, as undivided fulness, liken in the living contemplation of a person the mind notices that person more adequately than reading some things about that person.

[838] "The unchangeable and peaceful meanings" are those having in them an endless depth, so that the seer doesn't need to pass from one to others, a passing that would bring some worry and agitation.

(contemplative) silence. If the seer reads for a while, that's no wonder to the ones knowing the mind's fickleness and the changing and composite kind of our nature. But we must also know that, after the opening of the sight by grace, the reading remains inferior to the seeing's work. The last one is for the self while the first one is for opening the understanding (seer) way. This is for in no reading the mind succeeds to keep itself undivided. But, in the mind's freedom, that is experienced mysteriously in silence, the mind sees most of the time, unitarily, what differs much from what is divided[839].

But, isn't there in the things submitted to the senses too, something that is superior to hearing about those things? This is for the eyes, as one says, and what is confessed by anybody like, are more trustworthy than the ears are. So, as in the things submitted to the senses, likewise in the things known with the mind, to see, or to contemplate something form the things known with the mind, it is much more than hearing about that thing, a fact that happens to the ones who read about it. This is for, as the Samaritan woman, by talking to the real Word, she heralded to the people from her city His godhead, but the Word, due to the richness of His limitless kindness, by going into that city and by finding the city's people worthy of His speaking, those ones were saying that they no longer need that woman's witness in order to know through her description the godhead of the Word (Jn. 4: 42), likewise, the understanding, by confessing the godhead of the Word from within, to the soul and to the soul's power, by the Word's speaking about His things[840], the soul no longer has time and no longer needs the witness from outside, once elevate by grace, to the seeing (contemplating) of Word's godhead. This is for each one who hears, he must see the heard things. But the one who sees, he doesn't need somebody to teach him what he sees, or what is that he sees, if the one who sees is amongst the ones who truly see and have eyes. This can be seen in the case of Thomas, who though he heard, but because he didn't see, he said: "If I don't see, I won't believe it" (Jn. 20: 25), and when he saw, he immediately shouted out: "My [839] The mind reaches being simple and undivided when reaching to contemplate the limitless One. But then the mind is free too, from everything that narrows it and from the whole need for passing from a limited thing to another limited thing.

[840] Through the "speaking of the Word within the soul", one lives the presence and the spiritual pressure of the Word, within him, for one feels the need for answering Him with the deeds asked by Him. This is a true "seeing" of the Word within ourselves.

Lord and My God!". So, the one who didn't believe before seeing, himself confessed the truth by himself; and what he didn't have by hearing, he achieved immediately when he saw, and I mean the faith. So, one can see from here too, that between contemplation (seeing) and doing, there is equally much difference as between mind and feeling[841].

29. About the Same Things.

Both the one who is a child and the one who is a fully grownup person, they need milk. But the first one need milk for nourishing, and the second one needs milk for sweeten himself. So, the doer occupies himself with the reading of the psalms, but this the seer (the contemplative) does it too. But the first one does that in order to strengthen and to reassure his soul, while the seer does it towards gladdening himself and especially for getting some resting of the fiery - and extended and springing out tears - movement towards God. This is for, though the ghost from within him jumps above measure and it craves for rather gladdening himself of the godlike rays and to get transformed and to grow up from glory to glory (2 Cor. 3: 18), the composed nature of the body and the clay nature of the heart, they weaken. Thus, the doer tarries in the godlike words for the knowledge and for the teaching from within them; the knowledge of these one is received by the seer (contemplative) too, but in silence, because the things he learns in an untold manner, and what his contemplative power receives, they cannot be told by word[842]. "The silence's ear will hear, he says, wonderful things". He said "wonderful" but, what king od "wonderful things" he wasn't' able to tell us. That's why, he renounced to tell the untold of the things from above word. For that, the godlike word too, it asks me to bless the ones who believed before seeing (Jn. 20; 29), namely the doers, but I consider the contemplative as superior to the blessed ones. This is for, while the doer, though he hasn't seen, he has the happiness only by faith, what should we reckon about the seer? This is for this one, together with walking through faith, a faith that has been elevated above the [841] In the whole this chapter, the author wanted to show the superiority of the seer of God in comparison to the one who is in the stage of cleaning himself of passions and of the doing, which the virtues are achieved through.

[842] So, the contemplative doesn't always dispense himself of the meanings known from nature and from Scripture. But even then, he sees so deeply in them, that he cannot express in words what he sees and what he understands.

things one should do, he sees the great and wonderful and he suffers ascensions into his heart[843] and he is deified day by day, as it is due.

30. To the Man Composed of a Twofold Admixture, the Founder and the Maker of All Things Has Given Him According to His Measure Also a Twofold Suffering and a Joy which I Still Call It as Unique Life.

To the seen part of the man, God has given the whole seen world; and to the thought part, that is the soul, He has given the things understood in the seen creation. But, as the felt part of the man is united with the thought part of the man, likewise through all the seen creation, one can see the thought beauty, as together existing within all the aspect of each thing. And there is nothing meaningless, no matter how small. And this is a very appropriate orderliness. This is for amongst the things created by the godlike Word of the All-Upholder, for the man, nothing should appear as without rationality, as it would have been if the seen part of the creation had been united with the thought part of the creation[844].

In this case, the body by rejoicing of together-working with the seen things, the (Christian) soul would have remained empty; and the body would have been more than the soul. And this would have been a meaningless thing[845]. Otherwise, where else the soul would have from, in the first place, a life of his own? From God? But this too, it would have been outside the order of the One Who has built all the things with the Word[846]. This is because in such a case, the soul would have been inferior [843] The ascensions or the stages are suffered within the heart of the contemplative, because of no longer being done out of the man's toil, but they are done by the work of the Holy Ghost. But neither the contemplative leaves the faith, because above each stage reached by him, he believes that there are other unreached yet stages, untried ones. But this faith has surpassed that one shown in the ascesis of the deeds.

[844] It is being affirmed here the rationality of the entire creation. Nothing is in the creation without a rationality, or without a meaning. If that had been the case, the creation wouldn't have been given towards the spiritual growth of the man, one that cannot take place without rationality, or without understanding. Such a creation would have been meaningless. I have translated the sensitive and the intelligible as "felt part and thought part". In reality, there aren't two parts. But, as the Greek text says more adequately, there is a sole reality both sensitive and intelligible, or a sensitized rationality, a rationality that isn't exhausted in sensitiveness.

[845] The world is rational, in order the soul to be enriched out of all the world's things, and in order the soul to ascend, through all the world's things, towards God.

[846] If the soul had achieved his content, directly from God, why would have been the soul tied to the body, and by this to the world?

to the being which are separated from the composed things. This is because, as those ones move themselves from within themselves towards God, we too would have been directly moved. But, then, why shouldn't have been us too, moved from the intelligible (thought) things, in order to achieve the joy of the seeing (contemplation)? This would have given us, on one hand, a level equal with the angels' one, but, on the other hand, it would have been against nature that some embodied minds to tend towards the Kind One, equally so to the immaterial minds. This is for those ones (the angels) do not have as outside themselves, their life and their tendency towards the First Good, but they enjoy, starting from them, unitarily, of the godlike rays. But we, though, by being bellow them, according to our nature, and on the second level after angels, we are elevated, according to our order, towards God and towards His beauty, from the lower levels and, to say so, from the levels which are after the angels' ones, by not taking as beginning towards that, beings separated from matter or, simply, intelligible (thought). This is for it is characteristic to the angels to start their stretching towards God from themselves. But we are moved firstly through rationality, form the composed to the simple creatures (angels) and then we cross, through rationality, to the uncreated ones, according to the nature, as I said. And thus, we are elevated unitarily towards ourselves and towards God[847].

[847] This is a good argumentation of the fact that the body is important to the soul. The body has a rationality tied to the rationality of the seen world. If our rational soul hadn't been within the rationally constituted body, tied to the rationally organized world, the soul wouldn't have been able to ascend, through thinking, towards God. This is because the soul is not made capable of directly ascending towards God, as the angels are. But the fact that the soul ascends towards God through the rationality of the body which the world's rationality is tied to, it doesn't deem the body as inferior to the angels, for the soul is elevated on this way, as the angels do too, towards God. If the soul hadn't been into body, it wouldn't have been able to ascend towards God, and therefore the soul would have been inferior to the angels. This is for the soul would have been asked to ascend towards God as the angels do, but it would have lacked a way of ascending. Therefore, this invalidates the opinion of some Orthodox theologians that the human soul can place himself, through the mind, in direct contact with God, unlike the teaching of the scholastic theology (M. Lot-Borodine, Anthropologie théocentrique in "Irénikon", Janv.-Fevr., 1939). The differing form the scholastic theology it consists of something else: according to the Patristic conception, the soul ascends towards God, to experiencing God, and the soul doesn't remain constantly separated from God, through the creation's wall. In the Holy Fathers conception, the soul enters the communion with God, but the soul does that as enriched with the whole content of the virtues and of the judgments gained by the soul within world, though those must be brought to a unity of a great complexity. For the growing up has a moral character too, the body's rationality, as tied to the world's

That's why, in order to rejoice with our mind and in order to live according to ourselves, and in order to ascend towards God, we must firstly contemplate in all the things submitted to the senses, the meanings spread within them, as existing together with the seen things.

But the doer cannot do this, or he doesn't want to. He cannot do it because he doesn't have an adviser or a writing to show him that. Or he doesn't want to, because of even having those, he doesn't trust his neighbor due to his pride and cunningness, and he remains deprived of tasting those meanings, because of reckoning the things said by the Scripture as enough to him, in order him to be guided by them, and he uses the creation in a limited manner, only in order to serve his body, and he reckons that this is enough for the good faithfulness, and he doesn't look for anything else[848]. And the contemplative, by picking up form the seen creation the unseen aspects, and by being in together-speaking with the Scripture's ghost, he steps with a happy step towards the detached beings (from the matter) and by looking at the brightness of their greatness, he crosses, by grace, and joyfully, beyond those beings, and he moves himself to the uncreated meanings of God. And, by delighting himself with the endlessness and with the seeing of those ones, as much as it is possible, he advances in an untold, unitary, and above-world way, towards the ray of the godlike beauty. And, rejoicing as it is due, in awe and in an above-world way, of the untold beauty and of the all-luminous brightness, in a unitary and unified state, he no longer knows who he is, because of his joy and of his bewilderment, and he received the overflow of the endless godlike joy and he describes, out of a plentiful feeling, through words and letters, to the doer too, the road leading towards truth.

31. About the Impartation with the Holy Ghost.

rationality, it must be understood as a means of moral education too. When such an education doesn't take place, it means that the rationality isn't correctly noticed and applied.

[848] There a dry, withered people, who do not reckon the world as being anything else but a means for satisfying their body's earthly needs. They don't realize that the soul is connected to the world through the mediation of the body's needs, on an even higher purpose: for the enriching and for the spiritual growing up and therefore in order the soul to be elevated towards God. How could have been, otherwise, elevated the soul towards God? If that had been the case, the soul would have been within body only for the body's benefit. And that would have led to the soul's denial.

But, do you know what is that that overflowed within the believers' hearts and what is the sign of the overflow? It is the Holy Ghost, overflowing from the Father through the Son and He filles up the entire world; Who overflows within each believer; Who is shared without suffering and Who is imparted without one being able to take Him into mastery[849].

And sign of this impartation, or of the overflow within us, it is that we desire Him into the poverty's humbleness, and the painless and always flowing tear, and the whole and non-liar love for God and for our neighbor, and the joy from heart and the gladness for God, the long-suffering in what we owe to suffer, and the gentleness towards everybody and, simply speaking, the kindness, and the mind's union[850], the sight and the light, the hot and always moving power of the prayer and, to say everything, the lack of worry for the perishable things, by keeping in mind the eternal things. "How wonderful are Your things, God!" (Ps. 103: 25[851]). "Truly extolled things have been told about You, city of God" (Ps. 86: 2[852]), namely faithful heart!

32. The great council (plan (E. l. t.'s n.)) of our God and the kindness of the love for people, one above-nature and not-understood, of the Father, council which you have heard speaking about, and which Christ came to bring it on, by making Himself that council's Angel (Isa. 9: 6), for his overwhelming kindness and love, one above the holiness's meaning, for our mankind, it is the council which the rationalities of the seen things are gathered together through, in a sole concentrated Rationality (in a sole Word), which God has promised to give it (Him) to us[853]; this council won't ever cease to [849] "He is overflowed without suffering (απαθος)", for there isn't produced within Him any cutting and for He isn't forced by anything from outside Him, to this sharing. "And He is imparted without being one able to subjugate (ασχέτως) Him", for He isn't forced to enter or to be in some relation with something else, as the creatures are amongst themselves. The air, and the water, they are shared to the people for they are forced, by the laws which are intrinsic to them, to be everywhere, namely within man too. "The Ghost blows, though, wherever He wants" (Jn. 3: 5). This shows the Ghost's traits as Person.

[850] It is very often highlighted in this writing, the unit the mind must reach at, in order to see God, or that the mind reaches at when seeing God. When the mind's attention is stolen by may things, it means that it isn't uphold by God.

[851] In KJB we have: Psalm 104: 24. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[852] In KJB we have: Psalm 87: 3. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[853] Jesus have made Himself as the Angel or the Heralder of the great council (plan (E. l. t.'s n.)) of God for us. This is for, He as the Rationality of all the created things, or as the speaking amaze you, and to fill you up with joy and with experiencing the peace.

33. If you know the target of the godlike greatness, for us, and the things done by it between us and God, you will understand what God wants regarding us, and where and how far our things are from the due ones. And this will be cause for your sadness, a loving of God sadness, a sadness full of true humble cogitation.

34. About Seeing (Contemplation).

The one who cogitates at all the God's things, knowing those things through views of the understanding, he will find, without any doubt, as springing up within his soul, three virtues, which all the holy writings and books urge us to achieve: the faith, the hope, and the love (1 Cor. 13: 13), which are the end, or better said, the foundation of all doer and seer virtues[854]. This truly is that holy trinity from within us, which we are united with the Holy Trinity (the Threefold God) through, by getting us close to the Holy Trinity, like some angels.

35. About Another Seeing (Contemplation).

The healthy mind usually sees three trinitarian orders of mysteries, around God: personal, natural, and that one following to the natural one. The first trinity gives to the mind, as a gift, the possibility the mind to discover it, especially out of the Holy Scriptures. The natura trinity is contemplated also out of the understanding of the creatures. And the trinity following after the natural trinity, it is known also out of the rational truth. The mind, by entering the first trinitarian order, or, more properly

Word of all words which He tells us through the rationalities of the created things, He must bring too, the mode and the power which the rationalities or the words of the created things to be gathered within Him through, for He is their Rationality and Word. This is for, in accomplishing this unification it consisted "the eternal council of God" regarding the Creation (Ephes. 1: 9-10). This reunification produces its effect in each one of the ones who welcome Christ, for the everybody's unity represented by Him, and His power of reunification, they are placed within us as a power for uniting ourselves with Him and with all the things. Each of us becomes the bearer of this unitary Rationality of all things.

[854] In love one meets all the virtues: doer and contemplative. This is for that one who loves he penetrates within another and he loves that one. But, that one who still have a shortcoming in the moral state of his soul, that one can't truly love somebody. In order to love, you must believe, and endure, and restrain yourself, and humble yourself, and combat your own egotism through on all ways, and to hope in gaining the another's love.

speaking, the mind by aiming to the first trinitarian order, the mind encounters the unapproachable One, but not in a simple mode. By aiming towards the second trinitarian order, the amazed mind finds a joy united with the wisdom. And by entering the third trinitarian order, the mind truly penetrates within the darkness where God is, and the mind becomes totally simple, endless, and borderless, in an imageless and shapeless state[855]. And when the mind looks at all these three trinities, the mind sees them as like a tenth order, which, as the truth's heralders say, it is inhabited by the whole fulness of the godhead (Col. 2: 9)[856]. Then the mind will truly look at the peace, a peace that surpasses all the minds in the supreme consummation of the seer grace[857].

36. About Another Seeing (Contemplation).

And again, by dividing further, the mind sees (contemplate) mysteriously, in the Christ's – the springing out of peace gift -, three states of feeling the Ghost's grace: one above world, one around the world, and one in the itself[858]. When the [855] One can know the Trinity not only by reading about the Three Persons in the Holy Scripture, but also by contemplating the Trinity's one nature, in creation and in the Trinity's energies, coming within us. This is for both in the Trinity's nature and in the Trinity's energies, are present all the Three Persons. But the one who lives within him the uncreated energies of God, he is above the knowledge about God that can be achieved by reading the Holy Scripture or by rational deduction out of nature. That one is elevated to the untold (apophatic) experiencing of God, an experiencing that can be called as darkness. In this case, the mind, by knowing God not out of many and limited meanings from the Scripture and from nature, but in a superior to them way, and the mind too, it no longer has a state imprinted by images, but it has been elevated to the imageless state, to the borderless state, a state corresponding to the One Who is borderless and endless, and the mind experiences Him. This theme is insistently presented in the Kallistos Katafygiote's writing that follows after this one.

[856] In the embodied Christ are present all these three trinitarian orders, as in some kind of a tenth order, which the whole fulness of the godhead – that came to us bodily - inhabits in. This is for in Christ there is the whole Trinity of Persons, there is Their nature and there are Their godlike uncreated energies.

[857] In Christ Whom it has descended to us in, and Whom it has united in, the fulness of the godhead, with our nature, it is forever made and incorporated the peace between God and creature, the peace amongst all the things, a peace that exceeds all the minds. That's why we have in Him the consummate grace.

[858] The mind feels the peace's grace as springing out of Christ, as a, above-world grace, a grace reconciling God with the world, as a grace surrounding the world, as a grace placing itself amongst all the things and connecting them to one another, and making peace amongst them, and as a grace making peace within the man himself. There is a last trinitarian unity shown in the connection amongst these three kinds of peace.

mind is in this trinitarian unity, or in this decade[859], or in the consummation of the seeing, the mind sees how the three centers of the godlike love, they commit, through the good grace from within soul, and through the mysteries filled up with it, and the mind is filled up with light concerning those mysteries, and the mind rejoices and it is filled up with brightness. Consequently, the mind returns, at its turn, into the Ghost, consummately, the soul's power of love, towards God, and it moves this one, as much as it can, towards the godlike love, as it starts from now to love God, as it is due. And it ascends, and it advances into love, and it attaches itself to the love, and it strives, as much as it can, to fulfill the commandments. And it strives, with the help of the grace, to find out the way which it could be widen and consummated in, the love of God within the mind. Then, God and the mind become, in a wonderful manner, one Ghost. This is for God is, when He is welcomed, spiritually within the mind, and the mind is, by entering, within God[860]. And the mind limpidly sees what Paul said: "And the one who attaches himself to the Lord, that one becomes one Ghost with Him" (1 Cor. 6: 17). Then God becomes illumination to the mind, and luminous light, and love; and the mind gladdens into God, rejoicing of the unique illumination of a threefold luminous light, being filled up with peace and resting, with awe, in Christ, as it is due.

37. About Another Seeing (Contemplation).

Either are told by somebody who wants to tell them, or they are thought at, either they are seen by the contemplative mind, five are the rationalities (the meanings) regarding the embodied Jesus: that one of the glory, that one of the love, that one of the grace, that one of the peace, and that one of the resting.

The rationality (the meaning) of the glory is known through bringing to existence the seen ones and the thought ones; this is for "through Him have been made and without Him nothing has been made of what has been made" (Jn. 1: 3), be it

[859] We think this is logically continuing the ascending chain of: monad, triad (trinity) - decade; and it doesn't name here a period of ten years, or of three days etc. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[860] The union between God and the soul, it is done through an act of welcoming God, in order Him to dwell within mind through the Ghost, or spiritually, through an act of mind's entering within God; God descends, and the soul ascends; God deigns, and the soul prays, and receives, and strives himself.

ages and the ones from within ages[861], namely all the adornments from above heavens, and all the more above the temporary things. And greater than this, it is the glory had by the One Who is of one nature and Who sits on the same throne with God-the Father and with the Ghost, by being "the image of the unseen God" (Col. 1: 15) and "the brightness of His glory" (Hebr. 1: 3), having by nature "all the things had by the Father" (Jn. 16: 15); for this, He is "into the Father and the Father is into Him" (Jn. 14: 10).

The rationality (meaning) of the love one can see it in that that "the Word have made Himself body and He dwelled into us" (Jn. 1: 14). And the rationality of the grace, one can see it out of the overflow and out of the gift of the-life-maker Ghost within us; this is for "out of His fullness all of us have taken, and grace upon grace" (Jn. 1: 16). Of the peace, for He has become heralder of the peace "of the close ones and of the far ones" (Ephes. 2: 17), "making peace" (Ephes. 2: 15), and "reconciling the ones form heavens with the ones from on earth" (Col. 1: 20); that's why, the Father too, He has elevated us and He has placed us, together with Him, into the heavenly ones" (Ephes. 2: 6) into Christ.

Finally, of the resting, for through Him we have doubtlessly become inheritors of God, and there is no greater worthiness that that, neither there is one equally overwhelmingly above the infinity[862]. Thus, by being advised by the five mentioned rationalities, the mind sees (contemplates) into Ghost and into Truth, in the One Trinity, three united rationalities as wonderful end of the unique purpose[863]. So, the mind advances towards shown apparitions[864] of God and towards godlike [861] "The ones from eternity (από την αιωνιότητα), it means the atemporal state of the angels, but it isn't that eternity without beginning, of God.

[862] Saint Gregory of Nazianzus and Saint Maximos the Confessor, they reckon God as a Person above His features, features which are, as well, infinite. Reached in that infinity, we will rest, for not having where to advance any longer, or what to aspire to. But only by achieving the peace with God in the life from here, namely the quietude due to the absence of the sins, we will reach to the resting into the infinity of the life and of the love of God, into the future life.

[863] The target or the end of all the ones who live in ascesis, into God, it is the resting into the love of the Holy Trinity. This is for the Holy Trinity is the cradle of the supreme love. Into the Holy Trinity all the things reach to that unconfounded unity of theirs, as one in unconfounding (unmerging (E. l. t.'s n.) are also the Persons of the Holy Trinity. This is characteristic to love" to unite all the ones who love one another, consummately, but without confounding (merging (E. l. t/'s n.) them.

understandings in the living appropriate only to God, as much as it is possible, through love, through restraint, through taking vigil, through reading, and through prayer, through a humble and obedient thought, and with untold righteousness, and not weakening, by any means, the taking heed and the fear united with it. And thus, the mind is imparted, in an untold mode, with many and very bright gifts of the Ghost, into holy love, into the heart's joy, in that above-nature peace, and in the good things truly accompanying those ones, and which serve as holy dwelling place and as new inheritor of God and, in the same time as God, by God's will and by His grace.

38. Interpretation of the words: "God said to Abraham: by multiplying I will multiply your seed", and the followings (Gen. 22: 17).

That's why, when I look, with the peaceful eye of the soul, at God-the Man, namely at the Lord, through the-life-maker power of the Ghost, and when I obviously remember the five rationalities regarding Him, which I have spoken about, I see as wonderfully accomplished the promise made yore to Abraham, by the embodied Word Who said: "By multiplying, I will multiply your seed as the stars of the sky and as the sand of the sea shore" (Gen. 22: 17).This is for, by remembering the word: "Into your seed will be blessed all the nations", Saint Paul adds that through seed one must understood Jesus (Gal. 3: 18). And, actually, it is as appropriate as one can get, we to understand through the multiplied seed of Abraham, our Lord Jesus. This is for Christ Himself is the only supra-abundant due to the union between the godhead and the work; and He is limitless for His seize and impenetrable for His multitude, and He is multiplied in truth, in His quality as God of the graces, like the stars of the sky and like the sand on the sea shore; He is also from the nation of Abraham, as descending from that one. And God didn't say the same things about Ismael, for this one wasn't' the son of a free woman (Gen. 16: 1 and the followings). But: "in Isaac, He says, a son will be called to you" (Hebr. 11: 18). But this wasn't said either about Israel. This is because Israel didn't reach such a great multitude, nor all the people on earth, as Lord Christ Who has been taken (according to His humanity) by God-the Word form the seed of Abraham and He has become a sole Person as Man and God[865]. Neither the peace has a border in Him (Isa. 9: 7); and His judgments are a bottomless deep (Ps. 35[866]: 6); and untraveled are His ways (Rom. 11: 33); and the power and the wisdom and all the godlike one around Him are limitless or limitlessly limitless[867]. Into Him unseen nations have achieved, in a wonderful way, the blessing, and such a great multitude have found, in a bright mode, the end of the consummation standing before them[868].

But it wasn't appropriate to God, neither it was necessary Him to promise to the Patriarch that He will give him as gift, the grace of multiplying the people out of sees (bodily). This is because rejoicing of such things is pagan and rude. And toa man cogitating at the good things, as Abraham was – and such a loving of people as that Patriarch was – it has been characteristic to him to love God with the whole his soul and to rejoice of the much desired knowing and seeing Him, and by this to receive the abundance of meanings and views and illuminations and to multiply himself according to them, in a worthy of God manner. Like so it becomes Moses a worthy to be noticed prayer, in order to see God showing Himself to him into knowledge (Exod. 33: 13 and the followings). And the more he saw, as he was reckoned as worthy to see, the more se multiplied (he become more); and it was coming to him such a multitude of knowledge, so that he was unable to tell it out. And Solomon was given by God with such an overflow and multitude of wisdom and of knowing the creatures, like the sand from the sea shores (3 Kings 2: 35), so that he was more multiplied than all the people from then.

[865] Christ's humanity has in itself a plenitude like neither all the people on earth would have. In Christ is has been multiplied the most, the human seed of Abraham. And out of Christ's humanity it will be able to multiply endlessly and forever the humanity of all the people.

[866] In KJB we have: Psalm 36: 6. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[867] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Gnostic Heads I, 49; The Romanian Philokalia, volume II, p. 140. The person is of infinite times infinitely above the infinity of its traits. All the pantheistical infinites are nothing in comparison to the person's mystery, even be it about the human person. This is for the person can comprise them with the mind, whilst the person, even the human person cannot be comprised with the mind. Even the less can be comprised the Person of God. But by belonging to God's Person, His features and powers have too, an infinity above infinity. The Christ's humanity, by being worn by the Word's Person, it participates too, in His Person, to the limitlessness of His Person.

[868] The peoples find their consummation and the power for their endeavors for their committing, into the Christ's humanity. This power if exercised out of it also as an attraction upon us and as a strengthening of ours.

If somebody cogitates, he will very easily know how God multiplied the man, or the seed of the man who has been gifted with grace by God. This is for God rejoices too little of the simple multiplication of the people. God rejoices of the wisdom and of the soul's spiritual power of knowledge, and of the other many in number godlike virtues. All of these has been had, abundantly, by Lord Jesus, the seed of Abraham, Whom the whole fullness of the godhead dwelled into, bodily (Col. 2: 9), and He surpasses the content of any multitude, on an endless measure, and out of Whom is everything that exist and all the multitudes. In this fullness are also "the treasuries of the knowledge and of the wisdom hidden into Christ" (Col. 2: 3). This multitude truly is a gift worthy of God and a totally special gift, promised by God, appropriately, to His special friend.

See, therefore, in Jesus Christ, the true and endless multitude from the five rationalities, which I spoke about, before. Firstly, out of the glory from around Him one can intuit the godlike glories of the godlike nature, characteristic to Him, for He is true God; they are reckoned by the Holy Fathers as being limitless, because of their size, and they are reckoned as impenetrable because of their multitude. Then, the aspects of His relation as Son with the Father and the aspects showing His true of-one-beingness with the Father; the ones of the union with the Ghost and the overflow of the gifts which millions of people are imparted with, and maybe the whole world, without those gifts to diminish. Then the ones of the oikonomia into body and all the ones which were until then, and after that, untold and above number, which all of them, to say it briefly, they start out of His glory. Then the ones of the love and of the grace, of our peace and resting. If somebody will see all of these, as much as it is desirable, he will find out that Jesus Christ, the seed of Abraham, He is hiddenly multiplied more than the multitude of the sky's stars and more than the sea shores' sand. And he will praise, as it is due, by extolling this so great promise, above all things, wonderful and mysterious, of God, worthy only of God alone, for He is the source of all gifts, a promise given to His friend, chosen from amongst all people, and fulfilled towards the common overwhelming happiness of the mankind and especially of the believers. Glory to the One Who deigned this multiplication to be done. Amen.

39. Interpretation to: "Praise the Lord, my soul" (Ps. 145[869]: 1).

"Praise the Lord, my soul", the Lord from the heaven of heavens, who has the light as His being. Praise the Lord into the heigh ones, into all His angels and into all their powers. Praised it is very, His power, and His wisdom, and blessed it is the holy name of His. Praise the Lord for the ones from above waters and for the light from above them; for the sky's strength, for the sky's order and for its wonderful stretch; for the air that enwraps everything; for the sun, for the moon, and for the stars; for their glory, and beauty, and diversity, for their setting up and for their movement, for their being made of fire and without material matter, this being the most fearsome thing; for the day's light, for its ceaseless changing, which it leads through, all the things from within world. Praise the Lord, my soul, for the contradictorily intertwining of the great four irreconciled natural elements of the universe, out of which is springs the wonderful peace and the good steadfastness, namely of the water, and of the fire, and of the air, and of the earth. Praise the lord for such a quick flight and for the diversity of the birds, for taking care of them, for their life and behavior; for the sea and for mastering its power, reined by the thin sand placed on the shores. Praise the Lord, for all the creatures crawling into the sea, endless in number, in thousands of species, sizes, features, behaviors, and instincts, or habits, and of their powers and works. Again, praise the Lord in peace and in awe, for the fastness which the sea brings with, all the means necessary to man's life. Praise the lord, joyfully, also for the beasts moving and crawling on land, many and countless according to their kinds; but also, for the trees growing up on the land, fruitful or fruitless, unimaginably diverse, even when they belong to the same variety; for the plants, for the cereals, for vegetables, for the ones of a good fragrance, for the ones who help heating up, or cooling down, to moisture, to draught, differing according to the very diverse rationalities, in a way that overwhelms the whole rationality, for the waters shedding in a very diverse ways, for the rains, for the snowfalls, for the hails, and for the thunders and lightnings.

For these ones, therefore, and for the ones like these, praise and bless the Lord, my soul, for His unfathomable power, for His untold wisdom, and for His impossible to tell glory. This is for the seen things have been made for you, by such a Maker, out of the untold love He has for you, in order you to survive amongst these things, in a due and rational manner, and you to mirror, the glory and the wisdom and the power of your so much-loved Maker Who has given even His only begotten Son for us (Jn. 3: 16), and Who has made Himself man, on a new way, a wonderful and above-mind way.

40. About another seeing (contemplation).

What was thinking at (for we have to say it like this too), the power from above-the-power, of Your mastery, you Master from above being? And what have your decided (if we have to say this too), You all-wise Emperor? And what have You wanted, through unfathomable benevolence, You the all-good God? And what have You done, out of Your infinite love, You All-Upholder Lord, in the care of Your untold kindness for us, You the All-Extolled One? Glory to Your infinite kindness, which You have shown through Your taking care of us, with unfathomable and borderless wisdom and power, You the One unfathomable in all aspect! I am going to tell too, together with the pious David: "How great have become Your things, Lord; Your thoughts have become deep very" (Ps. 91[870]: 5). For I look in an understanding manner, into Ghost and truth and behold "full of glory is the house of the Lord" (Isa. 6: 1). And by looking, as it is due, I see myself as the house of the glory of the Lord, full of glory and of grace, in untold resting and in untold and eternal peace. And, rightly so, You totally amaze me and I am pricked and wounded by the pins of the godlike love and I am burning for the love's heat, in spiritual joyfulness, and in above-world happiness and gladness.

I see myself as filled up with the holy light from the heart, through the gift of God, as an unquenched candlestick of the Ghost, if I may say so[871]. An so I am introduced into the rationalities of the creatures and I see the rationalities of all things united into a sole mysterious Rationality, and I see all the saying of the Scripture coming to an end into this Rationality[872]. And many mysteries are unveiled to me as gathered in that unique Rationality and shown through that Rationality top the ones who see into Ghost. That Rationality is the great plan of God[873] (Isa. 6: 1), which, by looking at it, David sang about: "The plan of the Lord remains forever, the thoughts of His heart from generation to generation" (Ps. 32[874]: 11). This is for nobody will impede the Lord's plan (Isa. 14: 26-27). Not out of this teaching is Him known and has Him given this plan further, but out of the spiritual grace springing up form hypostasis[875], grace that lightens the mind into truth and that makes the mind able to see the things from above the world.

[870] In KJB we have: Ps. 92: 5: "O Lord, how great are thy works! and thy thoughts are very deep."; In ROB we have: "How great have become Your things, Lord, totally deep are Your thoughts!". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[871] The "seeing" mentioned by the authors in these chapters is "understanding", but it isn't simply a theoretical "understanding", but it is the understanding experience of a real state, of a penetration of the entire human being, by the godlike and loving presence. The light that firstly appears within heart, due to the ceaseless prayer, it spreads within the whole seer's being, full of the warmth of the love for God. The entire seer's being becomes a candlestick of the Ghost.

"Who knows the power of Your anger, Lord, and Your wrath could be counted out of Your fear?", said the godlike Scripture (Ps. 89[876]: 11). But the spiritual wisdom speaks within me: "Who knows the power of Your love; and could one count the love out of Your things?". "Wonderful are the things of Your love, Lord; my soul knows very. Wonderful has become the [872] The author shows how one passes from contemplating the rationalities from within things and the Scripture's meanings, to that one and full of mystery Rationality. This passing is being done practically, and not theoretically, through the love that comes as luminous light of the Ghost, through the heart. All the things' and of Scripture's rationalities, they are seen as a sole thought, of great complexity, as a sole loving word of the Word comprising many words, as rays of the same love speaking and communicating loving thoughts. All the things are filled up with the light of that all-comprising and loving thought of the Word-Person, that filles up the seer too. Between the thoughts manifested by the Word through nature and through Scripture, there is no separation. All of them are gathered together in the same unique thought and in the same unique love of the Word-Person. The unique Rationality, though called as rationality, it is mysterious, for it is personal, and for it reveals a supreme Subject, a Subject springing up other and other rationalities, endlessly, and not only rationalities, but also signs and acts of the love.

[873] The unique Rationality is "plan" of God, for it is thought and expression of the supreme Person; it isn't a standing by itself impersonal rationality, because that it an impossible to think thing.

[874] In KJB we have: Psalm 33: 11. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[875] "εχ Χαπιτος ανυποστατου". This expression is often met also in the previous writing, that one belonging to Kallistos and Ignatius. This expression shows that the grace has its source in the godlike hypostasis or hypostases, and it isn't an impersonal and self-standing power, nor is a man's subjective state. The grace is the grace of the godlike Person.

[876] In KJB we have: Psalm 90: 11: "Who knoweth the power of thine anger? even according to thy fear, so is thy wrath."; in ROB we have: "Who knows the power of wrath and who measures Your anger, according to the fear of You?" (E. l. t.'s n.)

knowledge" (Ps. 138[877]: 6) of Your love. Who could look at it, in its entirety? It doesn't overwhelm only through its dimension – for it is stretched for infinite time infinitely[878], but it is also untold through its diversity[879]. This is for it starts from here and from there, with a borderless wisdom and with an equal power, o, You All-Kind Lord, for You are a unit according to Your nature, power, and work, but You are Trinity through Hypostases and through persona features.

Blessed are You Who blessed us into all the spiritual blessings (Ephes. 1: 3), into the Person of our Jesus Christ[880], into Who You have elevated us and You have placed us together with Him tin to heavenly ones (Ephes. 2: 6), above all Principalities, Masteries, Powers, Dominions, and above any name that is called in this eon or it will be called in the future eon (Ephes. 2: 21), making us together inheritors with Him, and entirely inheritors of Yours, Trinity of a sole God, by giving us in a wonderful way, ell the things under our mastery, the ones from heavens and the ones from on earth; into Christ Jesus Who we have been corrected through, out of the one-being Word, with His grace, we the earthlings. O, overwhelming and wonderful love! We are made partakers to Your gift, God in Trinity and Word of God. Truly extolled are You, Lord Who has made us partakers to Your above-understanding nature. Truly You are untold, and non-comprisable are the things You do and overflowingly untold is You love for us.

41. Blessed is the man whose understanding feeling[881] has flourished out of the quietude crossed through by rationality and who, to say so, has come back to himself and he lives out of

[877] In KJB we have: Psalm 139: 6: "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it."; in ROB we have: "Wonderful is Your science, and above me; it is high and I cannot reach it."

[878] The godlike love is overwhelming, right because it is impossible to describe its quality, or because it is infinitely infinite, namely for its sweetness, for its warmth, and for its strengthening power.

[879] The love of God gushes out from everywhere, from all things and circumstances, being shown in all ways.

[880] "Εν τω προσώπω ημον Χριστου Ιησου". One could understand from here also "in Jesus Christ's, our face". By blessing the human face of Christ, God has blessed, in Christ's face, all the human faces. This was said by Cyril of Alexandria. Christ, by making withing Himself, the Father's human face to be loved, the Father loves in Christ's face, again, all the human faces.

[881] This is understanding and feeling, for it touches a full of meanings reality, which it doesn't fully understand, and not from distance, but by contact, through experience.

the instilling and of the influence of the Ghost[882]. That is the fruit of the healthy cogitation through grace, a cogitation that straightens the soul's feelings, and it elevated the mind, and it easily changes the heart, when ascending, by flying, at the godlike ones[883]. But the returning of the understanding feeling to itself, without the quietude achieved theoretically and without the cleanness of the heart through grace, it is more impossible than a man to float through the sky. Having with it, in your heart, God, and seeing God through it, it is easy and useful. But its absence is like forgetting about God, or, without it, thinking at God is rather a nescience and a non-seeing of God, that being a seeing and a knowing of Him[884]. The one who has found out this godlike feeling, out of grace, he has found - one could say – God. He no longer needs words, while staying next to God, and he better chooses to liturgize to God. He embraces the silence, or better said, he keeps his silence even without wanting to. The Ghost of God dwells within him. Out of him it springs a love, a peace, and a spiritual joy. He lives a changed life, in comparison to the average and common life[885]. He gladdens himself of God

[882] The "understanding feeling" has come back to itself, trying to understand itself and, in the same time, trying to experience itself. Namely, the subject who understands, and who – by understanding – he experiences the realities, he turns back towards himself, trying to understand on himself and to experience on himself. But because he no longer is an object like the things from outside, but he is a subject springing out countless understandings and experiences, he perceives, on himself, as indefinite. By this he existed the narrowing which he has been imprinted with, by the object's images and meanings. But he cannot persist in experiencing his indefinite character except by being kept in this experience by a power that is superior to his power, by the breeze of the Ghost Who is a Subject too, but the Ghost is infinitely more accentuated Subject than the man is. In the indefinite depths of the self, the human subject perceives the Ghost's breeze coming from above, a breeze that strengthens the human subject too, and that makes him an even more obvious subject.

[883] Immediately that the cogitation has ascended, through the created things, at God, immediately that is has flown on the other plan, the plan of the supreme personal mystery, it has appeared the feeling or the understanding experience of God. But the experience of the godlike mystery take place in the same time with the sinking, through this understanding experience, in the own indefinite – but still of personal character – self. This one is found out as full with the godlike personal infinite.

[884] Without the understanding feeling or experiencing of God, the thinking at God it is rather a non-knowing Him, for it is a speculation done from distance, a speculation not knowing His power by experience, but it remains a simple notion empty in content, or a created content, built up by us, and infinitely stranger from the reality of God.

[885] It seems to me that I've just heard Heidegger, who asks the man, in his writing called "Mann", to get out of the dull, general, and impersonal living. But the love which the mentioned writing speaks of, it shows that the getting out of common, it doesn't mean getting out of communion, which Heidegger didn't even know about. This is for the communion relations with others are profoundly personalist.

and his understanding eyes see the understanding light. His heart bears a fire within. Together within Him are the simplicity and the unchangeability, the limitless and the infinity, the non-beginning and the godlike eternity, accompanied with awe[886]. Ceaseless tears spring out of his eyes; and nonetheless, out of his heart flows spring or living and godlike water[887]. He is unitarily and entirely united with what this understanding feeling experiences and he is surrounded by the light of the unique candlestick, and is delight himself with an above/world delectation, and he is full of enthusiasm and of joy, wondering and getting out of himself, while fearfully looking at God. The one who has tasted, he will understand and he will praise - with the most righteousness – the above-being God, most high, imageless, without quality, without quantity, simple, shapeless, endless, borderless, non-comprisable, untouchable, unsee, untold, uninterpreted, without beginning, eternal, uncreated, unbroken, ununderstood, impenetrable, above-power, above-kindness, and above-beauty. To Him it is due the glory and the praise, forever and ever.

42. About the Godlike Illumination.

You, Lord, for You are the wisdom of the poor in the righteous-understanding, You said: "Come, eat My bread and drink the wine which I have prepared for you" (Prov. 9: 4-5). Therefore, by trusting Your untold love for people, I am coming, Lord, for I am truly poor in understanding, and for I am wrong in my deeds, and I pray You: Give me Your gift, You the All-Merciful, as for food, and Your Ghost as drink. For this is, doubtlessly, Ghost and light. That's why I say Yours, for the ones who bear the Ghost, they bear the light[888]. Thus, when the [886] This one lives not only the simple eternity or the lack of end lived by angels, but he lives also the eternity and the lack of beginning of the godhead. This is for he no longer knows when he has been existing from. He is beyond time. By being into the infinity of God, he no longer has to change himself, by passing from something else to something else. Though, in this there isn't a monotony, but there is a continuous awe. This is for the infinity is so rich, that it appears in the same time as always new.

[887] Seeing the light within heart, experienced by hesychasts, it doesn't produce a state of simple focusing, but a deep feeling that overflows in tears, a great and serene enthusiasm, and an endless joy. The godlike limitlessness doesn't produce a self-losing of the conscience, but an indescribable joy of it.

[888] The light seen within heart, it isn't an impersonal apparition, but it the light irradiating from within the Person of the Ghost, or it is the Ghost irradiating, full of light, from the Person of Christ.

light will show itself as above-nature, in an untold way, within me, I will truly know that You are with me, as vestment of mine, towards the holy and undefiled life. And these ones, according to Your Saints, they have dressed up into the Father. And thus they have become visibly as houses and dwelling places and churches of that godhead in three shines, and above-praise. This is for by getting out of the seen things, and by resting into the thought things, they rest themselves spiritually into You, You godhead above godhead[889].

43. Where Does It Come From, within Soul, the Godlike Love?

The godlike love is born within soul and it fierily burns up by fulfilling the commandments and by meditating at the godlike dogmas and by spiritually rekindling of the life-maker-Ghost into the soul. It is like a soul of the clean, eternal, and always springing prayer. It is a union and it is a work, a union and an all-comprising look, a kidnapping, a sight, and a truly holly joy, out of illumination. It is a non-wandering way of the consummate and above-nature union with God. It is an indubitable beginning of the understanding and above-nature light, springing out of hypostasis, of the godhead's gift, of the earnest of the future inheritance of the saints, of the guarantee of the Christ's glory, of the above-skies vestment, of the above-world gladness, and of the seal of the holy adoption. If I have to say it in short, it is and it can be called as the wonderful beginning of the brightness, one that makes of the same image with Christ (Rom. 8: 29) the ones who are imparted with and who are made partakers to His untold godhead, or also brothers of His and inheritors of God and together inheritors with Christ. This is why, blessed is the one who has achieved, through the due perseverance into the mentioned things, the untold love from God, and through the perseverance into the prayer and into the quiet living with Christ, that one will be truly attached to God, and he will be changed with that deifying and above-

[889] Godhead above what we know, we think, and we understand as godhead. This expression comes from Dionysus the Areopagite. We are in full apophatic theology. There is a resting and a seeing lacking any effort of understanding, of formulating, of ascending to a higher state of happiness. The soul is in the true infinity. The enthusiasm of the loving connection, which the soul enters on this level, with God as borderless Subject, it no longer can be expressed in theoretical expositions, but it is expressed in praises addressed to God, at the second person.

changing change[890], by reckoning the sufferings for Christ as joy (Col. 1: 24) and by "wanting very, His commandments" (Ps. 111[891]: 1). His to be the glory forever and ever. Amen.

44. Again about the Godlike Love.

God is, by nature, endlessly for infinite times, above any sight, be it even the sight of the Cherubs. Without any doubt, one can somehow see (live) His love, due to God's infinite kindness. This is for His love has come out of Himself, it is obvious that He can be known through love. This is for the created ones, and the shown ones, they have been made for their meanings. That's why, in the first place, the godlike love is shown in the thought things, namely in Angels and in souls, for they are closer and more characteristic to God. This is for the understanding natures are closer to God. For them, God makes visible the other things, out of His love, and, as one would say, with the due generosity or, more properly said, magnanimously. That's why, the ones who see, they can look, in a bright manner, at the love of the One Who is unseen in Himself; through the visible things they can see, as through some engagement gifts, the One Who is known with the understanding and Who is above-world.

This is for between the loving God and the loved human being, there occur many things fierily and from all quarters heralding the godlike love[892], as it is due, and especially when the mind finds its steadfastness and its sight in the illuminated heart, being under the godlike work and, consequently, being kindled up. This is for then the soul receives through grace, into the heart, the earnest of the spiritual life, in an understanding and well felt work. Then the soul starts seeing them without mistake, and very surely, as illuminated in a godlike and above-nature manner, as some engagement gifts of the Loving One, and it starts thinking at Him even since now. Through this, the [890] This is a change that doesn't resemble to the passionate changes of the earthly life. It is a change that make the spiritual man no longer changing. But still is in this change a fiery love and a continuous amazement. The sufferings no longer disturb him. He keeps the joy even in sufferings.

[892] "They are fierily heralding". The things, and the circumstances which we are always placed in, they don't herald God in a cold manner. This is for they herald God's love for us, and His love is heralded through them, warmly, full of interest in us, and continuously pursuing our good. This love welcomes us, on both ways, out of all things and circumstances. Through all these, God wants to help us, and to lead us towards Him.

soul is attracted too, and the soul equally wants to turn these things, to That One[893]. That's why, the man tries to happily imagine the face of the Loving One, and he is filled up with an overwhelming awe. But, by being somehow tired of the love for God and for anything else, the man releases his thinking and his feeling, from straining, and he no longer know what to do because of the sight's overwhelming. And thus guided, the soul gladdens, jumps, and rejoices, and ceases to feel his own weight and he starts ascending and loving God, at his turn, consummately, and the soul reaches a happy burning by God's love, by being filled up with God's mysteries, and by feeling himself as being under the work of the fire from within heart of the All-Holy and of-life-maker Ghost. These are done in a wonderful manner, as a holy and very sweet circle of the love. This circle is born out of the showing of the godlike love in creatures and in all done things, which is shown through, limpidly, our loving God, in order to elevate us too, at His love. Through them God makes Himself loved by us. Then we reach, as images of His, at the godlike likeness, through the sweetening and through the rejoicing of receiving the godlike love, by becoming us wisely kind, or seeing doers[894], being us loved by God and us loving God; and by suffering the mysteries of the godlike and of-life-maker union, and of the going out of ourselves (of the ecstasy) and those of the all-shiny light of the knowledge or, to say it in short, the happy sufferings into Christ our Lord[895].

45. About the Fear out of Love.

You who has ascended at the love of God and at the spiritual resting of the mysterious love, and you who have been [893] The one who receives gifts as signs of somebody's love, he feels the urge to answer with his own gifts. But the man, by not having what to turn to God from himself, he turns to God what he receives from God.

[894] Reaching from image to likeness, or to consummation, or on the level of us seeing and loving God, we still haven't forsaken our virtues gained on the doer level. Although we have reached at wisdom, we still haven't forsaken the kindness; though we've reached at seeing, we haven't forsaken the deeds.

[895] Although this union with God seems representing a mystique valid in any religion, the author of this writing still specifies that all these mysteries are identical to Christ's sufferings. Christ was the first One to suffer in His human life the surpassing of the pains by rejoicing of God, and the resurrection as elevating to a state which the human is totally filled up and overwhelmed by the godlike Ghost. If these ascensions hadn't taken place into Christ's humanity, we wouldn't have had any help in order that to happen within us.

sweetened and gladdened with the best feeling, and in an untold manner, by the godlike grace, for you have looked at the depths of the above-world mysteries[896], and you have delighted yourselves with them, in an untold manner, and you have been resting yourselves in the deep peace, you still have fear[897]. And by taking heed at God, you pray, humbling yourselves on all the ways. You hear David the Prophet shouting out loud towards God: "You are my gladness, deliver me from the ones who surround me" (Ps. 31[898]: 7); and: "Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice of Him with tremble" (Ps. 2: 11). You also see Paul, "the vessel of the choosing" (Acts 9: 15), kidnapped to the third sky and entering the holy Paradise and hearing untold things which the man isn't allowed to speak (2 Cor. 12: 2-4), but, after these great things, he still feared that, by telling about them to others, to prove himself as inexperienced (1 Cor. 9: 27).

So, when the godlike David, the teacher of the world, he says: "The ones who love the Lord, hate the evil things" (Ps. 96[899]: 10), this means: "You who love God, fear God". This is for he sees them, that even after they started loving God, the evilness attempts to attract them and to sneak into their souls. That's why, rightly and very appropriately, he commands to the ones who love the Lord and who have reached this state, to still take heed and to hate the evilness. And if you haven't learnt to hate the evilness, you still must have fear. This is because, if this hadn't been fearsome, David the Prophet wouldn't have told the ones who love Christ to hate the evilness.

This is because the joy and the gladness of God it is a high and godlike and truly full of grace state, and the one having it he can look, when being in it, at above-nature mysteries, but our soul still is changing by nature and is not-separated from the earthly clay and from the body growing out of it, so that the soul still must always fear, in his struggle, of consenting to the [896] "Του Θειου χρατηρος" can mean the godlike cup, but it also can mean the bottomless vessel or crater, of the godhead. The one who have drunk out of it, they have looked at the godlike depths, and they have gotten drunk by them.

[897] The one who looks at the full of mystery depths of God, on one hand, he is resting himself ibn a deep peace, by being totally absorbed by looking at them, and on the other hand he still fears the temptations which can detach him from there.

[898] In KJB we have: Psalm 32: 7: "Thou art my hiding place; thou shalt preserve me from trouble; thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance. Selah."; in ROB we have: "You are my escape from the trouble that is engulfing me; You are my joy; deliver me from the ones who have surrounded me." (E. l. t.'s n.)

body. The soul still is, in a non-understood manner, to the body, and the soul somehow willy-nilly breaths together with the body, and the soul suffers together with the body, and the soul changes together with the body, in some regards, through nature, so that somebody could tell that the soul hasn't mastery upon the body. And the body is a relentless enemy to the soul, by searching everywhere for hooks which the body could grab the soul in order to topple the soul over[900]. That's why, one needs struggle and prayer, due to the fear. How much fear and tremble and how much taking heed and prayer the soul needs, in order to tend towards God, I let that to the ones who have much more feeling, amongst the listeners, to research and to discern. But these things can be known only by the soul that has reached on the level of the seeing, through the illuminated grace of the Ghost, the soul that is suffering the things characteristic to the godlike love.

If Adam had had the due fear, in so much overwhelming gift of the prophecy and likeness to God, which Adam was rejoicing of, he wouldn't have been defeated with so much dishonor, neither would have been Samson – the one born out of promise (Jud. 13: 3), or the God-bearer David, or many others, amongst whom the wonderful Solomon. So, if those so great people had needed fear and struggle and taking heed accompanied by prayer, how much more do you reckon that they need these things those ones who haven't yet achieved the above-nature gift and work of the grace? This is because they haven't ascended to the ecstatic godlike love and to the insane drunkenness[901] of seeing the beauty of God. So, how much fear and trembling and taking heed and prayer into Christ Jesus, accompanied by humble and restless thinking, do need those ones?

[900] The idea about the hooks (nose ring), namely about the passion or the weaknesses which somebody can be caught by, in order him to be toppled over, it has been developed by L. Binswanger in "Grundformen und Erknnytnis menschlichen Daseins", Zurich, 1942.

[901] It is the "insane love" for Christ, that P. Evdokimov wrote a book about: "L'amour fou", based on the Holy Fathers' texts. It is a love reckoned by people as "insane", because the ones whoa re mastered by it, they have forsaken everything the world offers, for the sake of Christ, by choosing a reality seen only through faith. But this "insane love or drunkenness" can only be lived by the ones who see and whop experience the godlike beauty, after they have been cleaned up of their passions. So, this love has nothing passionate in it. It is a "sober drunkenness", as the Holy Fathers said, a drunkenness of the restraint, a drunkenness of the spirit, of the intense living the wise love of God.

46. The Threefold Kind of the Love.

The experience knows a threefold beginning of the love and, according to that, there are three kinds of the first loves. And the rationalities (the meanings) of them are threefold too. It is a sensitive love, namely of the senses, for some of the things submitted to the senses: the addicted lust for something pleasant, which the animals too often love something with. Then there is another love: a rational desire of the soul, for something reckoned as good, in order to enjoy that good thing. The third one is the understanding love, that one born out of the-life-maker Ghost. In this last case, an above-nature beauty is poured within heart, unwillingly, ant that beauty it kindles the heart up, and it works upon heart through the seeing of the supreme beauty, namely of God. This is for as God is seen as beautiful not by the will of the soul, but by nature, Him being beautiful and more beautiful than all things, likewise His godlike love doesn't burn for the soul wants it, for it is a natural work of the-life-maker Ghost always in movement, working within heart. It is so far from a willing movement that one can say, on the opposite, that rather that love moves the will[902]. That's why, the love of God is and it is called, rightly so, as godlike comforting, being also a work of God within the man's soul through the breathing and through the dwelling of the-life-maker-Ghost, and also a soul's dependency on God[903]. It is a wonderful union and [902] God is not seen as beautiful by the will of the soul, but God's beauty imposes to the soul, as belonging to God's nature. Likewise, God doesn't love for He wants to love, but He love by His nature. That's why neither is Him loved because He wants to be loved, or because the soul wants to love. The God's love moves naturally within the man's soul and the soul loves God naturally, when the soul is healthy. But by being, by nature, worthy to be loved, and by working as such within the soul, God though moves the soul's will towards loving Him, and thus He makes the man's will to agree His will. In God the will is permanently consistent with the nature. In man it can be the opposite too.

[903] God isn't forcedly connected (σχέσις) with the man's soul; the love for the man is a work, it is an action, and it isn't a passive, endured state. The man's love is the relation that he experiences; the man experiences that relation and he accepts it, or not. But that relation isn't less a necessity to the man. And this proves that that relation naturally belongs to the man too. It is natural to be man to be in it, but this natural need is being actualized through the Ghost. The man cannot actualize that need except in relation with God, namely with God's help, or in the relation with his fellow human. That need isn't a mono-personal quality, but it is an interpersonal quality. The themes analyzed by the Catholic theology: which is stronger, the grace or the man's will when encountering one another, it can be solved in another mode: the grace sets the will in movement, namely the grace strengthens the will. In a sense, the grace is stronger, not in order to subjugate the will but in order to strengthen the will. The godlike freedom strengthens the human freedom. On the lowest levels (of the doing), the will is lesser strengthened by the grace, and that's why the will is weaker too.

together-suffering (compassion), attracting the entire mind with all the soul's powers and with the entire soul's vigor, towards the union with the charming godlike beauty, through an understanding desiring of the beauty (of the good)[904].

That's why none of the kinds of love mentioned before it is called as comforting: neither lusting for something pleasant to the senses, nor desiring the good. Only desiring the beauty (the good), known with the understanding, out of the work of the holy Ghost, as desire that moves with clean feeling within heart, only that is called as comforting[905]. That's why, the Ghost working this, He is called as Comforter. This is truly love, the others being only images of this love. Better said, the soul's love searching through reasoning for the good, it is, rightly so, an image of the godlike love. That's why, verily, it is difficult to somebody to know the sweetness and the comforting of the love and the full cleanness of the love, before being his heart worked, out of a continuous and manifested springing up, by the-life-maker power of the Holy Ghost. This is because neither the reasoning can move the soul's powers, namely the inward heart, but only from outside. All the less can the feeling do that. That's why, these loves are only a small part and only some images and some shadows of the true love.

But the power and the work of the Holy and of-life-maker Ghost, it lays mastery upon the entire dwelling place of the inward soul and from the deep and it moves, so, as I've said, entirely, in a charming manner, the soul's powers, through an understanding view of the supreme beauty (of the supreme good), that totally kidnaps the soul towards the godlike beauty through itself the love and through an above-world charm[906].

[904] "The understanding desiring" it differs from the "sensitive desire" of the bodily love and from the purely natural "rational desire". It is a working desiring, not in the rationality issuing judgments on a whatever good, but it is rather within the heart that is, all of a sudden, conquered by the work of the godlike love. Within heart there work too, the understanding and all the soul's powers. Consequently, all of them are conquered away. The Greek word καλός (καλλονή), used for God, it has also the meaning of beautiful, conquering, and also of good. On the superior plan, and especially at God, these meanings are unified.

[905] The "sensitive lusting" is rather a movement within body; the "rational" one is the result of a rationality's judgment. Only the "understanding love", born out of the work of the Holy Ghost, it moves within heart as a clean feeling and only that brings a true comforting.

[906] The idea of the good spell cast upon the soul through the concrete example and through the love belonging to another subject, it has been developed by B. Vîșeslavțev (Etica erosului transfigurator, Russian, Ymca-Press, 1931) and by L. Binswanger (Grundformen und Erknntnis menschlichen Daseins).

Only in the one whom this takes place within, by being him the sole bearer of God and by being him moved in a godlike manner towards the things standing before him, only he has understood without any mistake the soul's mystery and what the love actually is, and what is the joy of that love and how no human being can actually love anything, not even God, before being that person imparted with the-life-maker Ghost. Even if he can somehow love, he still doesn't know what the love truly is and he doesn't know the untold pleasure of the love in Christ Jesus, our Lord Whom it is due the whole glory.

47. What the Way is Like, which the Man Comes Closer to Seeing (to Contemplating) God.

Like the body's movement need something else that doesn't belong to the body's order, namely the body needs eyes and something from above its nature, namely light, likewise the mind's movement needs eyes which differs from the mind's order and from the light from above the mind's nature. That's why, not the whole movement of the mind it is appropriate. But only that that moves, as it has been said, through eyes and through the light of the grace. And the mind's eyes are the opening of the heart through the faith. And the light is God Himself, working through the Ghost, within the heart. And like the senses' light doesn't move the ones who do not have eyes, but it only moves the one who sees, likewise the understanding light - or God – doesn't move the mind of the one who has not the opening of the heart, but only that one who has that opening. But, like the eyes couldn't work their things without light, neither the heart's opening could without God; better said, the heart doesn't even open without God Who works and Who can be seen through the heart[907].

[907] We have to memorize this idea about the "opening of the heart" through faith, likened to the body's eyes. Like the body has openings also through senses and a body couldn't live without senses, likewise the heart has an opening not only towards people, but also towards God. Besides, through themselves the senses, it is opened not only the body, but also the soul, towards the world, and through the world towards God. This means that the heart has an opening too. But the heart cannot be content only with what the other people give it, as the body can be, taken in itself, content with what the senses give it. The heart is open towards the infinity of God, towards the infinity of His love. By this, the heart is spiritually nourished out of that infinity and the heart lives in that infinity, but without merging with that infinity, like the body also lives the life of the world through senses, but without merging to the world. God is also the One Who makes the heart to open for seeing Him and receiving Him, and He is the One Who is seen through the heart. That's why, on one hand, God makes Himself as "object"

48. About Seeing as Imparted Word[908].

After the understanding union of the heart through grace[909], the mind sees the spiritual light and the mind extends itself into the desired One, namely into God, by totally going out of feeling, and by becoming colorless, without quality, without imaginings, and escaped from the hallucinations of the sensitive things. This is for our mind is a vessel receiving, as much as it is possible to it, the unapproachable light of the godlike beauty. And the mind is a wonderful vessel, for it widens according to the godlike Ghost poured within it. If the pouring it greater, the vessel will become bigger; and if the pouring is smaller, the vessel too, it will become smaller. And again, through the greater pouring it will be made stronger, and through the smaller pouring it will become more powerless[910]. And again, if it is poured much into the mind's vessel, the mind's vessel becomes one with what it has been poured in it, and it preserves non-spilled out, what it has received; and if only a little is poured in it, it will immediately become weak and more powerless and it won't be able to preserve what it has been poured in it[911]. And again: by receiving more, it become lighter; but it becomes heavier and it hands downwards when the vessel is empty of of the sight, and on the other hand, he makes Himself together-subject with the heart, of this view. The heart feels, on one hand, that it sees, and on the other hand, the heart feels that God is seen through the heart, like the one who speaks the words of God, here he says that he is the one living, and there he says that the Ghost speaks through him. The man gives human qualification to what he sees out of God, and God gives godlike qualification to this seeing of the man. The man's seeing of God, it is, in the same time, human and godlike, namely it is theandric.

[908] It is what we have said in the previous footnote: the man's sight is a man's together-seeing with God, or of God with the man, or the spiritual growing up of the man together with the increase of the received grace.

[909] It is about the heart's union with God through the heart's opening. But that isn't a purely sentimental union, or through senses, but it is a union that is also understanding, a union that produces understanding too, and not only love. That's why all the Holy Fathers ask us to bring our mind into our heart. Out of the heart, or together with the heart, the mind sees God, loving him and understanding Him in the same time, or uniting with Him and understanding what happens in this union.

[910] The mind is an elastic vessel, one endlessly elastic. It can widen endlessly and it can diminish until no longer being able to receive anything. Maybe this could be the atrophied existence in hell. In the same time, the more pouring of light the mind receives, the stronger the mind becomes in order to receive that light.

[911] Through this, it is clarified the spiritual meaning of the synergia, or the together-working of the man with God: the more grace is, the more power is within the being receiving the grace and the greater unity between the grace and the human being.

what is appropriate to it. And again: by being lighter, it holds more.

It happens to the mind's vessel, in other regards too, the totally opposite of what happens to the sensitive vessels, which hold the small things easier than they hold the big things. That's why, I reckon that the Son of the Thunder said it at the beginning of the Gospel he wrote: "At the beginning there was the Word and the Word wat at God and God was the Word" (Jn. 1: 1). He said this, in order to extend the mind that hears it, according to the size of the word and in order that through the whole greater light of the thing to give the mind a greater width and to make the mind stronger and more able to turn towards itself, but also able to extend according to the size of the voice, towards comprising the seeing of God and towards comprising, as much as possible, His wisdom. And, when Jesus says to Ananias about Paul: "for he is a chosen vessel unto Me" (Acts 9: 15), this must be understood about the great power of understanding belonging to the inward man, which he also was kidnapped to the third sky through, where, as one can hear from himself: "he received untold words, which are impossible, to the man, to tell" (2 Cor. 12: 4).

49. About Sight.

Our mind is like some sort of place, that receives the light of the godlike showing. And our mind's trait, which we are going to talk about, it is wonderful, for it proves to suffer the things contrary to a bodily place. This is for, the more extended this place is, the greater is the content this place can receive. But the mind, on the opposite, the more it focuses and it gathers into itself, the more capacious the mind becomes. And when the mind has started all its rational and understanding movement, or any kind of movement, the mind sees God above all dimension. The mind sees God as much as God gives the mind, as a gift, the grace of the Holy Ghost, and as much as the embodied and created nature allows it to see the One Who is outside anything. The mind sees God not by vainly imagining God, neither by sending upwards, as in a dream, its own reckonings, but the mind sees God through the untold power of the godlike Ghost. This is for the Ghost works into light, within the heart that experiences an above-nature transformation. By receiving the heart this transformation by grace, though the mind sleeps and rests, the mind still takes vigil (Son of Songs 5:

2)[912]. And that person rather knows that that work is godlike and spiritual, than that he is a human being. This is for he has during that time a ceaseless spiritual movement of the heart[913], springing of life, and, consequently, most often, the soft tear. The work of the Ghost makes the heart to be at peace not only with itself, but also with all the people. This is for out of the heart, there spring up cleanness, gladness, and untold delectation. The one who is imparted with that, he truly avoids – and he doesn't only pretend it – even with his hearing, the whole body's pleasure, the whole joy, or the richness, or the glory form the outside and passing things.

50. This is for, the one who has received all these things, in a godlike and spiritual manner, with his heart and with his mind, and not only with the simple reasoning, he doesn't rejoice only of this light of the senses. This is because through the scattering of the senses, it is being darkened the godlike light, namely that light known with the mind and truly sweet. That's why, it too little uses this; only that much to comfort the outside man. But is endures all the things, and it suffers all the things (1 Cor. 13: 7), and he has become steadfast in all things, due to the pleasant feeling from within him, a feeling born out of the love for the godlike seeing. And there is no trouble which to sadden him, except for the sin.

For that place, namely for the mind in state of love, David toiled very much, showing his desire and his tiredness, and how he didn't give sleep to his eyes, neither napping to his eyelashes, nor resting to his temples, "until, he says, I have found place to the Lord" (Ps. 131[914]: 4-5). And the wise Solomon enforces this by saying: "If the ghost of the one who masters your heart, he will ascend, you won't leave your place" (Eccl. 10: 4). But also, [912] The mind gathered within heart, it encounters, through its opening, the Holy Ghost. Then the mind ceases its works, for these works are directed towards the limited creatures. Then the mind sinks into the infinity of the love of God, by no longer having any worry to reach something else. The perfect love rests you; you no longer want anything else. Now the Holy Ghost works, with His love, within the mind, namely the Ghost pours Himself increasingly more, within the mind. The mind widens just for receiving increasingly more of Him.

[913] The mind has ceased any work, but the heart is in a ceaseless movement. This is for through the heat it becomes working the love of the Holy Ghost. This is for the heart is the organ of the feeling, and therefore is also the organ of the love. And the love is a continuous movement and in the same time a steadfast one. The love doesn't pass from an object to another, as the mind does.

[914] In KJB we have: Psalm 132: 4-5. (E. l. t.'s n.)

the Savior commands to His disciples: “Get up and let’s leave from here” (Mk. 14: 15). And, by committing the Passover of the fore-imagining in the upper room, He let us understand this place. This is why, I reckon, He blesses the ones poor in spirit, namely the withdrawal of the mind from all things and, to say so, the mind’s emptying and the mind’s gathering into itself. This is for, then the mind no only sees the Kingdom of God, but the mind also experiences it, by achieving an immortal delectation, in peace.

51. About the Doer and the Seer (the Contemplative).

The seer fructifies the pleasure of the true seeing, as the good part, by accustoming himself to the silence and by looking at Christ. The doer doesn’t know this pleasure, as one who hasn’t tasted it, because of being worries for many things and because of getting troubled (Lk. 10: 41), by singing and by reading and by tiring his body. And the doer even despises sometimes, as tiring and useless, the efforts which wing the understanding towards the things of the mind’s understanding and unseen with the senses, which bring, through the occupation with them, an indescribable joy. The doer doesn’t understand that our good suffering rests next to the true and of people loving and without any shortcoming, Word of God, and it is born out of seeing Him. This is for God is all-consummate and He doesn’t need us to serve Him. That’s why, He praises and welcomes Mary who sits at His feet and who nourishes herself with the contemplation of His words and who wakens her inward human being in order to understand those words (Lk. 10: 41). Mary doesn’t do like Marta does, because Marta worries for and she is troubled with many things, as the Word Himself says. He says this not only for urging them towards what is the highest, but also in order to teach all of us from them, lest they rebuke as lazy, on the ones who want to occupy themselves with the seeing and who tarry into that, but to praise them and to force themselves to follow their example, as much as they can.

52. How Do the Seers (the Contemplatives) See.

The contemplatives see in the things from now and in the done things, as in a mirror and as in a riddle (1 Cor. 13: 12), the future state. And the mirror, on one hand, it doesn’t bear any thickness of the thing it reflects, but on the other hand, what the mirror reflects it isn’t totally nothing. This is for everyone who loves the truth will confess that what one can see in the mirror it is a very clear image of a thing. Likewise, the existing things and the done things, they do not show any other thickness or any other hypostasis, except for their own, but they though show the images of the true things, to the ones who have receives the power of seeing and who advance, without mistake, t0owards the Truth Himself[915]. When, therefore, you hear Paul saying that "through faith we walk, not through seeing" (2 Cor. 5: 7), you do not reckon that he speaks about the faith born out of hearing, namely through the simple word. Because, otherwise, how would has said, the same one: "Now I know in part, but then I will know as I have been known" (1 Cor. 13: 12)"; or: "When what is consummate will come, it will cease what is from part" (1 Cor. 13: 10)? Can you see that the same knowledge from now, it will help us seeing in the future too? The difference between the one from the future and the one from now, it is only as much as it is between what is consummate and what isn't consummate. And again, the one who says that now we walk through faith and not through seeing, in another place he says: "I am running so, but not like one who doesn't see; I punch, but not like one beating the sky" (1 Cor. 9: 26). He says these things, not opposing himself the things he said before, but in order to show how much true and sure knowledge he had about the future things. He cogitates like that, for the twofold meaning of the faith and of the seeing.

This is for, there is a faith born through the simple word and which needs to be proven. And there is a faith that doesn't need to be proven, for it seeds a satisfying conviction within believer, out of some obvious things. This is also called as the faith founded in a hypostasis[916]. You will understand eve clearer what we are saying, out of the following example. Suppose that I am telling you that I've seen some man, a great craftsman in weaving, one capable of imprinting on the fabric, images of: [915] The reality at the basis of the images, it is the Truth Himself, or God. The things don't have within themselves some hypostasis, namely some other reality, except for their own. But their reality has a character of a mirror, of an image. It is necessarily shown through them, their foundation, of the Truth Himself.

[916] "ενυπόστατος πίστις" – en-hypostatized faith, growing out of God's reality, a faith experienced by the soul. This faith has its proof in itself. The whole chapter intends to prove that the godlike things aren't known, during this life, only deductively and from distance, but is takes place also some experiencing of them. This is, actually, the whole philokalist and general-patristic conception.

animals, birds, lions, vultures, horses, chariots, wars, and others like these. If you haven't seen those things by yourself, you will need faith in order to consent to what you have been told only by word. And if it happens to you to see only the fabric and not also the weaver, you will immediately know, without needing somebody to explain it to you, that that is the product of a man's work. This is for that fabric couldn't have produced on itself, neither could have been weaved by any other creature. In this case, so, the soul will be engulfed by another faith, one much different from the first faith.

Likewise, also what is presented in a general manner, it produces the faith. This is for you have seen a man, let's say it has been one having a blond hair, or a dark hair, tall, and otherwise average in all aspects: eyes, cheeks color, nose, lips, which the face of a person is shown through. This face belongs to a person (hypostatized – ενυπόστατος). If somebody asked you, though, how that weaver's face is, you would say, after seeing that fabric, that the one who has weaved it, he has the general countenance of a man, but that you do not know him in person (hypostatized), because you haven't seen him personally. You wouldn't deny that the weaver of that fabric, he is a man, and that you know that he is a man and that he has a human countenance. So, you know a non-personal image (non-hypostatic – ανυπόστατος), one whom even without you having seen him, you still admit him, by and large, without hesitation, as you would have seen him.

There is, therefore, in order to repeat the things we've already said, a faith out of hearing, one received on the basis of the simple word, and there is a faith founded in hypostasis and received through an obvious entrustment, as it is the image seen in somebody, as in a subject, and in this case it is called as hypostatized, and there is an image that isn't in somebody but it is contemplated in its general rationality, the genre not being specified through many differentiating traits[917].

[917] "Και εστιν ειδος ουχ εν τινι, αλλα γενιωω λόγω θεωρεύμενον, ου χατα πολλον γένει διαφερότων χατηγορούμενον". We are here in full Aristotelian logics. Patriarch Kallistos, or whosoever would be the author of this writing, he isn't only a hermit, but he is also a philosopher. He takes in account the renaissance of antique philosophy during the XIV Byzantine century. While Saint Basil the Great uses the discerning taken from Aristotle, between the human species and the human individual, in order to apply it to discerning between being and hypostasis amongst the Holy Trinity, Patriarch Kallistos applies it to

In this sense[918], all the contemplatives are mastered by a faith founded in hypostasis, but they see the image in general, and not in hypostasis. But if God hadn't been an intelligible image (that can be understood with the mind), how could have been He called as beauty?[919] So, as there is an intelligible beauty of God, but that beauty isn't seen in hypostasis[920], I mean that there is also another intelligible image of God, an image; great, all-holy, all-extolled, producing Awe to the soul, totally filling up and illuminating the mind, and overwhelming the mind with His great and much-diverse brightness, and bringing within mind the understanding about God[921]. By that faith being Manoah imprinted too, he shouted out: "We are lost, woman! For I have discerning between the faith not experiencing the believed reality, and the faith experiencing that reality.

[918] The whole exposition from before, it has been a very original characterization of the faith by seeing, and what that faith differs like, from the faith that is not based on seeing. The faith by seeing, it is also called as "hypostatical", for it comes out of itself the believed reality and as such it is experienced. That faith comes out of the power of that hypostatized reality, more precisely, it comes from the presence of the godlike Persons, a presence experienced by believer. Although, that faith doesn't see that Person (the Hypostasis) Himself. There are, actually, three situations: the faith out of hearing, that doesn't experience a work coming from God; the faith coming out of experiencing the work coming out of God's Hypostasis; and there is also the seeing of God "face to face', in His Hypostasis Himself, when the faith ceases. This will be in the future life. So, there are, actually, two faiths in the present life and there is also a faith, out of seeing, by a seeing in part. That is the faith founded on something that comes out of Hypostasis, but that faith isn't founded on seeing the Hypostasis Himself. That faith knows about the general image of God, but it doesn't concretely see God, but it still believes in Him.

[919] The ones who "see", they know that God has a hypostatized image, but they don't see Him as such; they only see a general image of God, but they don't see His hypostatized image. Their faith is hypostatical, in the meaning that is based on something coming out of the godlike hypostasis, but because of not seeing on Himself, that faith still remains a faith, for it hasn't reached yet to be a seeing. The ones having this kind of faith, they no longer believe only out of hearing, but they believe out of experiencing God. They still don't see the hypostatized image of God's beauty. But they see a beauty and they know that that beauty belongs to God. This is for God wouldn't have been beauty if He hadn't been a concretized reality, namely if He had been only a general reality. But through the beauty and the power of God, as those ones are seen by them, the seers still see, even though indirectly, the God's concrete hypostatical image.

[920] This affirmation can be understood somehow like this: the God's beauty is in "hypostasis", but the seers do not see God's hypostatical image. We have here the difference between being and work – or uncreated divine energy. Through the things said before about Paul, who, on one hand, he sees the image, and on the other hand, he doesn't see the image, and therefore he still needs a faith, it is affirmed that, in the life in the present body, we still do not see the hypostatized or the personal image of God, but we only see His general image. In the future life we will see the same image, but so clearly that there will no longer be the faith needed.

[921] This is the hypostatical faith: that one bringing within soul the conviction about the hypostatized image, on the basis of radiating out of Him, of what he has: greatness, light etc.

seen God" (Judg. 13: 22). This is for everyone being imprinted by that image, he confesses that that is a proof of God's imprinting.

But the great Moses too, he saw God in this way, as it has been written: "God showed Himself to Moses in image and not through riddles" (Num. 12: 8). This is for, if there had totally lacked an image worthy of God, God would have been totally unseen (non-cognoscible, non-sensed). The beauty is a harmony and the image is some kind of steadfast composition[922]. And if one said that God lacks an image worthy of Him, we should say that God is lacking the beauty too, especially regarding His face, which the image and the beauty consists of.

But someone of the prophets says: "I saw Him and He had no image, neither beauty, and the image was missing" (Isa. 53: 2-3). He said that about the godhead of the Word, for He hanged on the cross as a malefactor, not having any sign of His godlike nature. This is for, to the extent the human is concerned, though there no longer was in Him beauty, due to the death, He still had, obviously, the countenance of a dead[923].

But David extolls Him again, as: "adorned with beauty" (Ps. 44[924]: 3); and not according to humanity. For he adds: "Grace has been poured on your lips", a fact that is characteristic to the godhead, as the beauty is too. And David mentions the face of God in many places. Here he says: "You turned away Your face and I was troubled: (Ps. 29[925]: 7), here he [922] The image is like some kind of "structure". The kindness, the almightiness, the wisdom, are a steadfast structure, of God, the source of all structures. God can be lived too, in a certain way, as such.

[923] Maybe here found his inspiration a German sculptor, when he carved a wooden statue of Jesus, that statue having instead of a face, a simple smooth sheet of metal (in the Church from Schifferstadt, a locality near to Speyer). But this would have meant that had been lost in sufferance the Christ Jesus's human face too. And then how it was possible to be seen His sufferance, and His love, able to receive that sufferance?

[924] In KJB we have: Psalm 45: 3: "Thou art fairer than the children of men: grace is poured into thy lips: therefore God hath blessed thee for ever."; In ROB we have: Psalm 44: 3: "Adorned you are with the beauty, more than the humans' sons; poured have been grace on your lips. For this God has blessed you, forever."

[925] In KJB we have: Psalm 30: 7. To be noticed that the verb in KJB is to hide (the face), while in ROB is to turn. (E. l. t.'s n.)

says: "Do not turn Your face away from me" (Ps. 26[926]: 14); or: "Turn away Your face from my sins" (Ps. 50[927]: 10) and so on.

So, if it isn't forbidden to speak at God about a face and about a beauty appropriate to God, which do not consist of figure and it isn't in an own hypostasis[928], then it will be appropriate to speak too, about an image that is itself face and beauty. This one having it imprinted in himself, Paul said too: "So I am running, without seeing anything; so am I punching, not as beating the air" (1 Cor. 9: 26).

This is for, God, without being seen in Himself, neither imparted, He still is, in another meaning, seen, and the non-comprised One is comprised. That's why David too, he asks us to always look at God's face (Ps. 104: 4), for, by having inside us the imprinting of the godhead, to be us imparted with much and untold grace, and with joy and with godlike pleasure. So says David towards God, about himself: "I will be satiated, when I see Your glory" (Ps. 16[929]: 15). This is for, to the ones who see God in truth and Ghost, to them starts showing itself the much and endless glory of the godlike face. And the delectation and the joy springing out of that, it is inexhaustible to the ones experiencing it, and to the ones who haven't seen it and who haven't tasted it, it is impossible to tell them about it and it is impossible to them to understand it. This is because, as no word could describe the sweetness of the honey to the ones who didn't taste the honey, what craftsmanship could explain the things from above-mind, to the ones who haven't seen those and who haven't been imparted with the godlike joy and delectation coming out of those? But about these, we are going to stop speaking, here.

So, Saint Paul, by having his faith in God, founded on a hypostasis (ενυπόστατον) and the great image as above-beauty, but non-hypostatic (ανυπόστατον) of God[930], he said that we walk by faith (2 Cor. 5: 7), namely through that faith founded on a [926] In KJB we have: Psalm 27: 9. The same observation related to the verb used (vid supra): "Hide not thy face far from me; put not thy servant away in anger:"; in ROB we have: "Do not turn away Your face from me and not forsake Your servant for Your anger;". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[927] In KJB we have: Psalm 51: 9. The same observation related to the verbs (vid supra). (E. l. t.'s n.)

[928] The beauty of God "it isn't an own hypostasis", meaning that it doesn't compose a hypostasis by itself, as there are the three godlike Persons, but not in the meaning that it wouldn't be founded on a hypostasis, or in the three Hypostases of the Holy Trinity.

[929] In KJB we have: Psalm 17: 15. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[930] Saint Paul had the entrustment about the hypostatical – or as Person – image of God, by living an irradiation out of Him, but he didn't see that hypostatical image itself.

hypostasis (της ενυπόστατου), but not through an image seen in hypostasis; namely, by the faith that doesn't cause the unborn godhead. For, Saint Maximos says: "I call as unborn deification the illumination of the godhead through the image being into hypostasis, that isn't created, but it shows itself in a not-understood mode, in the worthy ones. Although, through the image one can see the beauty"[931]. About this beauty, the Great Basil says: "What is more worthy of love, than the godlike beauty?". And again: "The true and most-love beauty and seen only with the cleaned mind, it is that from around the godlike and happy nature".

That's why, Paul too, he confessed about himself as being "simple in word, but not into knowledge" (2 Cor. 11: 6). For he was in a great knowledge, which he knew the above-understanding God through, in part, in the intelligible way worthy of God.

Moses, the seer of God, he had too this knowledge, for he saw the godlike image unseen in hypostasis, and its beauty. That's why he says: "If I have known that I've have found grace at You, show on Yourself to me in order I to know You and to see You" (Exod. 33: 13). He asks for this as one who become consummate, for he received yore, the godlike showing and the beauty's glory, but not in hypostasis[932]. But God didn't consent to Moses' request, because of not being this possible to any understanding soul and to any sight, not even to the angelic ones, as one exceeding the borders al the whole knowledge. Moses was seer of God, and he saw God in darkness, not in hypostasis but in intelligible image and beauty, without the hypostatical (as person) support[933]. So, one can see God, as Moses and Elijah said and, simply speaking, the whole godlike group of the prophets.

So, we walk by that faith founded into hypostasis (δια πίστεως ενυποστατου), which is born out of contemplating the things from around God and it takes is strength out of the glory shining out of the beauty of His face and it takes its witness, out of the imprinted image of His above-brightness light, and not through the faith born out of hearing the simple word[934]. And, if we walk by the faith founded in hypostasis and not founded in the image seen in its hypostatical support, or as person (2 Cor. 5: 7), in the future eon the faith won't be necessary any longer. That's why we have here the faith founded in hypostasis; and, for then it will clearly be seen the extolled image of the glory, here that image can be seen only overshadowed. "Here, as Gregory the Speaker about God, he says, it is gathered an imprinting out of something else, in an icon of the truth, that means an overshadowed image". Then it will be the seeing "face to face" (1 Cor. 12: 13) and "the ceasing of what is in part, through the showing of what is consummate" (1 Cor. 13: 10). "Now, says the Blessed Augustine, seeing God in part it consists of being the entire rational soul kidnapped by the love of His glory"[935]. This is for, in this love, the soul becomes unitary and it unitarily looks at the unique and above-all-things hidden, of God. Out of this image and out of this beauty and out of this face, the whole mind is filled up with brightness, and it is beautified, by being filled up with brightness and being above-world spiritually illuminated. Through these ones, it is simplified, it is elevated, and it is filled up with awe, the seer power of the mind. Through these ones too, it is mysteriously illuminated the soul, and it is the soul filled up with godlike [934] It is specified again the meaning of the hypostatically founded faith, both in comparison to the faith founded on hearing and on seeing the godlike hypostasis or hypostases. The hypostatically founded faith is the faith born out of the light irradiating out of God, out of His glory, which, in this sense, it can be called also as His image, but which isn't an image seen as hypostasis. This last one exceeds any creature's power of seeing Him, even the power of the Angels. But the faith born out of seeing the godlike glory and light, out of the things seen "around God", namely His uncreated energies, it still differs from the faith by hearing the simple word. It is experiencing of God through work, but it doesn't mean seeing Him.

[931] Saint Paul didn't see the hypostatized image, but he saw the beauty irradiating out of the godlike image.

[932] Moses too, he saw the image of God in the beauty irradiating out of Him, and so Moses was entrusted about His hypostatical image, but Mos4es didn't see Him in hypostasis.

[933] So, we can summarize the content of this development, like this: one can see the beauty of God and in this sense His image too, but not in hypostasis; but the seer knows about this through what he sees, through what irradiates out of hypostasis.

If we come back to the three mentioned categories of knowledge possible to the weaver: the knowledge by hearing, the knowledge by seeing the woven fabric, and the knowledge by seeing the person who weaved, the hypostatical faith is identical to knowing the weaver by seeing the fabric he produced, but not by seeing his person-face, while that one by hearing is identical to knowing the weaver by hearing about him; the third case of knowing about God it isn't possible to us. The difference between the hypostatical faith and that one of knowing the weaver by seeing the fabric he made, it is that that in fabric one cannot see the present work of the weaver, whilst in this faith one can see the present work itself, of God, the glory and the light irradiating out of Him. It is like seeing the weaver's hands at work, while not seeing his face.

[935] Now starts the Blessed Augustine being known in East, as one can see also out of the teaching of Saint Gregory Palamas about the power of the Holy Ghost.

delectation and gladness. And, to say it briefly, through these are glorified and deified the ones who love seeing and hearing the godhead, and who become friends, followers, and seers of God, while they still are tied to the body. That's why they intuit and reflect, partially, through an understanding feeling, the happiness of the future good things and the state of that eon, "which neither eye has seen, nor the ear has heard, neither the man's heart comprised them" (1 Cor. 2: 9).

53. Interpretation to the words: "Jerusalem being built up as a city whose partakers gather themselves together. For, there the tribes went up, the tribes of the Lord, in order to be witness to Israel" (Ps. 121: 2-3).

Jerusalem is interpreted as a place of the peace, and it is image of the place of God, namely of the soul having in himself that peace into Christ. This is because not any soul have in himself that peace into Christ, and not any soul can receive the name of the peace, but only that soul built up as a city and having the corner stone "placed by the Lord in Sion, according to the promise, the very precious stone" (Isa. 28: 16). And Sion is the seer peak of Jerusalem, which is the image of the soul's seer mind, full of peace. This is because, if you searched elsewhere, you couldn't find that mind noticing and looking at the truth's heights. That isn't anything else but the heart, that has received the peace into Christ, and that has been elevated whole, to a springing of peace state[936]. Jerusalem is, so, the soul living into the godlike peace, and having the corner stone and the precious stoned out of the Holy Scriptures, which the beasts hurrying up to ascend the God's Mountain are destroyed by; one that has also the tar, namely the humbleness produces by the Holy Ghost and that melts down and it smooth up the petrified callousness of the heart, with the godlike fire, and it transforms the heart into a crushed (Ps. 50: 19) and humbled ghost; and rain waters, [936] Here are being affirmed three things: a) the mind sees God; b) but only when brought within heart, for the heart has an opening towards the infinity of God; 3) but only a heart that has escaped the disturbance caused by any worries and thoughts, only such a heart can give room, within itself, to the seer mind, because only such a heart opens itself towards God. One may say that there is a collaboration between mind and heart also on an inferior life's plan: in this case the mind is occupied with the images of the things, while the heart is occupied with the worries about the things, or with the affections towards things. In order the man's mind to be able to see God within the man's heart, it must be the mind cleaned of thing's images, and the heart must be cleaned of the worries related to the things.

given to the Savior, which flow out of heart's rivers; and even the non-rotten pieces of wood aiming to union, as some thoughts of the true doing; then nails and the drill causing the fear and forcing towards fulfilling the godlike commandments; and also the godlike Word ad builder and the ones from after Him, namely the ones governing, with the science received from Him, the soul's powers; and, simply speaking, the tools for building, the fasting, the taking of vigil, the singing, the reading, and the others, to say it briefly, all the ones which we have received from the embodied Word (through the tool of the rationality), in order to accomplish the mode of the virtue[937]; and the rope made for palm basketry, namely the holy laws of God mentioned by Scriptures; and the light known with the mind and the above-all-brightness sun, and all the things reflecting their light within soul. To say it all at once, all the things used, in a seen manner, in order to build up a city, the soul has them in a godlike and spiritual manner. This is for, the soul is the Jerusalem understood with the mind, and the soul is being build up like a city, in order to be dwelling place to God Who is above all things, to the without-beginning and life-maker Trinity. This is for He said: "I and My Father will come, of course spiritually, and We will make Us, dwelling place, at him" (Jn. 14: 23), as He would have said: "We are going to make a city out of him; and a truly wonderful, stretched endlessly, city"[938].

That's why he says: "The Jerusalem that is being built up", and that is not built up yet. This is for, the One dwelling within soul is non-comprised, it is rightly so, the soul too, to be extended infinitely. That's why too, he says: "That is built up like a city" and not "there is a city being built up". This is for, the soul that is being built up, and for by combining several things it is being composed a unique building stretched in height and in width, in order to be the dwelling place of the without-beginning Emperor, it is very appropriately called as "city". But because its [937] "οργανικω λόγω εις αρετης τρόπον". This expression can be understood in both senses rendered by translation. But both senses can be joined. The embodied Logos has developed the human rationality, which He has assumed, in the mode of the virtue and, consequently, we can healthily actualize the rationality of our nature in the modes of the virtues. It is here not about the reasoning rationality, but it is here about the constitutive rationality of our human nature. Besides, between these two rationalities existing within man, there is a connection. This idea is taken from Saint Maximos the Confessor.

[938] So, the soul can be extended endlessly. The soul has this virtuality in himself. But this virtuality will be actualized if the soul has God as his content. Otherwise, the soul narrows according to the limited things - or the soul remains always on the limited plan.

building doesn't receive a border, for it is inhabited by the endless One, which isn't characteristic to a built city, the soul has been called, rightly so, in the Holy Scriptures, not a built-up city, but as "a city being built up". And the proven sign that the soul is Jerusalem, but like a city that is being built up, it is that the ones who are partaker to the soul, namely the soul's powers, are gathered together and they aren't divided, neither they wander as scattered away, but they live undisturbed, in that peace into Christ, being gathered together and having a unity amongst them. Then, in order to consummate the gathering together of the city's partakers, it is also given another sign, namely that "there ascended the tribes, the tribes of the Lord, as witness to Israel". He called the first ones as partakers, and now he calls them as "tribes". This is for the soul's powers do not belong to a foreign kind. And the ones simply being tribes of the soul, they become tribes of the Lord, by being made godlike and above-world levels, within the full of peace soul[939].

And through these is borne witness to and it is strengthened Israel, or the mind that sees God, and all of them fulfill a sole thing of God: the knowing of Him[940]. And all of these understanding powers contribute to building up the city of God-the All-Upholder, peaceful and holy. This is for truly in the city there have been elevated the soul's powers as some stairs, making the mind bearer of God and penetrated by God, and seer of God. This is because, as it is impossible to the tribes or to the scattered, and dominated, and divided by foreign things powers of the soul, to become stairs and to build up the soul, because by not being gathered together, they cannot give room to the peace, neither Jerusalem that is being build up, in order somebody to see in it the understanding work, so being these gathered together, it is impossible not to be elevated in it as understanding stairs and far leading into the Lord, together-speaking with the mind that sees God and defending it. This is for, when the soul is being build up like a city, in a peaceful and quiet settlement, and the partakers to the soul or the soul's powers are gathered together, the understanding powers are [939] The soul's powers, by becoming God's levels within the soul, they are so much imprinted by the godlike power, so much transfigured, so that they can be reckoned as belonging to God. This is for, through them, not only the soul ascends towards God, but God too, He descends to the soul. In them, God meets the man.

[940] All the powers of the soul, and therefore the soul's feeling and the soul's aspirations too, they contribute to know God.

elevated as some stairs of God and they are unitarily ordered, consciously composing a united army, allied with the mind, and looking at God. Then you sing with a low voice: "Jerusalem that is being built up, as city whose partakers have been gathered together; there went up the tribes, the tribes of the Lord, witness to Israel" into Christ Jesus, our Lord.

54. About the Same Things.

But it might not be totally inappropriate to add, to the said thing, this one too. If you want to know that it has started to overshadow your soul, the godlike light, out of peace; and if you want to that your soul is a Jerusalem being build up like a city; and if you notice that your soul's partakers are gathered together, namely all the thought and the powers of the soul have come together and they want to be in a unity, in order they not to be a divided city, but to build up the soul united as a city; and if in this Jerusalem that is being built up like a city, are going up the tribes of the Lord, or the more general powers of the soul, which reached to be godlike, and which have become like some stairs; and if you see these things being done within you – then you won't cease building up further, likewise. Remember the tower of the division and about its building up, and remember the tongues' division (Gen. 11: 1-9) and know that not every building is good, even if it seems good from outside.

By speaking, generally, the ones having eyes they see two kinds of buildings and stairs. One of them is done towards good and towards being dwelling place to God. And its sign is that its partakers are gathered together and its tribes are tribes of the lord being elevated into the city, and heralding the soul great and wonderful things, which are causing peace, love, and holiness to the soul, and which are building up the soul.

And the another is being done towards evil and in order to lose the soul. Its non-liar sign is the division of the spiritual tongues and a dreadful disturbance. And the end is that the soul becomes dwelling place to the passions, as the tower became dwelling place to the snakes.

You learn, therefore, the difference between the two buildings and you won't be wrong when wanting to choose the best one of them. If the depths of your heart aren't mastered, from time to time and for many times, by the peace and by the union of your thoughts and by the understanding light; it there doesn't go up, out of seeing God, an untold pleasure within your heart; if there doesn't start, from the innermost chamber of your heart a rekindling and a spiritual work having its ground into a hypostasis[941], so that often seems to you, that you have defeated the body's limbs through an understanding joy and light, and through a deep and mysterious sight coming from above, within your heart; if your soul doesn't spiritually taste untold mysteries; if there doesn't take place within you, unitarily and all of a sudden, an untold joy and an not-understood awe; if you do not receive the holiness of Christ as springing out within you, - then you will know that your soul isn't Jerusalem, neither is your soul being built up like a city, nor your soul's partakers, or the thoughts, are gathered together, neither the tribes, or the general powers, have become tribes of Jesus, nor go up within your soul wonderful and well-ordered things, unveiling to your mind and showing to your mind "the things the eye didn't see and the ear didn't heard and which didn't ascend to the man's heart" (1 Cor. 2: 9). And take heed not to build a division spiritual tower, one having its end in destruction and in dividing the spiritual tongues and in disturbance and in total destruction, as it was said before.

I wanted to say which the cause, for some people have their soul as a city of Jerusalem, being built up, and which the cause is, for the building up and for the destruction of the division's tower; and what are the partakers to the first one gathered together for, and what the reason is that in the division's tower takes place the separation of many kinds, of the tongues. But I have renounced to that, in order to spare the listeners' hearing, through a shorter speech.

55. Interpretation to: "Those ones who were noble from the sunrises" (Job 1: 3).

The noble ones from the sunrises are the ones from the sunrises of the illuminations and of the showings of the righteousness's sun, ennobled and bettered through the looking and through the seeing of the understanding directed towards God; the ones who "are born not out of blood, neither by the man's will, not by the body's will, but from God" (Jn. 1: 19). They are those whose heart and mind live in the godlike palace from heavens and who have been found worthy of having a dialogue with God and who have been imparted with godlike and untold mysteries of the Kingdom. Those are the ones who have become to Christ - the Son of God – limbs in part (1 Cor. 12: 27) and co-bodily to Him and together-inheritors and partakers to Him (Ephes. 3: 6), having Himself and the Father – God from the most high - as their inheritance, for they have reached partakers to the godlike nature (2 Pt. 1: 4), above word. Those are the ones who have been sealed with the Holy and of-like-maker Ghost (Ephes. 1: 13) Whom they are partakers to and Whom they are living and seeing within. Those ones are the ones who have been dressed up in the white vestments (Apoc. 4: 4) characteristic to the Ghost, and in golden tunics, with precious stones and with pearls. Those are the ones wearing helmet and crown and rubies and diamonds and all kinds of precious stones. They are the ones eating and drinking at the Imperial table a food which they cannot get fed of and a nectar which they do not get bored of. This is for all of these things are Ghost, and they are imparted with the spiritual things. Many are the wonders done in those imperial courts. There is a fire that cools down and that is rekindled, there are moving pricking of love, there is a living, speaking water, producer of rivers of eternal life; there is an air of good fragrance when breathed and of-life-giver Ghost and the light of the unitary ray in three glows, but in the same time simple and above-being.

That's why, these ones, as some seers and partaker to great delectations, they have separated themselves from the things from below, and they have been united with the things form above. They have forsaken the seeing of the perishable ones and they have become steadfast in the steadfast things. They sit down on their matting, while there are walking amongst the things from above. Their body ties them and it pulls them downwards, but the Ghost descends and unties the burnt ties. Immediately after they have been untied, they fly above skies with awe and quickness. They have been unified by unitarily looking at God. They are become lonely from all things, by lonely looking at God. They are being moved from a glory to another greater glory (2 Cor. 3: 18) of the Ghost and they are passing from richness to a greater richness and they are delighted with the untold things. And they said: "Good is this richness of the glory and of the delectation", and while looking at it, they were amazed by one greater than the previous ones, and they seemed, to themselves, as empty and poor of all things. They remained amazed, or, better and more appropriately said, they remained with their mouth open due to ecstasy, and another joy engulfed their heart. They follow to the Emperor of the powers and they are dialoging with Him, and they dance with the angels, overwhelmed by the overflows of such a great grace, more than joyful for that untold inheritance and for that untold love for people. These ones are, as far as I reckon, the noble ones from the sunrises of the sun into Christ Jesus, our Lord Whose to be the glory and the mastery forever. Amen.

When the mind unitarily sees the true Christ, then if the time to be silent (Eccl. 3: 7). For this is the time for drinking the nectar of the godlike joy and gladness; this is the time for the mysterious views and for being imparted with the things from above nature. Actually, when the mind limpidly sees the cup in the hand of the Lord, full with the wine of the unmerged merging[942], then the mind contemplates as plainly as possible, the pouring from that one to this one (Ps. 74[943]: 8) and the mind clearly knows that that cup's yeast hasn't been empties (Ps. 74[944]: 8)[945]. This is for the depths of the overpouring of the godlike kindness and, to say so, the depths of the richness and the end of the grace, it won't be unveiled to anybody of us, during the present life of ours, even if a person would have been found worthy of the highest ascension towards God, or worthy of the highest deification. This is for the end and the consummation is kept for everybody to be imparted with it in the future eon. "It hasn't been shown yet, what we are going to be", according to the disciple who leaned his head on Christ's chest [942] This is probably for the Lord's blood is united without merging, with the godhead, as His entire human nature too. The Lord's blood is full of godhead while still not ceasing to be blood according to the nature. Through the priest, the cup gives us Christ Himself, as one can see in some Romanian icons painted on glass, which present Christ as squeezing in the cup the wine of the vine that grows up out of His side. But we need a priest in order to known that aren't ourselves giving that wine to us. And the one giving us that wine must be a priest, or a mediator, for Christ too He is a Priest, or a High Priest, or the supreme Mediator. Consequently, he has to be partaker to Christ's priesthood. We cannot give us that wine by ourselves.

[944] Vid supra.

[945] The pouring from a cup into another it perhaps indicates here the practice from Proskomide, when it is poured wine, from a bottle into a cup, or it might be mentioned here the practice of pouring the wine transformed into blood, from a cup into another, in order to be possible to impart a big number of believers, with it. And this act can mean that, out of Christ's body, His blood passes into the cup, or into the body of the ones whoa re imparted with it, being shown thus that Christ's Ghost of sacrifice and of love remains inexhaustible.

(1 Jn. 3: 2). An according to Saint Paul, "now we know in part" (1 Cor. 13: 9-10), "but then we will know the consummate". This will be, for, then, the sinners will drink together with the righteous, out of the godlike cup of mystery and out of what is consummate, reached, after the mirrors will be taken away and after the truth will be plainly unveiled, to feel the mystery that is now mysteriously covered.

The righteous one, in order they to be able to rejoice, more consummately, of the reward for their hope in God, by receiving the payment for their virtuous deeds, for it has been written about them: "They will get drunk out of the fat of Your house and out of the spring of Your delectation and You will give them to drink" (Ps. 35[946]: 9); about them said the Lord that He will call them into the Father's Kingdom, and that He will serve to them (Lk. 12: 37), after the Lord promised them that they are going to drink also the new cup in God's Kingdom (Mt. 26: 29) and they will be glad. And the sinners will drink in order they to be filled up with the bitterness of the anger, and with the eternal sadness; and the sinners will taste only that much in order they to known what all-sweet nectar they are going to be deprived of, because of their recklessness. To taste that nectar in the present time, we are urged, towards comforting, by David, who says: "Taste and see that good is the Lord" (Ps. 33[947]: 8). But the sinners won't ever turn themselves towards Him. But the ones who turn themselves to Him, by obeying, as it is due, His commandment, and who see the cup and the pouring in that cup, they feel from both sides, both from here and from there, the callings full of benevolent grace[948]; and they drink up and they rejoice themselves and the sweeten the feelings of their soul and the sing, as it is due, songs full of thanksgiving (Eucharistic) to God, by shouting out: "And Your cup is getting us drunk as an almighty" (Ps. 22: 6[949]); or: "And Your non-comprisable mercy, given us now, as out of a deep bosom, as a wine, it will accompany us in all the days of our life" (Ps. 22: 7[950]) – true, namely of the future, steadfast, and immortal life. This is for we are going to forever have the future godlike good things, and we are going to be in them, if we taste, from both sides, the wine of the-life-maker and new cup, that is held in the Lord's hand, and if we drink out of it, daily. So, out of what is shown, they know, in a due manner, what is hidden; and out of what is outpoured, they have the proof of what is at the foundation; and in part, as in an earnest, they can realize what they are going to have in the future.

[946] In KJB we have: Psalm 36: 8-9: "They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house; and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures. // For with thee is the fountain of life: in thy light shall we see light."; in ROB we have: Psalm 35: 8-9: "They will be fed up out of the fat of Your house and out of the spring of Your delectation You will give them to drink. // For at You is the spring of the life, into Your light we will see light." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[948] The pouring from a cup into another, it is to the ones who are imparted, a calling coming from Christ, where the blood flows from, and a calling coming from that cup too, where the blood is flowing to, and where they are imparted from, not only when they are actually imparted with Christ, but permanently, without the sacrifice of Christ, which they are imparted with, to become exhausted.

That's why, by being proven that the righteous will be there imparted with more richly and in a greater number of them, with the things they are imparted since now, while they are nailed into body and in thickness and in the lower darkness, David, rightly so, he didn't said totally plainly that both the righteous ones and the sinner will drink then, but by saying what is questionable,: that maybe the sinner will drink too, he left us understanding what it is recognize and proven: that the righteous will drink. This is because, if the sinner will, maybe, drank, it would be unheard of, the not righteous not to drink. This thing is proven, since they are imparted even from now with so much drink that they gladden themselves and they shout out: "You have gladdened me, Lord, amongst Your creatures, and into the work of Your hands I will rejoice myself" (Ps. 91[951]: 4). This is for, through "the work of His hands", he shows that He holds and He stretches forwards the cup full of the wine of the unmixed mixing, and that He pours that wine with very much love for people into this one (Ps. 74[952]: 8) and He keeps the yeasts for the future. But now they shout out again, being drunk, towards God: "Your cup is getting me drunk, as an almighty" (Ps. 22[953]: 6), in Christ Jesus, and the other things[954].

[949] In KJB we have: Psalm 23: 5. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[950] In KJB we have: Psalm 23: 6. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[951] In KJB we have: Psalm 92: 4. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[952] In KJB we have: Psalm 75: 8. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[953] In KJB we have: Psalm 23: 5. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[954] The Eucharist gets one drunk with the "sober drunkenness" of the enthusiasm born out of encountering Christ into love. This is, rightly so, another reason why, in Eucharist, the wine is used as an element that is transformed in the Lord's blood.

I will sing to You, for You have made me, and I will praise You, the All-High, the One Who has poured over me Your mercies through grace. Your holy finger pricks me, You the All-Loving of soul and Most-Kind Emperor, in the innermost place of my heart (Ps. 71[955]: 18), in order I to know that You are the only One making wonderful and unusual things, and You are moving, as it is due, the letters of Your holy hand in the book of the life, through Your all-godlike Ghost, and You are preparing me for seeing with feeling and for being imprinted through Your hand in the understanding senses, in an actual manner, by Your above-amazement beauty. All the things are full with gladness and with mysterious joyfulness into Christ Jesus, our Lord.

There is a peace, that is more apparent than real. It is that peace of the delighted body, one causing much worry to the soul, even if, for a while, it takes the feigned countenance, of the peace. And there is a peace belonging to the senses, produced by locking the senses up and by running away from all things, one that is followed by quietude. But even this one, though being incomparable better than the first one, it is short lived. This is because, when the soul is troubled by thoughts, the whole human being suffers, as in case the body is troubled. But there is the third peace, one above senses and body. The third peace consists of appeasing the soul's powers and the inward man. That peace comes out of the good behavior and zeal, out of the cleaner prayer, out of the sweeter crying, and out of uttering the godlike words with pleasure.

But this still isn't the consummation of the peace. This is because, as the trumpet player or the guitar player cannot play ceaselessly, because of, by necessarily suffering of his hands' tiredness and some other times because of some helplessness or of some illness, and therefore not being they able to powerfully blow the trumpet or to pick the cords, likewise the soul harmoniously governing its powers, that soul doesn't remain forever unchanged in that state, but sometimes that soul is hindered by some anger, willingly or unwillingly stirred up by something, or by a desire for changing and idleness, because of being one of the creature and being tied to the body's fat and wight. But when the soul receives, by grace, the presence of the uncreated One, and Who has done all the things, and when the soul is imparted with the unchangeable and of-life-maker Ghost, then the soul is filled up with a transfigured and wonderful life, caused by the-life-maker Ghost, and the soul enjoys of an above-nature and totally unchangeable life. And as the soul lives due to the-life-maker-power, likewise the soul sees himself too, for the-life-maker Ghost is luminous light too. And the soul rejoices seeing the above-nature-things of the above-nature One and the soul enjoys the peace that exceeds the whole mind (Philip. 3: 7), due to the work of reinvigoration and due to the above-mind luminous light of the above/mind One, and due to mysteriously rejoicing of things the soul sees.

In this peace, the soul doesn't change himself at all, neither suffers of tiredness, not is disturbed by the traps and plots belonging to the enemy, but the soul looks, in a ceaseless movement, at God and at the things from around God, through the power and the movement, one can even say through the will of God and of the tireless Ghost Who works within heart out of the heart's hypostatical (personal) foundation, not like one or another imagine, but like the only Ghost knows, the Ghost "Who visits and knows the deeps of God" (1 Cor. 2: 10) and Who teaches the ones who are partakers to Him, through a feeling of the soul. So, until we strive to kindle within us, through a quiet living, the grace of the Ghost and we do not quench the grace, and until we are full with the untold and above-nature holiness and peace, of God in Trinity, we truly bear, as it was said, in humbleness, in love, and in prayer, the peace of the body and of the ghost and of the soul, tirelessly[956].

This is because, the peace with tiredness, it still isn't the consummate peace, but it is causing the consummate peace. The consummate one, according to the said things, it is lived totally without tiredness, in the resting of the consummate Sabbath and of the resting into Christ[957].

By finding you out how - after not existing - you have been created, and knowing with a good knowledge the One Who created you and Who composed you, and by understanding the reason of your coming to existence without a previous movement of yours, if you reckon well, you will attach yourself, wholly, with love, with all your senses, to the all-sweet Jesus and God, your Maker and Builder, for the good doing and in order to see His face[958]. This is for, by living thus, into doing and seeing, you will achieve many gifts from God and you will become god and spiritual and wholly alike to the Builder, eternally gladdening yourself together with your Lord and with the Father into the love of God and in that resting into God, through Jesus Christ, forever and ever, by going out of all the seen things. Amen.

[956] The last two paragraphs are very altered in the Greek Philokalia.

[957] The Sabbath is another name for resting, from Saturday (the seventh day), which God rested Himself in, after He created the world (Hebr. 4: 10; Saint Maximos the Confessor, Gnostic Heads II, 64). Here, by talking both about "Sabbath-ism" and about the "resting" into Christ, the author understands, maybe, the resting of God and our resting of the created things, but also the resting of Christ following to the first type of resting, the first type of resting being represented by Saturday, while the second type of resting being represented by Sunday.

56. When I have seen and known, through understanding seeing, where I have come from, in such a wonderful way, and where we are going to reach at in the end, and when I imagine, in the third place, the One Who has brought me to existence and Who carries me and Who will bring me to my end, I understand the untold Father, and His love I no longer unknown to me. Consequently, I somehow look, as in a mirror, at the mystery of His purpose with me. That's why I also gladden myself of these three, in such a measure that somebody couldn't tell. But this so great gladness is sometimes followed by an equally big sadness, because of knowing me without any doubt, as spending my time in a manner that is unworthy of my calling. Then, by seeing how You show me Your unapproachable glory, through creation, and by understanding how You show me Your untold love for me, through the embodiment of Your Only Begotten Son, and by knowing Your untold and above-nature union with me, as You show me this union in an untold and eternally springing out impartation, I wonder very of Your glory and I am amazed of Your mercy on me. This is for, on this way You get me out of all the seen things and You rest me of all thought things, You Holy and above-being Trinity.

God, by all-wisely wanting to create the man, as an angel on earth, and as a heavenly animal, in the godlike image and likeness, He has placed within man, accordingly to that, an understanding soul, a soul able to know God. And that's why He says: "I said, gods you are and all of you children of the Highest" (Ps. 81[959]: 6) through grace, as some second level angels, who quietly contemplate God, and who are being elevated towards [958] We have been created in order to ascend towards the union with Christ, an ascension crossing through two stages: through doing, and through seeing (contemplating).

Him, through love, in spiritual light. But the earthly man won't be able to ascend to the angelic state if he doesn't become, manifestly, a ghost, like the angels are[960]. And that the believer becomes a ghost, by faith, namely out of the endless power and out of the endless gift from God, by somehow being transfigured in a godlike and mysterious creation, it is shown by the Savior when He says that "what is born out of Ghost, it is Ghost" (Jn. 3: 6). And the fact that the ones who have a soul's content, they are born spiritually, it is confessed by the faithful John, saying: "He gave power to become children of God, to them who believe in His name, for He isn't out of the man's blood, neither has Him born out of the body's will, but out of God" (Jn. 1: 14), in order to be the inward man, namely that man in the image of God Who has created him[961]. But this birth isn't according to nature, but it is according to grace, and it is given to the ones who are born spiritually, they receiving it, and not being under their mastery[962]. That's why the mind partaker to this birth, as it is due, that mind is also a throne to the Holy Ghost[963]. This is for, like the heated steel becomes fire too, but it doesn't become fire by nature but by transmission and sharing, until the steel is together with the fire, and it is a chair of the fire, for the fire sits [960] Only the ghost can ascend to the angelic state, for the Angel is ghost too. But this doesn't mean getting rid of body, but it means that the body is overwhelmed by the godlike Ghost. By this, the body forsakes the material needs. The body is now nourished with the angelic bread, namely with the godlike light. The Body has become transparent and weightless. It is like the man no longer would have a body. The body only makes the man capable of understanding the godlike meanings into the material things.

[961] The birth out of ghost, it is a great mystery. It is not like the birth out of body that makes the man also a body; neither it is a creation out of nothing. But it is a getting out of the Ghost, a composition out of Ghost, but it is also an elevation of the man to the state of spiritual man. The Ghost transfigured the man through His energies. The man is like the Ghost when reaching this state, but he still differs from the Ghost by the fact that he hasn't elevated himself and he doesn't maintain himself in this state by himself, but through the Ghost. The man is firstly born out of body; then God gives the man birth into Christ, out of Himself, and making the man like Him. But some birth out of Himself, after the creation out of nothing (after the first birth on earth), was done by God, to the man, right in the beginning.

[962] The birth out of Ghost, by not being a birth according to the nature, but by being a birth by grace, it doesn't take place except with the will of both the man and the Ghost. As such, this birth doesn't stay in the man's power, without the Ghost's will. The new life is born through the freedom of both of them, and it is being maintained on the freedom's place. The man isn't in a natural, necessary relation with the Ghost.

[963] Not being created out of the Ghost, by nature, the man isn't only son of the Ghost by grace, but the man is also a throne of the Ghost, namely differing by nature, and subordinated to the Ghost. The throne, or the place which the Emperor sits on, it is less than the Emperor is, but is shares the Emperor's glory.

and rests within steel, likewise the mind becomes ghost and throne of the Ghost, by birth out of Ghost, or by union with the Ghost and by being imparted by the Ghost, God manifestly engulfing the mind and uniting Himself with the mind and resting Himself within the man's mind like in a chair.

And this is the wonderful beginning of the soul's advancing not towards the level of the angel, of the humblest one amongst the heavenly powers, but towards the level of the All-High God, in order to descend, after, to that level of the chair, and then to that of the cherub, and then to that of the seraphim, and from here until entirely achieves the angel's feature, that one of the humblest amongst levels, and announcing his neighbors, into Ghost, about the wonders and the mysteries of God. This is for, if the impartation – according to the wise ones in the godlike things – it must precede the transmission, it is limpid that the mind must firstly be imparted by the Ghost, namely the mind must become chair (throne) to the Ghost, and then to transmit the spiritual things[964], and then to become cherub by Ghost, and that means the overflowing and the multitude of the godlike wisdom; and then the mind to want to make other people wise, by serving like a seraphim, as one that, by knowing the wisdom and through the cup and through the drink of the wisdom, it has reached the fiery and ceaselessly moving love of God – for that is the interpretation of the name

[964] The soul reaches, firstly, through deification, at God, and then it descends, on at a time, to the angelic levels. The first one is the direct impartation by God, and then comes the transmission of the things received from God, to all the angelic groups. The vision of Dionysus the Areopagite about the Angels as mediators of the godlike light towards the people, it is completed here, or it is explained, through an alternative vision. Of course, the question remains: it doesn't take place, the same process, with the lower levels of Angels? And if so, aren't they imparted by God, before us, in order they not to need to know God through the deified man? Or, don't they communicate, out of their direct impartation with the godlike light, to the groups of angels from the superior levels? Maybe the answer, to the extend it concerns the man, it consists of the fact that the man, a being united with a body, he can know God in a special manner, and the Angels can add to their knowledge the knowledge they receive through the deified man. The man can know, or he can understand God, into the God's embodied Son, in a manner inaccessible to the Angels. This is for the God's wisdom is on many kinds; one of these kinds, maybe the most wonderful of them, it has been shown into Christ. And this wisdom is known by the people within Church. And the angels know this especially through the people (Ephes. 3: 10). The elevated one, he descends to the Angels, in order to herald, to the angels, as a man, the God's things. But he descends lower too, to the people, in order to herald them, as he would have been an angel, the God's things. The one elevated to the impartation by God, he receives a missionary role. The culminant example is to us, in this regard: Christ.

seraphim -, so that to warm up and to kindle others towards the love for God; and then to continue on this way, coming to the level of teaching his neighbor – that level being characteristic to the angel. That's why, the ones who haven't reached to be gods by Ghost and chairs to God and cherubs and seraphs and the other lowers spiritual levels, they neither could not be angels, by themselves, and they couldn't serve God, nor to teach the due things, in Ghost and truth. That's why, the true advancing of the soul, it takes its beginning from the impartation by the All-High God, and, as it has been said, likewise, the soul advances into Christ Jesus, our Lord[965].

I will confess to You, untold Lord into Trinity, not the things characteristic to you, but those things characteristic to me, as much as that is possible to me. This is for, You, the untold one, together with Your things, are extolled, by infinitely being above any word and mind wanting to understand You, or to speak about You. This is for You have created me, by Your decision, a decision above any greatness, and I am unlike anything else; You have created me with Yor hands You have created me in Your image and likeness. And I, by making myself vain in all these so great and so honored and so glorified gifts, I proved myself as immeasurable ungrateful, by disregarding Your commandments, which also are holy and producing peace, and true joy, and deifying power. And what is even more wonderful, it is that before bringing me to existence, You have built up, for me and for my life and in order I to see and to know You, and in order I to be overwhelmingly delighted with the things from around You, the world of such a great beauty and glory, richly and diversely adorned, with creator power and wisdom, which the world couldn't lasted without, even for a moment. And through the world I live and I bodily thrive, for I feed myself through the world, and I enjoy the world; but I also thrive spiritually, for I know through the world, by contemplating, full of awe, the all-wise and the almighty torrent of Your care and of Your love.

[965] The soul is firstly elevated on the level where Christ has been elevated at, ad then the soul commits, at his turn, a road of the kenosis, of descending together with Christ, for Christ doesn't remain only up there and receiving worshipping, but Christ descends, in an unseen manner, and He works for elevating other and other souls who believe in Him, through His teaching and Mysteries. In Christ there isn't only the elevation of the man to God, but there is also His kenosis or descent, in order to serve.

These things have been created by You, the untold One. And I, the mindless ones, I have wasted my life resisting Your commandments, which are truly sweet and worthy of love, to the ones who are in a right mind. Woe to you, insensible soul! Woe, what a callousness! Don't you reckon, you the wicked one, that only in order to bodily life a mortal life, the poor servant obeys the master and he abundantly accomplishes the master's commandments, even if some of those commandments are difficult to accomplish? And those commandments aren't beneficial to him, but to the one who has ordered them. And you, the mindless one, unworthily disregarding the commandments of such a Creator, Benefactor, and Nourisher, though these commandments are issued for your benefit and for your immortal glory, you turn them up side down. I am terrified of your shamelessness and your eternal damnation!

I have said, Lord, to my poor and truly sinner soul, to Your creature, You the All-Loving of souls, when you have turned myself towards You, the All-Good, my untold joy: you have many spiritual good things, my soul! Drink, eat, and gladden yourself (cf. Lk. 12: 19). And when my sinner soul rebelled against You, I have been tormented and very humiliated (Ps. 37[966]: 8). But, o, richness of Your kindness, You the All-Good! When I wrongly deviated from Your right path, and from good, You, by coming in a wonderful manner, through non-comprisable gifts, You have turned me back again. And by truly eating and drinking, and, by them, rejoicing myself spiritually, as it is due, I have got far, again, for many times, from Your mercy, rolling myself down, I do not know, because of the devil's plot or because of my inattention, or maybe because of both of them, or it might be also because of a deeper judgment of Yours, out of which come the lenience, the forsaking, and the rebuking, teaching me in a diverse manner[967].

And again, for many times, I sank myself in a deep mud, where there wasn't a strong foundation (Ps. 68[968]: 2)[969]. Thus, I have become wicked and I have bent myself, because of being

[966] In KJB we have: Psalm 38: 8. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[967] About these things speaks Diadochus of Photice, head no. 94: The Romanian Philokalia, volume I, p. 385.

[968] In KJB we have: Psalm 69: 2. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[969] "υπόστασις" – a base, which not to let me sinking lowers. The evilness has no limit. God alone, better said Christ, He has made Himself the "hypostasis" or the base of the humanity of all the ones who believe in Him.

pricked by the thorn, or by the sin's bringing of death needle and, in short, by the many evil things cunningly plotted to me, by the enemy, against my soul, because of my terrifying carelessness and because of my appalling insanity.

You have never overlooked me, to the end, but with spiritual voice You shouted out in my heart's mysterious depth[970], and You said to my discouraged soul: "I am your salvation" (Ps. 34[971]: 3), do not fear, but turn back to your resting, and do not wander. And so, You have comforted me, Jesus, for You do not remember the evil, but You have made Yourself to me, manifestly, support towards salvation. And like a right hand of the Father, You have caught me powerfully, and Your advising rebuke, it guided me again (Ps. 17[972]: 39), as so many times before, towards that great joy for so many untold mysteries. Come, therefore, You Word of God, within my heart, as a strong seal, in order I to see the untold and above-nature light! Come in my arms, in order I to be able to work the deeds of Your holy and of-life-maker commandments! Come, Jesus Christ, above-skies Emperor, come in order I to spiritually live into You! Come closer, through a pleasant feeling, to me, for I turn myself to You with the whole my soul, for You are the above-world gladness of the ones whom You dwell within. Shine Your brightness within me, like a lightning! Come, You the infinite One in wisdom, in order my soul to gather to himself, and by this, to You![973] "And to be scattered and to get far from me the ones who vainly are enemies to my soul" (Ps. 3: 8) and who persecute me and who mercilessly torment me. "Guar me, Lord, I pray You, always, as the apple of the eye" (Ps. 16[974]: 8), in [970] The expression: "God shouts out in the man's conscience" it isn't only a metaphor. Actually, God shout out in the man's depth even when the man has rolled himself down in sins. The man hears this voice and he must answer it. Even if the man's answer is negative, it still is an answer. Through the negative answer the man doesn't escape from God; the man cannot make it be silent.

[971] In KJB we have: Psalm 35: 3. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[972] In KJB we have: Psalm 18: 35. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[973] As for so many times before in the spiritual writings, it is said here too, that the gathering of the soul to himself, it means, in the same time, the soul's gathering into God. This is for, the gathering into himself it means the man's coming to the self-awareness, by asking himself about his ultimate reason and purpose. And then, the soul cannot but find God as his ultimate reason and purpose. Then the soul hears the voice of God, which was covered before, by the scattering in all sort of external sand unessential occupations.

[974] In KJB we have: Psalm 17: 8. (E. l. t.'s n.)

order I to eternally look at You, together with You[975], You the Extolled and Untold Lord.

57. What am I - Lord, You Who are uncreated – except dust and ashes (Gen. 18: 27)? And what my times is, for my time is that of the one who passes like a shadow and as a short dream, before You, Who are the without beginning One, in Whose eyes a thousand years are like yesterday that passed, and like a watch in the night (Ps. 89[976]: 4)? And what my wisdom is at You, for You have wisely created the skies and the earth and all the things on earth, in the same time and on the same instant, for I to stay before You, You the All-Loving of the soul, in order I to answer to You? No, Master, please don't! The parents do not take rewards from the newly born children for the things they have done to them, neither they ask for some deed, but they take care, simply, lovingly, and zealously, in a worthy to be praised manner, of their duties, nourishing their children as well as they can and dressing them up. That's why, You too, Saint, eternal Father and All-Loving of us, as the One Who is the Maker of all of us, out of nothing, I pray You not to be upset because of my mistakes and because of my lawlessness, neither You to ask, You the One loving of people, from me, deeds to the extent of Your grace. No, you the All-Good One, no! But, as it is appropriate to be the little children forgiven, likewise and much more and endlessly more, please forgive my deeds and multiply Your righteous gift within me, for I need Your help, because I am weak in my understanding. For You are the One Who has created me and who has built me up anew, You the All-Praised One, on an all-good purpose, that since You have made me kind, and since You have adorned me with the deifier beauties, as a true image of Yours, You to glorify me in a bright and all-high manner. For You haven't come to judge, but to save the world (Jn. 3: 17). Amen.

58. Being I condemned but itself my thought, as Yourself know, Lord, the things from within me, please see that I don't [975] Only if the Ghost Himself is within us looking at the Lord, we too, are able to look at the Lord into the Ghost. This is for the Ghost's work of looking at God, it becomes our looking too. Only if the One who know to see Himself, is with us, and only if He conveys us, in a loving manner, His power for seeing, we will be able to see the Lord, together with the Ghost. This takes place even in the human relations.

need, You the All-Wise One, any other judge to judge me. Your judgment is being done righteously, in the doubtful things. But when the one who resists, he has truly condemned on himself, and he sees and he confesses no by simply saying that he is a sinner, but by admitting that he commits sins say by day and hour by hour, please spare him, Lord, You the One loving of people, of his judgment. I search for mercy and I ask for grace, from You, for You are the Source of the mercy and of the grace! You are the One Who has deigned to make Yourself man, for me. You are the One who, out of the abundance of Your kindness, You do to us not according to our lawlessness, and, out of Your overwhelming love for us, You do not reward us according to our sins (Ps. 102[977]: 10), but, please rather let Yourself conquered by the love characteristic to You, and remove from us our lawlessness, as far as the sunrises are from sunsets. Therefore, I am praying You, Lord Jesus Christ, Who do not remember our evil, You the All-Merciful Master, and I ask You, though unworthily, to You the One who forgives the whole lawlessness and all my sins, please place within my heart the consummate seal and the truly holy gift of Your All-Holy Ghost, by Your power and wisdom, for by being these things done, as much as it is possible, through the power of Your grace, with spiritual wisdom and sapience, what is pleasant to You, to flow again within my heart those spiritual rivers of Your righteous wisdom, and let me be in the understanding of the truth and in a light according to it. Make me be hence, in partaking with You and with Your things, and illuminate for ever and ever - but even since now – by Your above/glory light, through Your unimaginable mercy and by Your untold grace. Amen.

59. Nobody knew, more limpidly, the plot, or, if I have to say so, the devilish personal attack, except the one who has got rid of devils and who has been delivered, for a while, of their attacks. And nobody will escape those attacks and nobody will be delivered from them, as I just have said, if he doesn't achieve within his heart the godlike influence and breath, from God as Person[978]. And this is born out of that faith that is accompanied by humbleness and by the working love for God and for people, through the living into quietude, together with taking vigil, through the here working reading, and the here seeing reading – and therefore cogitating at God, and through prayer. And the working love it can be called here, truly, the fulfilling, as much as it is possible, of the holy commandments of God. Out of these commandments it is born, thus, not only a cleaner and more transparent understanding of God, but it also comes within soul the detailed knowledge and the limpid discernment of the devilish and contriving evil plots. This is for, the greater is the ascesis, the bigger is the war waged against us, by the envious devils, furiously and overwhelmingly and breathtakingly coming upon us, in order to pursuit all sorts of cunning torments, to the God bearer soul. So that, if Christ, the Savior of His people, He hadn't stayed close, with His love for people, and if He hadn't fought for believers, then, truly, no man would have been saved, even if he would have been a saint.

[978] I have translated here through "personal attack" and "breath form God as Person", the expressions προσβολην ενυποστάτως and ροπή ενυπόστατον, the first one starting from the devil's hypostasis, while the second one starts from the Hypostasis of God.

60. I have known as limpidly as possible, and I am confessing it to You, Lord, that, because of my inattention, because of my ingratitude, and because of my recklessly working, I have become, dreadfully, worse than the speechless beasts, I, the speaking one. This is because those ones they preserve their nature and they live according to their nature, but I haven't known yet, not even for a moment, what really is the clean work of my nature, because of the abomination of my unclean passions, and because of my addiction to the perishable things and because of the disturbance caused by them to me. That's why, being I dumb in my mind, I do not know my nature, as it is, or as it truly must be. And I have let myself caught in the devilish company in order to commit the evil. And I truly am worse that those ones in my decisions. This is because, if I had been like those ones, unsubmitted to the sickness and immortal and not needing anything in order to live, I would have been, doubtlessly, eviler, I, the wicked one, and more intemperate in my insane impulses. But, behold, though I'm not immortal, and even if I am subjected to often and long sicknesses, I still am committing sins, and I enjoy my sins and I plan them. And what is even worse, it is that I do not tend only towards one evil things, while avoiding the others, as one of those ones. This is because one of those ones causes the love for money, other the love for vain glory, other the love for pleasure, and other the love for some other passions, or, better said, towards one of the passions, of the ones who let themselves be convince by him. But I love all the passions and I commit all the sins. And I do that in such an addicted manner, so that even if I am not moved or tempted by the devils from outside, I will still move myself towards passions, or I even fall into sins, in a pitiful manner. Because of this, even if I haven't committed some of the sins, that has happened not for I have willingly avoided them, or for I specifically haven't wanted them, but I haven't committed them because of not being able to do so. Behold that I really am, therefore, much worse than those ones are. This is for those ones, though being immortal and free of sicknesses and needing nothing in order to survive, they still don't incline, any one of them, towards more than a sole sort of sins. But I, whose days aren't only a few, but they are burdened with sicknesses too, and with helplessness and with hardships, I still am tending towards all sins and I am ready to commit them with the whole zeal. I truly am worse than the devils are.

But, Lord, Lord, You the immeasurable One in His mercy, and Who wants, by nature, our salvation, so that You wouldn't have keep in Your memory even the devil's evilness, if they had wanted to repent, please strengthen me with wisdom and with all the due things, in order I to repent myself appropriately, for the sins I have committed, and please turn, mercifully, Your All-Holy face, Lord, You who are happy life and above-nature life and the steadfast and above-world joy, to the righteous ones, the immeasurable love for the people and the untold mercifulness. Please do to my thought that is shouting out" "Have mercy on me, You Who are easy to be reconciled", Your great and wonderful mercy, in order to be shone to the ones who know it that even on the devils, if they had turned and said "Have mercy on me", to Your infinite kindness, as they are, You wouldn't have banished them away from Your mercy and You wouldn't have removed them away, You Who are the Source of the charismas. This is for, on me, who I am worse than those ones and more reckless than the speechless beasts, You are able to have mercy on me, then there truly won't be any man, nor demon, who, by falling down to Your feet, and shouting out "Have mercy on me", he wouldn't have immediately found the abundance of Your infinite kindness, and rich and wonderful and above all hopes: mercy. Have mercy on me, Jesus, Who are both our Creator and the Source of the mercy.

61. Many things come to my mind, Lord. But there is nothing that I could surely understand, up to the end. There isn't in all of them a sole thing that I know without any shortcoming in my knowledge. By this I am proven as helpless in knowing something as it is due, and clearly and simply and fully. I truly see this sky and this earth. But what those ones are like, or Who has created them and how they are upheld and all the other many things about them, and their nature, I obviously do not know. I can easily point out the air, the water, and the fire, to the ones wanting that. But what is the nature of each one like, who could tell it? And how one tends upwards and another downwards, and the air all over the place, nobody could open his mouth in order to describe that, and nobody could mumble even one word. But I pass over these, because of not knowing what to say. The hair, that is seemingly the most insignificant things, as one that cannot be caught with our senses, what it is coming out from, and how? What all the hairs appear in time like and according to what order? And what we know about the hairs, what are they?

For all these things, please, Lord, deliver me from the imagination's thoughts, which I blame my neighbor with, and which I judge all things and I condemn everybody with. Cover me with Your strong arm, for my mind is weak and very blunt, in order to think about these. Who know the sky's, and the earth's measures, and their size and their weight? Who knows the so quick and ceaseless and so masterly done and so regularly passing of the sun on the sky? Who will understand the power carrying all of these so wisely? How could know all of these the ones who doesn't have not even the knowledge of a mosquito? Being I so deprived of understanding and of the wisdom's power, I cannot rely myself except on Your grace, when speaking about godhead and about that above-nature union with God, through the godlike work characteristic to Him, and through the understanding given by Him, as much as it is possible to me.

62. Only those who have received the spiritual feeling through that understanding out of grace, only those can understand the ones who haven't achieved yet the spiritual feeling; for they are led by their souls through limpid and clear sounds, towards the happening things. This is for one like these, he can discern all things, according to Saint Paul, while not being judged by anyone else (1 Cor. 2: 15). This is because the ones who are thus, they not only do not see the absence of the godlike Ghost, but they even bless sometimes, because of their lack of understanding, the ones who are rather worthy of compassion, because they haven't received the feeling of the Ghost by grace, but they are rather carries away by the world's ghost and they are "soul-like"[979], as the godlike word calls them (1 Cor. 2: 14). And the spiritual in their feeling and kindled by the godlike fire, they do not judge at all the things, in a hurry, or according to their seen side, as the many do. But they judge the things according to the unchangeable and eternal truth from within themselves, for they are surely taught by the-like-maker and illuminating Ghost Who gives as a gift, to the ones who He dwells within, another life than the usual life, an above-nature life, and a light and a knowledge differing from the one provided by eyes to the many.

Alike was Jacob the Patriarch, who, after changing his place for many times, then he remained in a unique place, but he saw there many things with the eye of the understanding and he said many wonderful things about his sons (Gen. 49: 1, 5). Alike was Isaiah, the most powerful in word amongst prophets. This is for, by seeing him Jesus brought like a lamb to be slaughtered (Isa. 53: 7), he wasn't deceived either by Christ's sufferance or by His humbleness and behavior, but he saw, mysteriously, in those things, with the eye of the understanding, Christ's glory, as it is due; despite seeing Jesus lacking His glory (Isa. 53: 3) and subjected to other sufferings, Isaiah still confessed Jesus's godhead. Alike it was, to say so, each one amongst the holy prophets, who believed with understanding the spiritual things, through the illumination of the Ghost.

The one who wants to easily know the ones having within them the world's ghost, or, better said, the ones carried away by the world's ghost, let them remember about the group of the [979] Here we are dealing with a conceptual/semantical/semiotic void, hindering this translation, so we have employed here the coinage/rhetorical catachresis. In the Orthodox theology, there are three levels the which the human person can be on: the bodily level, the soul-like level, and the spiritual (the ghost's) level. Actually, the ghost's level is translated as the spiritual level only by operating the ghost/spirit analogy, one that is quite unsatisfactory. Roughly speaking, the bodily person is rather an atheist, the soul-like person, though not an evil person, is a non-practicing believer, while the spiritual person has started and advance in the good fight for working the godlike commandments. We think that the locution: "soul-like man", it could be described by using the locution: "the man who doesn't have his soul spiritually developed" (E. l. t.'s n.).

scribes and of the Pharisees from the Gospel, as they were occupying themselves with the apparently good things, and they passionately valued the good-looking things, and they were craving with the whole power of their souls, for being called as "teachers" for their way of walking and for their pious countenance, and they only aimed to fit an image to themselves and to hypocritically praise their virtuous life (cf. Mt. 23: 3-4). That's why, woe what a blindness! They condemned Jesus Christ to death, the All-True Son of God Who is above all things, because of their envy born within them by the worldly ghosts; they condemned to death, the godlike and true life.

This is for, if the Holy Ghost doesn't' speak within us, as it has been said, out of envy (Jas. 4: 5), it is obvious that the world's ghost speaks out of envy and that's why it judges unfairly and into darkening. That's why will be cut (Apoc. 1: 7), as it has been written, at the time of the general judgment done by God and they will weep for themselves – and rightly so – for their state. Because they will see the One Whom they crucified (Jn. 19: 37) and they will ask with bewilderment, saying: "Isn't This One, the One Whom we reckoned as nothing and Whose life we reckoned as insanity? How then was Him appointed amongst the sons of God?" (The Book of the Wisdom of Solomon[980] 5: 4-5). This is because, becoming a mockery the darkness of the self-appreciation brought by the worldly ghost, and awfully stumbling, they weren't able to recognize the truth and to walk in His traces, as ones having the right mind and the illuminating Ghost.

And about the spiritual people, Paul says: "Don't you know that we are going to judge the angels? All the more the things necessary to the life" (1 Cor. 6: 3). Thus, the one having the Ghost, he can judge all things (1 Cor. 2: 15), but, as the Lor says, the world cannot receive that one, neither see him (Jn. 14: 17). So, all the one who haven't put on, through the true feeling of the soul, the Holy and above-skies Ghost, neither they have This One working within them in the untold things, mysteriously, and telling the things impossible to tell, they are proven as having the worldly ghost. "And you, says Paul, you won't be into body, but you will be into Ghost, if the Ghost of God dwells within you. And if somebody doesn't have the Ghost of Christ, that one won't belong to Christ" (Rom. 8: 9).

Do you see now, that the ones having the Ghost within them, they aren't bodily? And that the ones who lack Him, they not only that they are incapable to judge rightly in the godlike things, but neither they can belong to Christ? "And we haven't taken the world's ghost, but that Ghost from God, in order to see the things given us like gifts, by God" (1 Cor. 2: 12). Do you understand that the godlike things and the truth, they cannot be known except by the ones who have received the Ghost of God? This is because, as the Lord said: "When That One will come, the Ghost of the Truth, He will lead you to the whole truth" (Jn. 16: 13). Do you see now, where the whole truth spring out from, and therefore the sure and free of sin judgment?

That's why, the Holy Ghost is called as the Ghost of the council, the Ghost of the science, of the understanding, and of the wisdom (Isa. 11: 2), the mastering Ghost (Ps. 50[981]: 14), the righteous Ghost (Ps. 50[982]: 12), the Ghost of the truth (Jn. 14: 17), and Isaias called Him as" the Ghost of the judgment" (Isa. 4: 4). This is for in Him the soul is directly brought to the things necessary to be said, and because by working Him thus within soul, all the things are judged as it is due, given the soul is partaker to the Ghost. But, without the Ghost, all the things are full of darkness and empty of truth. And the one who is empty of truth, he will consequently be wrong in the things he says too. That one, when trying to judge, he will choose the liar things and he won't meet the truth. "This is, he says, for nobody knows the another's things, except the Ghost Who dwells within him" (1 Cor. 2: 11). "This is for the Ghost searched all things" (1 Cor. 2: 12). If one had been able to find the truth without the Ghost, the Holy Ghost wouldn't have been called the Ghost of the truth, the Ghost of the judgment, and all the other names mentioned before. So, if the one who judges without the Ghost of the truth speaks, he will be the upholder of the lie, by contriving what doesn't' exist and, shortly speaking, he will fall off the truth and he will willingly get himself away from the will of God and from the glory of God; and he will be cut, justly so, as one that judges and who hastily speaks against the truth, thus selling the righteousness because he lacks the understanding, as another

Judah. Because that one too, for three times, was condemned for that reason, because he sold the righteousness and the truth, inappropriately, namely he sold our Lord Jesus Christ, the One sent by the Father as righteousness and Who called on himself as the truth (Jn. 14: 6).

You wicked and blind Pharisee, empty of the Ghost Who illuminates the understanding eyes of the soul! You hurry to judge, with pride, and wrongly, the things shown within man, like the ones who, by seeing wonderful resurrections of dead people and thousands of godlike signs, which Jesus, as a true God, He worked them only with His word, instead of praising Him and of extolling Him and to believe in Him, they got very upset and angry because of the very wise and of-people-loving release of the Sabbath, and because the disciples of the Bridegroom weren't fasting (Mt. 9: 16). You insane Pharisee and mindless and full of darkness! You want to correct the source of the wisdom and of the wonderful and untold gifts and, by overlooking the deeds of such a great power, and you consider them as unimportant, because of being they committed according to a judgment that you cannot understand. How clumsy and nescient and insensible you are! You inappropriately stumble, in an undue manner, upon the things that are nothing, as one would say, and you do not wonder yourself, as it is due, about the all-great deeds committed, and not glorifying and not praising, as much as it is possible, the One Who worked those deeds. Come, humbly, close to This One and sincerely ask Him for you to be given the reason of releasing the things you reckon as overlooked, contrary to the custom.

So, the worst thing of all, it is, as one can see, the self-appreciation and the cunningness following to that. One like this, he is as darken as he reckons that he is knowledgeable, and he is as mindless as he doesn't know his nescience.

And again, woe to you, you blind Pharisee, because you do not search the inside of the cup, in order to see if it is clean, but you imagine that it is necessary to commit and to see the outside and seen cleanness (Mt. 23: 26). Don't you hear what Christ, the true Wisdom, He commands us about judgment? This is for He says: "Do not judge as you see, but judge according to the righteous judgment" (Jn. 7: 24). Don't you understand that one cannot judge righteously, neither one can utter right judgment, according to what is shown? Because this means "as you see". How then, you the insensitive, by not fearing the commandment of the Father and by not understanding that not what one sees is the true man and not out of what is seen, the man has to be judged, you behave shamelessly instead of hiding yourself? But it is natural to you to do so. This is because, being you deprived of the true life of the light, of the wisdom, of the truth, and of the knowledge coming from Him, and of the other good things coming from and which we are imparted with, by the Ghost, not only that you cannot judge without being wrong, the things of others, but nor you can see yourself as wallowing into evilness. Pull out, if you want to listen to me, the beam from your eye, namely the self-appreciation from your mind, and then you will be able to intuit, as it is due, so that you will be able to cross through the chaff, or through the sin attached, because of a kidnapping and because of a forgetfulness, to your neighbor's eye (Mt. 7: 5). But, until your inward eye, it doesn't see the light known with the mind, it is proven that the darkness from within you it is caused by the beam stuck into your eye.

That's why, do not affirm the things characteristic only to the illuminated ones, before searching on yourself with the whole skillfulness, and before banishing away the whole evilness from yourself. This is because, by doing otherwise, you become the mockery of the devils and of the insanity's passions. That's why, this deed is a very wrong one, and the impulse towards it, it is a very dangerous one. Let them speak and judge, therefore, the ones who are delivered by the Lord, as the blessed David advises us: "They whom the Lord has delivered from the hand of the enemies" (Ps. 106[983]: 2), the knowledgeable in their mind, and "whom He has gathered from countries", namely out of the passionate and unsatisfied and much diverse habits, by uniting them with His glory. Let these ones speak and judge, for they have been gathered and united an illuminated, as ones who have been delivered and saved[984].

But you, therefore, until you aren't as I said, full of the spiritual light, make sure yourself, in silence, and do not fear to confess that you rather want to learn and that you do not know, for that is a reason for salvation, and not for perdition. This is [984] The ones whoa re united through love, they no longer judge each other. That's why, let no one judge others, before he has achieved the love for others. One can see that that one won't judge them anymore.

for, what Christ won't shame you for, for He says: "I do not judge anybody" (Jn. 8: 15)? And what do you say? "I judge everybody". O, what a nescience, not to say insensitiveness! "The Father has given the whole judgment to the Son" (Jn. 5: 22). The Son has taken the work of the judgment from the Father. And where do you have it from, because you haven't been given it? Does the Trinity dwell and manifestly walking within you, according to the promise (2 Cor. 6: 16)? Do you see yourself into God-the Word and do you see God-the Word within you? Or within God? Do the rives of the Holy Ghost flow within you, or do those rivers springing out of the unapproachable light within your heart? Or, do work within your all the things worked by God, manifestly, in His saints? Don't' you still have a long road to reach there?

Stop, therefore, your tongue from evil, and your lips from speaking cunningness (Ps. 33: 12). Search for, and ask others, and carefully learn from them, and do not teach others; and being judged by others, do not speak yourself, neither you judge by any means. One must be very stupid in order to imagine that, by being blind, he can search the things written in books. But it is much more stupid the one who imagine that he can know without the living Ghost, the another's things. One like this one, he doesn't exactly know even his own things, as they are.

But these are plots and temptations from the cunning and envious and of-good-hater devil, manifestly started against us, because we have filled ourselves with cunningness due to our self-appreciation, and because of letting us be convinced, inappropriately, to proceed judging. By this the enemy wants us to inexperiencedly stumble, and we to unfortunately mistake against the truth and instead of getting close to the truth and of knowing the truth, we to not benefit anything, and to become reasons for offence, not only to us but also to our neighbors, and, with this, subjected to the fearsome judgment of God. Therefore, by knowing the plot of the devil and by listening the commandments of great Paul, let's not judge before the due time (1 Cor. 4: 5), when the Lord will come to us into Ghost, in order to illuminate us and to unveil us the deep things, by teaching us, without mistake, the knowledge and the unveiling of the godlike views, and of the mysterious things. Thus, we will be shown by Him, in un undeceiving manner, as spiritual and bearers of God, or, better said, as gods, and He will guide us towards glory and he will restore us in the foreseeing grace. Then we will see, cleanly, what evil the will of judging others it can take us to, when we are emptied of the grace of Christ. But then too, we will judge non-mistakenly and into righteousness.

63. God made Israel worthy, since the beginning, of help and of much and wonderful sheltering and He has chosen Israel as par of His inheritance, out of all people. But the greatly helping and protective things, done by God to the ones who believe in Christ, those things exceed the things done to Israel, as much as the soul exceeds the body; and as much these ones cover those ones, as much the sun cover the stars. Better said, as much our things exceed the Israel's things, as much the body exceeds its shadow. This is because those ones truly are the shadow of our things, if somebody wants to know that. There you see Pharaoh, the bitter and merciless despot, and his harsh supervisors, bearing the image of satan and of his army, which do not bring relentless bodily oppressions, but they zealously and tirelessly torment the soul. Moses led there the people of God (Exod. 3: 10). At us, how overwhelmingly! Himself the Son and the true Word of Hypostatical God, He exceeds much and endlessly the letter of the law. There is the staff (Exod. 7: 9, 20; 8: 1-2), while here is the cross (Mt. 27: 32). There is the wood, wonderfully transformed into a snake, and swallowing the other snakes (Exod. 7: 12), while here is the cross, the evilness's tool, used by such a great kindness, and shown, through a certain transformation, as killing the devils. There the Egypt is rubbed of gold, of silver, and of the adornment of other vestments (Exod. 12: 35-36). But we hiddenly do this too, withing our mind, by bringing again, to God, our beauty liberated from sin. There were the fire pillar and the cloud leading Israel directly to the sea (Exod. 13: 21); here is the seeing of God and His fiery love, leading the non-liar and seer of ceaseless tears mind, which the whole enmity is destroyed and killed within, until the mind got out of the passions' slavery, as then were lost, wonderfully, the servants of Pharaoh and the Pharaoh himself into the sea, after the sea was crossed by Jews (Exod. 14: 28). And shortly peaking, if somebody wanted to look at and to see all the things done to the Jews back then, he would find out those things as shadows and images of the things which are being committed now to the true believers.

And the ones who wants to know the difference between our things and those belonging to the Jews, more shortly and more limpidly, let him thing at the preaching of the old law, and that one of the new law, and he won't be wrong. The first law speaks about creatures, namely about the seen things, done by God, in the beginning. This is because it is said: "God made the sky and the earth and the other things". The preaching of the new law doesn't speak only about the things submitted to the senses, but it also speaks about the things known with the mind, or better said, about the uncreated things known with the mind, as for instance: "In the beginning, there was the Word and the Word was at God and the Word was God" (Jn. 1: 1). The Jews' law says: "God said: let's make man in our image and likeness" (Gen. 1: 26). Ours says: "And the Word made Himself body and dwelled amongst us" (Jn. 1: 14). That one says: "Let him mastering upon the sea's fish and upon the fowls of the sky and upon the beats, and upon the whole earth" (Gen. 1: 26). But our says: "And out of His fullness all of us have taken" (Jn. 1: 16). In that one it is said: "God said: let there be light" (Gen. 1: 3), in ours it is said: "For God Who said: let the light lighten into darkness, He has lightened our hearts" (2 Cor. 4: 6).

Therefore, the one who takes heed to the said things, namely to both preaching, he will limpidly understand how much our good things exceed and overwhelm the ones belonging to the old law, and he will say that those ones are shadow and image in comparison to our truth, namely the truth of Christ. And he will praise and he will extol the grace and the taking of care from God Who elevated our nature from shadow and image to the above-being mercy of His above-world kindness into Jesus Christ, our Lord.

64. God lets Himself, for His love for people, to be caught by any understanding sense.

O, You All-Holy Hypostatical Word and Wisdom and Power of God (1 Cor. 1: 24)! How will I praise You, Lord, for Your being and glory is unapproachable? How will I extol Your infinite kindness, because I am a human being and I bear a limited mind?[985] But I am going to praise, I will extol the things which I am able to reach to. Thus, I will come form any direction to the [985] He said before that the mind is borderless and indefinite. This contradiction can be reconciled by the fact that the human mind can infinitely extend, namely it never ends extending, in order to comprise as much as it is possible out of God Who never ceases giving Himself to the mind, as a gift, and increasingly more. But just because of that, the mind won't ever reach being endless in act, like God is, because it that had been the case, the mind wouldn't have had anything more to receive from God.

feeling of Your glory and kindness and my soul - with the whole power – will attach to You (Ps. 62[986]: 8). And thus hearing You, I will truly fear and I will get out from all things, into You, according to the Prophet who said: "I heard, Lord, Your hearing[987] and I got scared; I understood Your things and I went out of myself" (Hab. 3: 1-3)[988].

You, All-Heigh Word, You the not-understood One, by knocking on the door (Apoc. 3: 20), it is obvious that You have knocked on the hearing of the bride from the Son of Songs, whose heart was in awe because of You[989], and she went out of herself. That's why she tried to see You, with much feeling, and she shouted out: "Show me Your face and make me hearing Your voice. For Your face is beautiful and Your voice is sweet" (Song of Songs 2: 14). I love saying what Job said too, that "with my ear I firstly heard You, and now my eye sees You" (Job. 42: 5)[990]. For, as You are the Word and the Wisdom, likewise You also are "the true light lighting upon every man who comes within world" (Jn. 1: 6); in the first place, as the light seen in the beginning, and then like the light illuminating, as the One Who are the sun of the righteousness, on the one who sees, in order that one to see above-mind, in a blessed manner, elevated through virtues, the godlike and above-nature things, the untold things, characteristic only to God and to the above-world love[991]. That's why John too, he heralded clearly: "I saw His glory, a glory as of [987] The "hearing" of God is so attentive, so that becomes heard, to say so, and it scares the soul. On many times one can even hear the silence. Or, in somebody's silence one can rather hear his hearing, or his attention. We often "hear" the silence, or the focused attention, which somebody hears us or watches us with; we "hear" his voice and this makes us especially attentive, in our words and in our behaviors. But his attention is perceived by my straining, by my "hearing", or it causes that one.

By getting out of all things, the soul enters God, or else, the soul enters the demon's world. The soul cannot end into nothingness. Out of the being given by God, out of the general, created being, that the soul is in (Das Sein), the soul can no longer go out. But the true exit (ecstasy) it is the transcending the created order, in God, from life to more life.

[988] Fully understanding the Lord's things, it means passing into God, the ultimate and transcendent deep, out of which it is explained, in which they are illuminated.

[989] Hearing Christ calling the man at faith, it is compared to hearing a knocking on a door. With this hearing he knocks on the hearing of the bride from the Song of Songs.

[990] Hearing God, or the hearing of His "hearing", it precedes to seeing Him, which He enters even more through, the plan accessible to us. God is no longer felt as an invisible One, but one can see His glory, and His light.

[991] The Son of God illuminates, firstly, out of creation, as Logos and Wisdom Who worked and Who continues working through it; and then He illuminates the one who is elevated through virtues, in order him to see the godlike, uncreated things of God, which are above creation.

the One Born out of the Father, full of grace and truth" (Jn. 1: 14). For, as You are true God, You truly are luminous light too, as John confesses again. That's why, the ones too, who have taken out of Your fullness untold gift, they openly shout out, You the Untold One, that You are God, "The One Who said to illuminate light out of darkness, a light that illuminated our hearts" (2 Cor. 4: 6). And you illuminate and make manifestly shine the untold things, so that, thus, You prepare us for seeing the above-nature things, the above-world things, of the grace and of the truth, and above-skies, and to gladden us.

That's why You make Yourself known, with love for people, not only through hearing and seeing, but also through touching, as the disciple who rested his head on Your chest said: "The things I heard, the things I looked at, the things I saw, and the things touched by our hands, about the Word of the life" (1 Jn. 1: 1). This is for, if You make Yourself also vestment to the believers, by resting Your people, it is obvious that You descend, You the Good One, on the level of theirs understanding and deifier touching[992]. This is for, as man as happily have been baptized into You, and into the faith in You, they have been dressed in You, in an even more blessed way (Gal. 3: 27), You the Great Giver of Gifts, according to Apostle Paul, the holy heralder of the truth. That's why, Isaiah, the prophesizing and with a great sound trumpet, he rejoiced with his soul, of God-the Father and of the Lord, when he has been dressed up, in a wonderful way, with You, Lord, for the love's vestment and the salvation's coat which the Father dressed Isaiah up, in an above-mind way, it was You (Isa. 61: 10)[993]. This is for, in the impenetrable and above-nature luminous light from around him, the one who is all-shrouded by God, he was seeing You as overpoured, You the consummate cause of such a great joy. And all the more when he understood that this vestment is a savior one; for he saw You as salvation.

[992] Throughout all this chapter one can feel the influence of Saint Simeon the New Theologian (for instance. Traités théologiques et étiques II, in: "Sources chrétiennes", no. 129, IV, p. 38). The "understanding touching" differs from the touching through senses. As the understanding feeling, too, it is a spiritual and non-mediated encounter with Christ, an encounter, in the same time, felt.

[993] Often the prophets symbolized Lord Christ as man, in what happened to them. The Father dressed Isaiah up, in order to show that through him He dresses up the humanity received by His Son, with the godhead. But the prophet's word is here being interpreted by the author of the present writing, in the next phase, also in the sense that the light seen by the Prophet around him, as a vestment of glory, it was seen as Christ Himself.

Likewise, out of the endless richness of Your love, You make Yourself scented in an understanding mode, to the ones having a healthy faith, and You rest Your people by that too, in a wonderful mode, and they glorify You and praise You, for "poured Chrism is Your name" (Song of Songs 1: 3); and they herald You to their neighbors, saying: "A beautiful to see apple, and well scenting and sweet tasting, is my little brother and my spikenard has spread the scent of Your Chrisms" (Song of Songs 1: 12)[994]. That's why Apostle Paul too, by bearing You, he said that "we are the good fragrance of Christ" (2 Cor. 2: 15).

But You make Yourself too, to the believers, tasing and dinner, food and drink to the soul, giving life and nourishing in a wonderful way and growing up and mysteriously sweetening, as it is due, on the one who is imparted. This felt David too, by tasting You, as a bearer of God prophet, and he told his people: "Taste and see that good is the Lord" (Ps. 33[995]: 8). This is for, if You are seen like an apple too, the hungry ones will eat You like a very good nourishment, and the ones poor in spirit will get fed (Mt. 5: 3), namely the ones whoa re humble in thought; and they will praise You, Lord, for the abundance of the tasting's goodness (Ps. 21[996]: 30), the ones who always search for You, in order to find You and to eat You.

This is for out of the plentifulness of the-life-giver power, there is extended the holy nourishment and drink. And the hearts of the ones who eat You will survive forever and ever (Ps. 21: 27). This is for, by being eternal and incorruptible, You make the ones who eat You incorruptible as well, and You lead them towards eternity, through Your overwhelming work characteristic to You. In order to do that, out of Your limitless kindness, which beautifies and does good things, You call and urge the listeners, by saying: "Come, eat My bread and drink the wine I have prepared to you" (Prov. 9: 5), calling on Yourself as such. This is for You said on other occasions: "I am the bread of the life" (Jn. 6: 35); and: "They have forsaken me, the source of the life" (Jer. 2: 13). And, actually, You offer Your body and blood, the so holy ones, to be eaten and drunk (Mt. 26: 26-28).

[994] The spikenard spread by the soul it is the fragrance of the Chrisms of Christ, of the Chrisms overpoured into the humanity of Christ, and out of His humanity into believers. God isn't a thought abstraction, but He is the ocean of the life, that, by touching the human life, it takes the quality corresponding to the content of all senses.

[995] In KJB we have: Psalm 34: 8. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[996] In KJB we have: Psalm 22: 30. (E. l. t.'s n.)

Thus, through all the understanding senses You nourish Your people, gladdening them up, You the Soul-Loving, Lord, by making them light, and life and delectation above all the above-nature good things. Blessed are You, Jesus, the spiritual and heavenly mana, endlessly nourishing. Glory to Your untold love for us, and to Your untold mercifulness, and to Your long patience with us, You Master. Amen.

65. The Ghost of God Dwells within Believers.

It is a very wonderful thing to the understanding feeling of breathing, the overpouring of the-life-maker Ghost within the flesh hearts, which have received the healthy faith in the oikonomia of the embodiment of the Word. For it is a wonderful thing, as it has been said, to be the grace and the power and the work poured out of the uncreated and above-nature godhead. But being the heart too, united and ceaselessly moved, it is a totally above-nature thing and thoroughly amazing.

66. It is a very wonderful thing that, after the Father built into the Ghost, through the godlike Word, all the things submitted to the senses and known with the mind (Col. 1: 16), the Trinity Himself dwells and walks again (2 Cor. 5: 16) and it manifestly lives within the human thought. For it is a great wonder that each believer is sent an angel to, by the threefold-hypostatical godhead. But to deign the Trinity Himself, endless in power and of-life-maker, to come within man and to strengthen him and to work in a godlike and spiritual manner within him, it is totally above any wonder[997].

[997] The Holy Trinity doesn't dwell statically in the man's cogitation, but the Trinity moves the man's cogitation towards other and other targets, towards the ultimate purpose of the human being: the deification. But the Trinity's "walking" within soul it has another meaning too: amongst the Persons of the Holy Trinity, it is being committed a communication of love, which also our being is influenced by. This means that we love the Father into the Son and with the love of the Son we shout out towards the Father, through the Ghost: Abba Father! All the Trinitarian Persons are imprinted in the soul's movement, making the man feeling within himself the filial love of the Son (the man feels adopted) and right through this, the man feels the love of the Father upon himself; but also, the man feels the Ghost elevating him above the unfree attachment to the lower things, elevating him to the free enthusiasm of the love for the supreme Father. The man feels thus the Trinity's light as deification work, as adoption work, and as spiritualization work. But the man's heart would have felt within itself, the work of the Trinity, if it hadn't felt itself caught in this work, or dynamically imprinted by this work, or if the heart hadn't been capable of living into the godlike infinity.

67. It is truly a wonderful thing, that the believer heart bears within, the holy ray of The All-High God Who is above all things. This is a sweet, useful, and wonderful, and of-people-loving thing, that God makes the mind to be illuminated from outside, through the Holy Scriptures. And also that God gives on Himself, in truth and in fact, as luminous light, to the believer, and this within the heart, and not outside it, and forever, and not in a passing manner, and this obviously exceeds even the above-all-understanding power.

68. It is a wonderful thing that That One Who is borne with pride and bewilderment, by Seraphs and by all the Powers of the heavens, He is also borne by the believer's heart. But the fact of not only bearing Him, but also of uniting with Him and of being imprinted by Him, it is above-all-wonders.

69. It truly is a measureless wonder that the soul is chair and bed and carriage, by grace, to the endless in wisdom and limitless in power God Who has the heavens as His throne. But who could wonder as much as it is due, by the fact that the soul is also loved by God insomuch than the soul is made to breath together with Him and to be partaker to His good and above-heavens things, and to be the soul entrusted such great mysteries?[998]

70. Truly wonderful and amazing thing is the fact that God Who doesn't have a place where to rest Himself (Isa. 66: 1), He rests Himself, in a worthy of God manner, within the human being's heart[999]. If an emperor, even an earthly and limited in [998] God makes the soul His "chair", for God reigns from within the soul, and He makes the soul partaker to the mastering over the passions; the soul is made "bed" for God rests Himself within the soul, and He imprints His resting too, into the soul; the soul is made "carriage", for the soul isn't static, but the soul carries God to the soul's good deeds, for the soul himself is elevated by God and together with God ever higher, to heavens. But more than these, God is associated by the soul to each of soul's breath, or to any moment of the soul's passing from a state to another, ant thus the soul does any such a passing together with God, so that the soul is like a jumping water, an always alive water.

[999] Any conscious being rests only in the sure and total love belonging to another conscious being. That's why God too, He finds the most pleasant resting within the heart of the man who loves Him surely and totally. The human being is capable of totally and surely loving God, through his heart. The heart is the organ and the place of the love. And the heart can love endlessly, for the heart can be filled up with the endless love coming from God, by turning that love back to God as human heart's love. "Your things out of Your things". In the love power emperor, when he embraces somebody with love and when he stretches his hand to a noble, he will cause to the embraces person or to the person whom he stretched his hand, much glory and honor, then you think at what happens to the one who is manifestly touched not by an earthly emperor, but by God Who has no beginning and Who is uncreated and Who is the Maker and the Lord of everybody, and to Whom are present thousands and thousands of angles who serve Him; and God doesn't simply touch somebody, but He does that in the bottom of the heart, and way more than that, God even dwells within that person, and not only temporarily, but for eternity, so that God even unites Himself with that person and He glorifies that person and He deifies that person and He gives that person who receives Him, thousands and thousands of good things! How great and untold glory and honor and joy will be imprinted in that person, and for eternity? Truly wonderful and above-mind are those things. Have mercy on me, Lord, You Holy Trinity!

71. It is a wonderful thing, that God Who has built all the things and, consequently, He upholds them all, He is comprised and kept in a non-comprisable manner, but manifestly and ceaselessly, within the believer's heart. If a mortal emperor having a limited mastery, he knocked on somebody's door, and he entered and ate and drank with that person, by sitting at the same table with him, that fact would be, and rightly so, to the one who welcomed that emperor, a great glory, honor, and joy, and pleasure, and a great comforting. But if the eternal Emperor Himself and the Lord of all things and the Maker of the seen and thought things, He enters without any ado, not the house but even the heart of somebody, and not in order to sweeten Himself together with that person with the good things from within that person's heart, but in order to share with that person the good things from the heavenly source and the above-heavens comforting, brought by Him, what do you reckon that that person will do? How much that person will rejoice? And what gladness and delectation will that person have? That person will entirely happiness and a very great and wonderful happiness. This is for it is truly an unimaginable wonder that the One Who relationship, of the soul with God, it is accomplished the man's aspiration at endlessly loving and at endlessly being loved.

fille up all things and Who is above all things, He makes to Himself, out of a whatever heart, His eternal house and church.

72. "God Who set up light in order to lighten from darkness" (2 Cor. 4: 6), He brightly lightens within the believers' hearts. The love from God has been poured within their hearts through the Holy Ghost given them (Rom. 5: 5)[1000]. God sends His Son within their hearts and This One shouts out: "Abba, Father" (Gal. 4: 6). The believers who are thus attached to the Lord (o, wonderful union!), they are one Ghost with God (1 Cor. 6: 17). But who would come to feeling the mentioned good things of the grace, in an unmediated manner?

73. The believers are, manifestly, inheritors of God and together-inheritors with Christ (Rom. 8: 17), as some second kind Christs, partakers to the godlike nature (2 Peter 1: 4), and this exceeds the whole mind and it escapes the whole understanding. And by that, the believers become sons of God and gods by work and grace. As such, they see and they experience, in an above-nature manner, or, in order to say it more appropriately, they are imparted with "things which the eye hasn't seen and the ear hasn't heard and at the man's heart they haven't ascended" (1 Cor. 2: 9). Glory to the not0understood love from God-the Father, form the Trinity, and from the One Who loved us out of His untold and above-heavens kindness.

74. Every Believer Is Overwhelmingly Honored by God.

"The one born out of Ghost, ghost he is" (Jn. 3: 6), according to the word of Christ. O, immeasurable greatness of the grace! O, untold gift! God build up the man with such great and wonderful gifts. So, the created one is, by nature, a creature. But out of the overwhelming abundance of His generosity, the All-Merciful Lord, the above-being and all-working Trinity, by filling the creature up, with grace, it elevates the man at the ultimate height of the uncreated Ghost, by uniting the man with Himself, as nobody can imagine, by deifying the man and by making the man as son and Ghost. This is for He says: "I have said: gods all of you are and sons of the [1000] The light is one and the same with the love, as the darkness is one with the hatred. God is luminous light, and He is openness, for He is love.

All-High" (Ps. 81[1001]: 6). And it has been written about God: "Commandment He set and it won't pass" (Ps. 148[1002]: 5); and: "The counsel of God remains forever, and the thoughts of His heart from generation to generation" (Ps. 32[1003]: 11), for He has an unchangeable nature. But His word and His commandment and His will and His advice, they have been brought to us by His hypostatical Word Who has made Himself as angel of this great and wonderful and above-nature advice (Isa. 9: 6). He instills the Ghost to His disciples (Jn. 20: 22) and thus, by giving them birth again, spiritually, He makes them sons of God. "This is for, all the ones who are carried away by the Ghost, they are sons of God" (Rom. 8: 14). And if they are sons, they obviously will be gods too. This is for, the born one has the nature of the ones who has given him birth. That's why, the Savior teaches His disciples to call God as the Father (Mt. 7: 9), being partakers to the Ghost. Thus, the Holy Trinity makes the believers as gods and sons and ghosts, by unveiling them all the wonderful gift that can be cogitated.

75. Interpretation to: "By stretching His wings He took them and He elevated them on His shoulders" (Deuteronomy 32: 11).

You understand, and receive in your understanding feeling, the things I am telling you now. I know very well that, by wondering, you will be filled up with spiritual joy, or with godlike pleasure. This is for, the Holy Ghost says through David the Prophet: "You, the One sitting on Cherubs, show Yourself!" (Deut. 32: 11). And again: "The One Who sees bottomless deeps he sits on Cherubs" (Ps. 98[1004]: 1). And again: "He has ascended on Cherubs" (Ps. 17[1005]: 12). But what does Him do to the believers? He does to them a very wonderful thing, one overwhelmingly above what was said before. This is for God doesn't place only us, by giving us life, by warming us up, by

[1001] In KJB we have: Psalm 82: 6. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[1002] The numbering of the Psalms in the two Bibles are same again, starting with the Psalm 148. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[1003] In KJB we have: Psalm 33: 11. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[1004] In this case we have a difference we reckon as important, between the contents of the two verses, apart from the different numbering. In KJB we have: Psalm 99: 1: "THE Lord reigneth; let the people tremble: he sitteth between the cherubims; let the earth be moved."; In ROB we have: "The Lord reigns: let the peoples tremble; He sits on cherubs: let the earth tremble.". (E. l. t.'s n.)

guarding us, and by wonderfully gladdening us, as a bird does to its chicks. But, o, wonder of the godlike love(!), He places us on Himself and Hew makes us like our carriage, in an above-understanding mode, through the endless abundance of His love for us, by guarding us and by sheltering us and by carrying us in an untold manner to the untold and supra-worldly good things of the life, and thus He prepares us in order us to be delighted with the above-nature things, and to be us filled up with peace, and us to rest in the impossible to be interpreted things, and us to rejoice and to taste those things, in an godlike and spiritual mode, and us to sweeten ourselves, as it is due, out of those things. This is for, the Great into Ghost Moses says too: "By stretching out His wings- we have to understand here: God – He received them and He elevated them on His shoulders" (Deut. 32: 11). O, untold love! And even only for stretching out His wings, and for receiving the believers, and to make Himself, thus, manifestly, their Bearer, it is to the believers a truly above-cherubs'-worthiness, and a reason for great ands untold joy. But taking them and by elevating them on His shoulders, and by sheltering them there (with His wings) as David the Prophet says, not even the cherubs' mind could understand and to praise, as it is due, what happens. "This is for, as Your glory is, equally unimaginable is Your mercy" (Wisdom of Sirach 2: 20), Holy Trinity, glory to You!

76. The monastic schism and the promised the monks keep during their monastic life, they require a lonely mind[1006]. But this is being worked and done only by God, and He commits its through an all-powerful zeal and according to the rule. He is being working it by sharing to is the whole His of-life-making grace. And He is committing that by making Himself seen in the unitary and unique image of His Kingdom and of His all-keeper-glory. This is for only Him is All-High, non-composed with the many things, and incomparable to anything, due to His incomparable superiority to all things, the only One powerful in the proper meaning of the word, because all the things are powerful by being imparted with Him, the only One Who is truly wise, the whole wisdom of the wisemen being through His gift, the only One truly and eternally existing, and that's why He is the Maker and the Builder of all the existing realities. That's why, rightly so, and very well it has been said: "Out of Him and for Him and towards Him are all things, and Him it is due the glory forever and ever" (Rom. 11: 36).

If, therefore, all these things are like so, and all of them are good and beautiful together, as ones having their existence from God, and which are preserved and upheld by Him, and which look at Him and which search for their end, within Him; and if the ones who use properly the said things, and who are united with God as the One Who is their Father, and the Father of the kindness, and of the love, and of the temperance, and of the wisdom, and of the knowledge, and of the seeing, and of the due committing, and of the deification, and of the joy depending on it, and of the above-heavens peace, and of the fear caused by piousness, and of the strength and of the counsel, and of the right-faith, and of the science and of all the things belonging to the speaking-nature and which sweeten it, and fill it up with glory and gladden it and make it alike God and deify it; if, therefore, as it has been said, everything that is good and beautiful it is from God alone, truly vain is that one who, after being made the partaker to these good things and beauties, he separates himself and he breaks apart from God Who is the spring and the root of all good things and beauties. This is because, such a human being, he won't have anything out of the beautiful and good by nature things, since he has turned his back, in an ingrate manner, to the Maker and Upholder of all things, namely to the One Whom all the good and beautiful things have their foundation within. And even if the reckons that he is in the good and beautiful things, he won't really be in the good and beautiful things, but he will be in an awful wandering and mockery. That's why we must persevere with the whole our being in God alone, and we must thing only at His law and we must attach ourselves only to His law. Only thus we will be made partaker to the clean glory, to the non-liar delectation, and to the endless and steadfast richness and we will have together all the good things and beauties which I've been talking to you about, and we will even have God as dwelling and walking, o, wonder, within us (2 Cor. 6: 16). Only thus, we will live unitarily and uniquely into Christ Jesus, our Lord.

77. When we quietly spend out time in the humble cogitation and when we have our heart as bearer of Ghost, and when we have our heart being worked by the grace, our mind, by happily harmonizing itself to the truth, it becomes the seer of many godlike views and it is guided in untold and above-world mysteries, and it is truly reckoning itself as a newcomer and as passing amongst the world's things. And the mind delights itself and it manifestly rejoices, into Ghost, of the thing which are above-mind and totally beyond our understanding. Shortly speaking, the mind is often imprinted by God, wonderfully, and it experiences full of amazement going-outs of itself, to God, and it ascends towards deification as towards a happy experience, in silence and in seeing and in above-nature love, with the influence and with the power of the illuminating and of-life-Maker Ghost, into Christ Jesus, our Lord.

78. The one who, according to Providence, he cogitates only at God and he lives in Him[1007] and he limpidly sees God - into Ghost - as walking and living within him, he manifestly fulfills the godlike commandment of our Lord Jesus, that says: "Remain into Me and I into you" (Jn. 15: 4). And he has been united, therefore, in a foreign manner, with God, and he has become dead, in a wonderful and very happy mode, together with Him[1008]. And thus, he has become non-wandering worker of God's commandments[1009]. And this is, for the Savior said: "The one who remains into Me and I into him, he brings many fruits", namely many virtues (Jn. 15: 6)[1010]. Therefore, everyone who wants to achieve the virtues, through seeing and praying, le him remain and let him strive with the whole his power, into God, in order God, by seeing the holy ascesis of the soul, to elan down the heavens and to become Himself very manifestly, and in a [1007] It is a will of God's Providence, or of His plan with the world, us to think only at Him, us to love only on Him, and us only into Him to love all the other realities and unite ourselves with them; this is for, only Him comprises all the realities.

[1008] This is another meaning of Christ's crucifixion. Christ allowed Himself to be crucified in order to show the world that He dies to the world, for God, and for placing within His humanity this power, in order this power to be communicated us too. That's why the Baptism means dying with Christ and getting born to a new life, out of God's life received by Christ through His resurrection.

[1009] God leads the world, towards His purpose, in a more fruitful way through His commandments, when those commandments are fulfilled by us. So, God's Providence is committed through us too, of course when we fulfill Christ's commandments and when we tend to make ourselves alike Him, and to unite ourselves with Him through this fulfillment.

[1010] So, the virtues represent the fulfilling of God's providence, or the fruit of God's providence within us. This is for, through virtues, we have reached to be like God and we've been united with Him.

wonderful manner, as walking and as dwelling within that soul. By this, it will be destined to the one who is partaker to God, to rejoice himself of all the good things and beauties and of the good pleasure for all the holy commandments. This is for Himself said: "Without Me, you cannot do anything" (Jn. 15: 6), even if it seems to us that we can do something.

79. While the love asks for the treasure not to be hidden, neither that wisdom of general use, obviously, nor the work of understanding and seeing God, nor the aspiration towards it, it mustn't be kept in mind, unwritten, but it must be written down, for the love of the general benefit. This is for, by being the man a cogitating animal, endowed with mind and with understanding, and that's why cogitating about God the faith's things, out of the things created for man, it is born within man the godlike and due understanding, and the man knowingly enters the commandments land. But in order to do that, the man also needs the help from God-the Upholder. And, therefore, the man prays often and with tears, asking God to ease him the working of the commandments. "And when He will deign to have mercy, the Father will have mercy on His son" (Ps. 102[1011]: 13). Namely, God will have mercy on the one who prays Him and he will immediately pour (o, wonder!) out of His Ghost upon the believer, or within believer's heart, and the Ghost will kindle the loving feeling towards God, of the one who received the Ghost. And it will give them daring, in an impossible to tell manner, as the daring of a son towards his father. The Ghost gives the believer that daring as an earnest, through that pouring and working of the Ghost upon the one who is imparted with the Ghost, and that believer is overwhelmingly sweetened, and he is soothed, and it humbles him and it elevates him in a new kind of glory and honor, through the union with him. And it leads them to fiery and so great loves, that everything he sees around God, he reckons as his own; and the Fathers yards, the richness, the glory, the strength, the beauty, the wisdom, the mastery and all the good and beautiful things, the glory and the praise, all of them are the delectation and the praise and the joy of his, as the ones of a son. So, when the soul reached these views, through the impartation with the Ghost, as to some natural views, namely, when the soul sees these views in the God in Trinity, then the soul truly sees God as a very loved Father, in the mode I've told, and the soul is filled up with joy, by having imprinted only God, of Whom the soul delights himself and he gladdens above nature, into Christ Jesus, our Lord.

80. Which the actual pleasure is?

I reckon that anyone who got close to these things, judiciously, he will tell that the actual pleasure is what cannot be attributed to the nature and it cannot be expresses by words and what lasts as a long state and it fills up the heart with joy even after experiencing it, it elapsed; and that's far from the bodily pleasure that is devilish (tied to an image) and that isn't an actual pleasure. Therefore, everyone who wants the pleasure, let him search for the understanding (spiritual) pleasure, the clean one and that doesn't scatter, and he won't be wrong, but he rather quickly will be moved from the earthly realities to the heavenly realities, with his thinking and with the whole his soul. For this is the true and actual pleasure: the heart's pleasure that isn't followed by sorrow, a pleasure eternally remaining luminous, and always springing, and not-condemned, and rather worthy to be desired, blessed and accompanying the saints from ever, peaceful, gentle, giver of daring, shiny, with a good countenance, pious, luminous, full of joy and working even afterwards. And if you have been sweetened understandingly (spiritually)[1012] with it, by trying it, you will surely consent the things we've just written. And if not, just observe the said thing, by faith.

81. About the Bodily Pleasure.

And the pleasure that isn't understanding and it doesn't belong to the Ghost, but to the body, it is wrong to be called as pleasure. This is because, once fulfilled, this pleasure brings a bitter sorrow, and it is called pleasure in a liar mode. It is a false pleasure and foreign to the rational soul, it is irrational, it is despicable, burdensome, loving of darkness, noisy, cumbersome, passing, and quickly submitted to withering. This is because, by making the body older, it unwillingly and shamefully withdraws;

[1012] The "understanding pleasure" or "understandingly tasted" it is opposite to the one tasted with the senses. But that isn't only an intellectual pleasure (amor intellectualis), but it is a clean joy of the entire being, a state of euphoria. It is experiencing the thought realities and the communion with the loving God, but it is also an understanding of these realities live within His love.

it is condemned, it makes the life wicked, it makes the life useless, and slave, and burdened with condemnation, covetous for food, drowsy, faceless, hopeless, reckless, bringing a dark sadness to the one who works it, after he has done it. If you have experienced these, without any doubt that you know the truth of the said things. And if you have guarded yourself, through the hand of God, by listening to my words as to the truth's words, you know that you will reap the shiny fruit of the life[1013].

82. I have received the always shining spiritual light and the above-world and godlike life, and through them you have received the nourishment and the delectation, the aspirations and the desires, the unions and the unparalleled joys of the threefold hypostatically godhead, and the loving untold feelings, together with Christ Jesus, the everybody's Lord. But, woe, to my wickedness and insanity! Woe to the evilness of my non-sapience! My mind, that has reached, by grace, above heavens, by being sometimes kidnapped, it leans down towards the liar, earthly, and full with all the bad smell garbage. Woe to me, because who won't wonder and who won't cry for what I am doing, and who won't pray God in order Him to give me, out of His love for people, a greater power through the illuminating and of-life-making Ghost, in order I to easily banish away the [1013] It is described here the whole disorder and corruption brought by the inferior pleasures. The Holy Fathers, they reckon, by and large, that the ordered life, that one leading to deification, it is a life guided by rationality, in union with the grace, or in communion with God-Person, while the passions disfiguring the human nature, they have an irrational character, namely and egotistical character. The order within the own being and within society, it is being kept through rationality that takes in account the harmony amongst all realities; the disorder, the individual and social decomposition, they are the effect of the irrational passions. It is implied here the teaching about persons and things as embodiments of the godlike Word's rationalities, amongst which there is, naturally, a harmony. The thought rationalities of the things, by corresponding to the thought rationalities of the Logos, they are entrusted to the thinking rationality, to the subject-rationality of the persons, as images of the Subject-Rationality, supremely represented by the hypostatical Word, in order these persons to have a common content of the dialogue amongst themselves, and between them and the Logos. Within all of them illuminates the godlike Word, or the supreme Rationality. But the things and the finite reality of the persons are harmonious syntheses or the rationalities in their incorporated state. When the thinking human reality uses these syntheses in an evil way, and by this the harmony within the human being, and also between persons and things, there will be produced a general disorder and corruption. Maintaining the things' rationalities, and the relations amongst the persons themselves and between persons and things, in harmony, one cannot do it except by listening to the teaching given by the eternal Subject of the creatures' rationalities, and by following the example of this embodied Subject. This thing is going to be especially highlighted in the next chapter.

plotting devil and the cunning enemy working against my holy and wonderful life?[1014] All of you, You the All-Holly Angels, and you, all the righteous ones' souls, pray to God for me, for I am insensitive and inferior in my thoughts.

83. My God, my God, nothing is greater than You are, for You are non-comprised, for You are everything, for You are Maker of everything, and for you are endlessly infinitely above all things, for You are above-being; My Lord, Lord, holy untold and impossible to interpret union, together-breathing of the Christians, glory to You! How, Master, by seeing You shining within my heart, day and night, I do not get out of myself always (I am not always in ecstasy) through the overwhelming grace, but I remain careless and insensitive to such a gift, You the Almighty? Woe to me, what a big sinner I am!

If you knew, who is the one who has tied me, and whom he has tied me to, and whom he has tied me through, you would quickly start working, full of awe, and you would praise the above-being God, by thanking Him as much as you can, for all the things He does so wonderfully, out of His kindness.

If you knew, therefore, how far I am from Christ's mystery, by coming to an even greater bewilderment than the word can tell it, you would condemn my idleness, and my carelessness, not to say my manifest insensitiveness and lack of understanding.

In that time, Jesus, by answering, He said: "I confess to You, Father, Lord of the heavens and of the earth that You have hidden these things to the wise and skillful ones, and You have unveiled these things to the little children. Yes, Father, for so it has been the benevolence in front of You" (Mt. 11: 25-26). Always ask for, always pray, in order you not to suffer unwisely in the saddening things of the life, in an unworthy of God, and of both of us, way. And forgive me!

[1014] Any human life is holy and wonderful through its eternal value, and through its borderless mystery; even by accomplishing a life disfigured by evil, and by sin, that life still remains transparent to its mystery and value, and to the godlike image. That's why, even in hell, the person remains indestructible. The person has in himself eternal possibilities for experiencing the evilness's torments, or his unconformity to them. But the demons are especially plotting when they see a life the has become saint and wonderful in an actual manner, through that person's striving.

Of Kallistos Angelicude

Introduction

According to some data about Kallistos Angelicude, given by A. Erhard[1015], and then mentioned by H. G. Beck[1016] too, this author has been recently studied by Stelian Papadopoulos[1017], who also published Kallistos' work "Against Thomas d'Aquino"[1018]. This author, whom, in the Greek Philokalia and in the G. P. 147, 817-826, it has been published in, only a small in dimensions writing, bearing the title: Ησυχαστικη τριβή, translated in the present volume with the title: The Craftsmanship of the Appeasement, it is mentioned by the Greek Philokalia and by the Greek Patrology (G.P.) under the name of Kallistos the Angelicude. Stelian Papadopoulos confirmed the data provided by A. Erhard and Beck, that the author's real name was Kallistos Angelicude, and he provided new data about him. This author activated during the second half of the XIV Century, near to Melenic locality, situated in Macedonia, and he lives around the end of the XIV Century. He lived in a monastic "settlement" near the mentioned locality, in some kind of hermitage, where he built up also a church, being him helped also by the Serbian tzar from that time. Around that church were living several ascetics, tonsured in monasticism by Kallistos. In a document of the Patriarchy of Constantinople, Kallistos is called as "spiritual man, virtuous and hesychast". The name "hesychast" was being given after the hesychastic disputes from the middle of the XIV Century, to a monk who was occupying himself with the prayer of the mind, and who has reached, through his ascesis, with his appeasement, to seeing the godlike light.

According to the locality which he was living in, he is also called as Melenichiotis. In Greek Codex Vatopedi, 736, and in Arundel 520 din British Museum, it is preserved an ascetic writing of his, composed by 30 "Words". Stelian Papadopoulos mentioned the title of these "Words" in his introduction to the publication of the Kallistos' writing against Thomas d-Aquinas. The Word XXII, bearing the title Ησυχαστικη τριβή, it seems to be, according to its title and according to the words it begins with, identical to the writing from the Greek Philokalia and to its older Romanian translations, given under the name of Kallistos Tilicude and comprised under the title: "The Skillfulness (or the Craftsmanship) of the Appeasement" in several manuscripts (for instance, in the manuscripts which can be found in the Library of the Romanian Academia, no. 1841, f. 102 v-119v, written in the year 19818, and in that one bearing the number 2435, f. 208 v-218 v, and then in the manuscript no. 40, f. 44-55 v, from the Library of the Romanian Patriarchy, a manuscript dating from the XIX Century).

Behold a few of the titles which we can find in the "Words" of Kallistos' ascetic writing: Word III: Spiritual Paradise, or the Godlike Lights Having as Gate the Seeing through the Ghost: Word IV: About Entering, through the Lord, the Spiritual Paradise and About Its Gate and about Its Key; and the explanation to the words: If somebody enters through Me, he will be saved; Word XIII: About the Spiritual Pleasure and Joy and about Their Occasions; Word XIV: How We Skillfully Must Use the Contemplation of God; Word XXI: About the Life Hidden within Christ; Word XXIV: About the Doer and the Contemplative; Word XXV: About Contemplation.

Perseveringly occupying oneself with the "spiritual paradise" and with the contemplation, preoccupation we can find also in the "Hundred Heads" of Kallistos and Ignatius, and in the "Heads about Prayer" and in their continuation or in the "Paradise" written by Kallistos the Patriarch, a preoccupation that goes all the way up to the identity of several titles of the "Heads", it gives room to the supposition that the last ones were influenced by the writing of Kallistos the Angelicude, or vice versa. This problem couldn't be definitively solved except after a parallel study of Kallistos Angelicude's writing and of the three mentioned writings. Beck said: "It seems that (Kallistos and Ignatius) closely followed the work of Kallistos Angelicude, which they have filled it up with quotations"[1019]. WE are going to see in the introduction to the writing of Kallistos the Katafygiote, published in the present book too, that that writing too, it breathes the same ghost and it is full of the same preoccupations.

KALLISTOS ANGELICUDE

The Craftsmanship of the Appeasement[1020]

Nobody can repent without appeasing himself; neither can one somehow reach the cleanness, without withdrawal; and no one can become worthy of dialoguing with God and of seeing God, while that one still is in dialogue with the people and seeing them. That's why, the ones who have made their objective out of repenting for their mistakes, out of cleaning themselves of passions, and out of enjoying the dialogue with God and the seeing of God – which is the end of the road and the target of the ones who live according to God, and the earnest, to say so, of the eternal inheritance of God – they aim for the appeasement with the whole their zeal, and they reckon as the most useful thing to withdraw themselves and to avoid the contact with people, with the soul their soul's feeling. Their start in the appeasing life, it is the crying, the rebuking, and the self-despising, for which, in order to work those as cleanly as possible, they take upon themselves the takings of vigil, the standing on their feet, the restraint, and the bodily toiling, which have as general goal the river of tears starting out of the eyes of the ones who cogitate the humble things into the crushing of their heart. This is for, as the one tending towards cleanness and they achieve it through deeds, the end is the peace from the thoughts, likewise in those there is, as I've said, the flowing of the tears[1021].

And from here the mind starts, in a natural way, to penetrate the things' natures and to see the artistry of God. From now on, the mind's thing is to catch up and to contemplate the godlike meaning of the power, and of the glory, and of the kindness, and of all the other things belonging to the Ghost of [1021] Here is made the discernment between workers and contemplatives, of seers, or prayers. The first ones reach the peace from thoughts, and the second ones reach the torrents of tears. The tears come out of a very burdening awareness about their sins, that produces in the ones who deepens that awareness, a such a deep feeling of sorrow, and of pain, and of torment, and of "pricking of the heart", that the tears start flowing, a fact that doesn't happen until there is within man a certain callousness.

God. In the same time, the mind penetrated the mysteries of the Scripture, and the mind tastes the above-world beauties, and the mind becomes chamber to God's love. And thus, the mind is engulfed by longing, it rejoices and it gladdens itself, by running towards the last end of the virtues, namely towards the love of the Maker of all things[1022]. That mind no longer experiences and it no longer fears any going astray amongst the things from here, though that mind still experiences some transgressions and sinful impulses and indecent movements, because of many reasons, as that mind still is changeable[1023]. But the mind must withdraw itself from these ones, by removing from itself any discouraging. The mind of these ones, by being winged up with the hope in God's love for people, it flies up towards the godlike things, by occupying itself with the tears, with the prayer, and with the other mentioned toils, and it delights itself with the godlike Paradise of the love, as much as it is possible to the mind. That mind no longer sees anywhere, anything else, neither image, nor thickness, neither countenance, nor anything else; to say it shortly, it only sees the tears, the peace from the thoughts, and the love from God. This is for through these ones, it is preserved also the mind's lack of scattering, and it is given as gift the soul's salvation. This is for the temperance watches over, and the mind prays to Christ Jesus, our Lord.

Sitting in your monastic cell, let your mind daring into humbleness, towards God: it is about that humbleness caused to you by your unworthiness and nothingness; the daring is for the undiminished love from God, and for He doesn't remember the evil. And the soul is elevated to honor before God, when, despite the soul sees himself being sinner, he still dares for the God's love for people, and the soul reckons about himself as tied to God[1024]. That's why Saint Paul commands too, saying: "Let's [1022] The ones reaching the contemplative state, their firstly understand the mysterious meanings of the things and of the Holy Scripture, and through those meanings, they contemplate the artistry of God in creation, and they contemplate God Himself. The love from God find room within them, and that love forces them towards ever-more love from God. This is the end of all the virtues, which the ascetic has been occupying himself with, ever since the doer phase.

[1023] We have in these ones, though, some resemblances to the "Paradise" of Kallistos the Patriarch. This "Paradise" will be mentioned in the followings. The ones who have reached this state he no longer is tempted by the outside things, but he still has within himself his changeable nature and, in the remnants of some habits lasting within him, there is the possibility of some transgressions and inappropriate impulses.

[1024] In The Lives of the Saints it is very often mentioned the "daring" the saints have towards God. But here the "daring" is seen as united with the humbleness. The saint "dares" to God not come close, with daring, to the throne of the grace" (Hebr. 4: 16). This is for the daring towards God is some kind of an eye of the prayer, or a wing, or a wonderful dependency[1025]. That one who reckons himself as being good, that one doesn't' have daring – let that not be! Run away from this thought! – but that one who flies towards the godlike hope, being him winged up by the thought at the untold love from God, and by the thought at God's forgiveness. You pray, therefore, with daring in humble thought, one nourished by good hopes in God, into Christ Jesus, our Lord, as it has been said. You must always carefully search for the things which temperate the body and deliver the mind from disturbance. And these ones are: eating with temperance, drinking light beverages, sleeping shortly, standing on your feet according to your power, kneeling as much as possible, having a humble countenance, wearing a disregarded coat, speaking little and only if needed, sleeping on the floor, and all the other things which partially tame the body. And in the same time with these, you must occupy yourself with all the things awakening the mind and helping to attach your mind to God. And these things are: reading the Holy Scripture, reading the writing of the saints who interpreted the Scripture, but these ones too, with temperance; singing psalms while understanding the meanings thinking at the things said in the Scripture and at the wonders seen in the creation; praying with your mouth until the holy grace of the Ghost will move your prayer, in a felt manner, out of your heart; this is for, then is another celebration and it is the time for another feasting, untold by mouth, but worked within your heart, through the Ghost[1026].

for his kindness, but for his trust in the mercy from God, for God doesn't keep in mind the done evil. That's why the daring is reconciled with the humbleness. This is for, even in this daring, the soul is conscious that in everything he has and he receives, he depends on the God's love for people. If a soul reckoned himself ad being good, that soul wouldn't actually be good, and that soul couldn't ask God for anything. That soul would reckon that God owes to give him what he needs.

[1025] The "daring", by being united with the prayer, it shows again that it isn't a daring of the man by himself. Daring in prayer means reckoning that you need God, but in the same time trusting His mercy. The prayer is an "eye" towards God, for in prayer you rather see the greatness, and the power, and the kindness of God; the prayer is a "wing" towards God, for without it you won't dare and won't be able to get close to Him; the prayer is affectionate and non-understood "dependency" on God, for you feel that you cannot do anything without Him.

[1026] The prayer is religious service brought to God and therefore it is celebration too. These are three notions connected to one another. It is celebration, for it is stopping from the world's things and it is occupying with the godlike things, which it actually is resting and joy and luminous light. But the fullest celebration is the prayer done within heart and worked there by

And until then, you occupy yourself with the said things, like this: kneels as often as you can and pray, while sitting like so; when you get tired by praying, pass to reading, as it has been said; then, come again to prayer. And again, being you tired of praying, stand up for a little singing; and then come back again to prayer. And getting tired again, turn back to the occupation mentioned before, with temperance; and then give yourself again, as a gift, to the prayer. Work a little too, with your hands, in order to banish the boredom away, as you have heard from the Holy Fathers. But always, in the whole your work according to God, from morning to morning, let the prayer be your main occupation. All the other occupation are to be used, as I've said, due to the tiredness brought by prayer. And when the mercy comes within soul, and the grace of the Ghost makes the prayer gushing up from within heart, like from a spring, then let the mind to occupy itself only with praying and with seeing, by detaching itself from all things and by delighting itself only with the prayer and with the seeing, in the Paradise of the godlike love[1027].

The prayer has mastery upon all the good deeds; it gives birth to the repentance's tears; it powerfully helps to the peace of the thoughts, by urging that only God to be reckons as the consummate peace; it is the mother of the love for God; only the prayer cleans up the cogitating power of the soul, by imprinting God in it, the One Who causes the angels' cleanness too; the prayer directs the lusting power of the soul towards God, into cleanness, for by attaching to God and by dialoguing with God Who is the Good by nature, and the endless Beauty, and above-nature[1028], He ties the whole lust on Himself; and the anger, God the Holy Ghost. This is for, then there isn't either the care for uttering the appointed words, and experiencing God it is stronger.

[1027] As the Patriarch Kallistos too, likewise the author of this writing tightly united the prayer with the seeing of God, with the soul. One won't be able to totally be absorbed into prayer without feeling the presence of God.

[1028] God is by nature the above-nature Good. God isn't a Good submitted to the nature's laws. But He is consummately free and therefore He isn't narrowed by any law. God is properly-said good, namely He is good for He wants to be good, but, in the same time, being good belongs to God's nature. The liberty and the nature are, at God, one and the same; if this freedom had been evil too, it wouldn't have been a full freedom. The evil always forces the evil one. The whole creation is submitted to some laws - in the last analysis, at least to the godlike law. This is because nothing of the created things is the law of its own existence. Only in communion with God, the rational creature is completely free. The lust of such a creature is directed towards good, but the true and full Good is God.

tames is so much, that the man falls down and prayer to God, and the soul is humbled by falling to God; this is for, nobody wears, while praying, a non-humble and angry thought. That's why, shortly speaking, the pious prayer cleans up and it strengthens all the soul's powers and all the doer and understanding works; and it especially attaches the seeing to God and, consequently, to the godlike love, in a quiet living, according to the things I've said before. And your thought, by turning back within you, let it cogitate and look at that place of the heart where the tear flows from, praying while not being disturbed by breathing through the nose. And let it stay there as much as possible. This is for, it is a very useful thing, one bringing many and ceaseless tears, and it abolishes the mind's slavery, and it produces the understanding peace of the soul, and it occasions the prayer, and it works together with God in order to find out the heart's prayer, through the grace of the-life-maker Ghost, into Christ Jesus, our Lord[1029].

You must know, you the seer, who sees the mysterious things and who is delighted with them, that, as God and the man are two, likewise are two, either as genre or as species, the crying and the tears. This is because one differs from another, despite being, both of them, good and given by God, as gifts, and they gain to us the benevolence of God and the inheritance destined by it. The crying has as source the fear of God and the sadness, while the tears have the godlike love and God, as their source. The first one doesn't gladden the nature too much the second ones gladden much and above-nature. The first one is characteristic to the beginners, while the second ones are characteristic to the ones who have reached their consummation by grace[1030].

[1029] The author of this writing mostly associates the tears to the consummate prayer within heart. The godlike light remains reserved only for the highest spiritual level. But also, the ones who have reached that level, they are advised to manifest some reserve in accepting it. So, we have, in the first place, an apophatism as feeling of God Who is not seen, and then high above, there would be the illumination. This means that the prayer within heart is a prayer penetrated by a great feeling. The fear for the punishment coming from God, for the sins, it seems squeezing the heart of the one who prays, so that is squeezes tears out of his heart. But the cogitation at his sins it must be associated also with the love for the merciful God, with the compassion produced by His mercy. This contributes again, to intensifying the heart's feeling, to mellowing the heart down, and to transforming the heart in a spring of tears.

[1030] Here is being made a difference between crying, as weeping, one rather caused by thinking at sins, and the tears produces rather by the love for God. But these two aren't totally separated, though. In the tears produces by the love for God, the sins aren't forgotten, although God has

Five are the works of the quietude: the prayer, or the ceaseless remembrance of Jesus, introduced through breathing, within the heart, and without any thought[1031], a fact achieved by usually restraining the belly, the sleep, and the other senses, inside the monastic cell, with the help of the humbleness. Then a little singing and reading of the Godlike Gospels and of the writings of the Holy Fathers and of the heads about prayer, especially those belonging to the New Theologian, to Hesychius, and to Nicephorus; cogitating at the judgment of God, at death, and at the things alike; finally, a little working with the hands. And then it must be done, again, the turning back to prayer, even if this will require some forcing, until the mind will get used to reject the scattering of itself, by thinking at the Lord, and by ceaselessly consenting to the heart's toiling. This is the work of the beginner monks, who want to appease themselves. So, one like this, he needs not to get out from his monastic cell, and to avoid any dialogues and views, except in the case of some big necessity. But, even then, let him do it attentively, by guarding on himself, and as rarely as possible. This is because, not only to the beginners, but also to the advanced ones, these things cause them scattering.

This prayer, when done with taking heed, without thinking at something else, through the words: "Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God", it elevates the mind in an immaterial and totally untold manner, towards the mentioned Lord Himself, and by saying: "have mercy on me", it makes the mind to come back again, to itself, in order ton pray for itself. But the ones who has advanced in love, by being more experienced, he directs himself only towards the Lord, for he trusts and he is convinced about the second thing (the forgiveness). That's why, the Fathers not always teach us the entire prayer, but one teaches us the whole prayer, as John Chrysostom did[1032], while another teaches us only "Lord Jesus", as Paul did, who added: "into the Holy Ghost" (1 Cor. 12: 3), speaking about prayer during the time forgiven them mercifully, and the crying for sins doesn't totally lack the trust in the forgiving mercy of God.

[1031] It has been mentioned before, though, about the introducing a thought within heart. But that one was the thought about sins, or about the mercy from God. The thoughts which one mustn't introduce within his heart, they are the thought about the outside things, about food, pleasures, glory, and worries. These ones keep the mind outside. Thinking at sins and at God, it helps the mind to enter the heart and to stay within heart and next to God.

when the heart receives the work of the Holy Ghost, which the heart prays through, too; this is the prayer of the advanced ones, though they haven't reached yet, the consummation, that is the illumination. And Saint John Climacus says: "Strike the enemy with the name of Jesus" and: "Let the remembrance of Christ attach to your breathing"[1033], and he adds nothing more. But the beginner too, they are allowed to pray by using all this prayer's words, and some other times to pray, in their mind, by using only a part of this prayer. But let the way of praying not to change too often, in order that not to cause scattering.

By persevering in applying the mentioned method of the clean prayer, even if not in a clean manner because of the imaginings which the one who prays is accustomed to, and because of his thought which become impediments to him, the one who lives in ascesis reaches the habit of praying unforcedly, and of persevering with his mind within his heart, and not to introduce the mind, forcedly, by inhaling the air, and then the mind to jump off there, but his mind perseveres in there and it stars praying by itself. This is also called as the prayer of the heart[1034]. It is preceded by a certain warmth within heart, that banished away the thoughts which impede the mentioned clean prayer to be done consummately. And, by persevering like that, the mind ceaselessly prays within heart. And in such a warmth and prayer, the love for the remembered Lord Jesus it is born within the heart, so that start flowing from within heart, plentifully, sweet tears of the longing for the remembered Jesus.

So, in order somebody to be found worthy for these things, and for all the other things coming after these, which is not now the time to talk about, he must strive, as it has been said, for having the fear of God permanently before his eyes, together with remembering Jesus within his heart and not simply outside his heart. Thus, he removes himself not only from the evil deeds, but also from thinking at passions, and he advances up to being filled up with the entrustment of the love from God, for him. But, in order not to receive the one who, while being in darkness, he pretends to be luminous light, let the believer not to try and see God's light. And when, the mind sees a light without searching for it, let the believer not accept it, but neither reject it, but let him ask the one who has power for teaching him, not only as that one has known according to the Godlike Scripture, but as he happily experienced himself the illumination, and let him give thanks to God. If not, the believer better not to receive that light, but let him rather to run with humbleness, to God, by reckoning himself unworthy of such a view, as we've learned in this regard, with the deed, from the Holy Fathers, even if in some of their writings they present the deceiving and the undeceiving signs.

[1034]It is called the prayer of the heart only that prayer that is no longer done forcedly, namely by forcedly introducing the mind within heart. This is because, in this case, the mind cannot stay too much within heart, because of not having the habituation of the steadfastness in the interiorized thinking at God. The prayer of the heart, as the mind's persevering by itself, within heart, and in thinking at God, from within the heart, it therefore requires much skillfulness in order to achieve it.

But, as you heard before all the told things, by mouth, likewise, you will hear about this, at the right time. Because now it isn't the right time. Now you must find out, rather, together with other things and before other things, this: like the one who strives to learn how to shoot arrows, he doesn't strain the bow without receiving a sign, likewise the ones who wants to learn how to appease himself, let him have as sign the ceaseless gentleness of his heart, not disturbing and not being disturbed ever, and for anyything, except the case when it is about the right-faith. And he can easily achieve this, by getting far from all things and keeping his silence as much as he can. And if sometimes it happens to him not to do like that, let him immediately repent and rebuke himself, and let him take heed in the future, in order him to call Jesus, silently and with a clean conscience, putting Him as beginning, as I've said before. And by advancing on the way, let him have the godlike grace resting in his soul, and not only like so, but also consummately resting his soul from the devils and from the passions which were upsetting him before, and by gladdening him with an untold gladness. This is for, even if they bother him again, they no longer influence him, for he is no longer their comrade, and for he no longer wants the pleasure from them. This is for the whole desire of such a believer, it has been directed towards the Lord, the One Who has given the believer, His grace. Such a believer still is being warred, because God allows it, and not because God forsakes him. What is that for? In order him not to get his mind haughty, for the good he has found, but because of being warred, him to keep within himself, ceaselessly, the humbleness, the sole one that not only defeats the haughty enemies, but it is also found worthy of receiving ever-greater gifts.

May us too, be found worthy of these things, from Christ Who has humbled on Himself, for us, and Who gives as gift, to the humble ones, His grace, plentifully, now and always and forever and ever. Amen.

KALLISTOS THE KATAFYGIOTE

About the Godlike Union and about the Contemplative Life

Introduction

The Author and the Content of the Writing

This writing, translated in the Romanian language, is present in several manuscripts. It seems that it was read a lot, though it has a high theological level.

The writing can be found at the Romanian Academia's Library, bearing the number 1602, comprising 122 pages, in the manuscript number 2022, comprising 113 pages, in the manuscript number 2027, comprising 143 pages, in the manuscript number 2568, from page 33 front to page 270 back, in the manuscript number 3001, from the page 92 front to page 207 back, dating from the end of the Century XVIII and the beginning of the Century XIX[1035].

Erhard[1036] and Beck[1037], by rejecting the opinion that this Kallistos is identical to the Patriarch Kallistos II, they say that the author "seems" that he lived around the end of the Century XVIII and the beginning of the Century XIX. Nicodemus the Hagiorite says at his turn, in the preface of his work from the Greek Philokalia, that nothing is known about when and where this author lived.

[1035] In the manuscript nor. 2568, on the front of the page no. 2, it starts: "Every creature - out of what is the same nature with its good work – is imparted both with the according resting and sweetness". Likewise in the manuscript no. 1602.

[1036] Quoted work, p. 160.

But the content and the shape of the writing urge us not to reckon as totally improbable the fact that this writing would belong to Patriarch Kallistos. It might be that this writing too, it belongs to Patriarch Kallistos, but it might have been written at a time he was living in one of his withdrawals (καταφυγή), during his long monastic life. Of course, Kallistos the Katafygiote concentrates his writing around the two writings belonging to Patriarch Kallistos, and in "the one hundred heads" belonging to Kallistos and Ignatius. It is about the theme of the "One", which our mind will be united with, if it strives to get out of the division in diverse thoughts, and thus becoming, at its turn, one too. The theme of the "One" is of Platonic origin. But at Kallistos the Katafygiote, through "One" it is understood the godlike subject, One Who all His masterpieces and works are transparent to. The human person's ideal is that of placing himself in connection, through all these masterpieces and manifestations, with the Subject Who makes Himself felt and "seen" through them. This is for this One is alive, and He is full of love. That's why this One is, in the same time, Threefold. This One is, in the same time, simple, because otherwise, if He had been diverse then He would have been composed of parts, parts which would have been, all of them, limited, so that they wouldn't have been able to accomplish, through their union, the One. But His simplicity is endlessly rich. That's why, the mind united with Him, it no longer needs to pass to something else, but the mind finds in Him its eternal resting. This resting is, though, for the "One" is endlessly rich, and He isn't a petrification or a boredom, but He is a "steadfast movement", a ceaseless deepening into love. One can say that this writing is a synthesis between the abstract thinking of Dionysus the Areopagite and the full of enthusiasm feeling of Saint Simeon the New Theologian. Its author anticipated, by describing the fiery feeling of the soul in union with the Person or with the godlike Persons, the full of feeling character of the feminine mysticism from Occident, but he maintained, in the same time, as reason of his feeling, a profound theological consistency.

The "One" is transcendent to creation, and He isn't immanent as at Plotinus, for only Thus He truly is One and source of all unity. But He doesn't remain locked up in His unity, but He gets out, through all His works and masterpieces, towards us, in order to elevate us to the union with Him.

The mind unites with Him and it finds its unity and simplicity, or it finds itself and its resting, by ceasing the movement from an idea to another, form a thing to another, from a passionate attachment to one or another of the created things, for it surpasses itself. This means that only by forgetting about the self, in the love for another subject, our subject find himself again in his fully concentrated unity. This is for he is made for being elevated above himself, through a total and fiery love which he entirely focuses on, as the bird is made for flying.

In the perseverance which the author speaks with, about the abyss of the "One", we could see a resemblance to the thinking of Meister Eckart of Jacob Böhme. But at Kallistos the Katafygiote, this abyss is an abyss of the love, namely of the eternally existing Person, and not that one of an abstract essence; His hiding is the hiding of the indefinite Subject Who, in the same time, can be intuited through all realities.

We reckon that this writing may be considered as the most beautify of all the Philokalist writings, due to its theological profoundness, and due to its fiery feeling.

But, just for that, it is very close to the writing entitle "The Paradise" (in 80 or 83 heads) wrote by Patriarch Kallistos, a writing characterized by the almost equally fiery description of the soul's feeling, a feeling lived in union with God in love.

We have in this dizzying writing, a description of the encounter of the mind with the godlike "One". It is a description having the theological height of the Areopagite's writings, which this writing is influenced by, but this writing is too, a Christianizing of the neo-Platonic philosophy of the "One" (see, for instance, the head no. 43), by more insistently highlighting His personal character, and for the great importance it grants to the feeling of love in relation with Him.

We have in this writing the same highlighting of the absolutely necessary role of the Holy Ghost in the union with God and in the fiery feeling of the love for God in this union. The bridge between the created soul and the transcendent God, it is built up by the Holy Ghost, and only by Him. The Holy Ghost elevates us out of nature, out of our speculations about God, which we do from distance, and the Holy Ghost elevates us to Himself, and, by this, to our true nature (see heads: 74, 75, 81, 82, 84). We have here the affirmation of the same need for making our mind imageless (ανίδεο – heads: 58, 33), simple (heads: 20, 30, 51, 91). The godlike light, seen by hesychasts, it is deepened in endless ascensions (idea taken from Saint Gregory of Nyssa and from Saint Maximos the Confessor). By surpassing everything that is understood, the mind is, in the same time, a supra-luminous darkness, a term taken from Dionysus the Areopagite. The term αείβλυτα (always springing out) mentioned in the two writings of Patriarch Kallistos (heads: 53, 86) can be found here too, both in this form (head no. 72) and in the form as απειρόβλυτος (head no. 49).

Even more than that, itself the "Method in 100 Heads of Kallistos and Ignatius", not only that it uses the same characteristic terms, but it also affirms as supreme ideal - to be reached by the spiritual man – the union of the soul with the "One" (head no. 38). Equally common both to Kallistos the Katafygiote and to the "Method" of Kallistos and Ignatius, it is the idea that the prayer reached at its peak, it has gone out of movement, no longer being possible to fall off this state (Method, head no. 38). The spiritual atmosphere, the impetus of love and of sinking and of eternal resting in the endless abyss of the God's love, they are the same in the writing called "The Paradise", wrote by Patriarch Kallistos, in his writing about prayer, and in the writing belonging to Kallistos the Katafygiote. The only difference would be that this atmosphere and these themes reach, in the writing belonging to Kallistos the Katafygiote, a higher degree, or an ultimate degree of enthusiastic and flaming feeling.

This writing, placed at the end of both the Greek Philokalia and the Byzantine spirituality, it represents not only a magnificent synthesis of the whole spiritual writing from before it, but it is also a peak of the thinking subtlety and of the Byzantium's feeling of intense spirituality.

Of Kallistos the Katafygiote,

Preserved Heads, out of the All-High and of Right-Judgment (Syllogistic) Heads about the Godlike Union and the Contemplative Life

1. Any being finds, naturally, resting and pleasure, in the higher work of his nature. That's why any being rejoices of it and it attaches itself to it, the most. So, the man too, as one having mind, and as one whose life it naturally belongs the cogitation to, he is sweetened and he is imparted with resting, especially when cogitating at the high realities and as the thing about himself, be it these ones called, by somebody, as good, or beautiful. And this truly happens when the man had God within his mind, and when the man cogitates at God's features, for God is the highest being, cogitates with the mind and above-mind, and for God loves the man in the highest and above-mind mode, and for God honors the man with the highest honors and with the above-human-mind His good things; and this is forever.

2. Any kind of birth makes the born one wot be alike the one who gave him birth. This is for the Lord said: "what is born out of body, it is body, and what is born out of Ghost, ghost it is" (Jn. 3: 6). Consequently, if the one born out of Ghost, he is Ghost, it will be obvious that he will be also god, according to the Ghost Who gave him birth, since the Ghost - Whom the one born by Ghost is partaker to - He is true God too. This is for God has His name (θεος) from: to see (θεωρεις). Consequently, the one who doesn't see (who doesn't contemplate), or who hasn't been found worthy ever since his spiritual birth and impartation, or who, by being found worthy of it, he afterwards closes his seeing power because of his lack of skillfulness and he stupidly turns himself away from the godlike rays cogitated with the mind around the Sun of the Righteousness, Who is cogitated with the mind, namely after that man has been made partaker to the seeing power, and now he unhappily deprives himself of its work, despite he tends to holiness.

3. All the existing realities have received their movement from the One Who has created them, according to their rationality and nature, and therefore the mind too. But the mind's movement lasts forever, meaning that is endless and borderless. So, it is against mind's worthiness and nature, to be moving in a limited and bordered manner. And this happens when the mind moves amongst the limited and bordered thought. This is because of being impossible that the object to be limited and bordered, and the mind's movement regarding that object, to advance endlessly. So, the ceaseless movement of the mind needs an endless and borderless object, which the mind to move itself towards, according to its rationality and nature. But there isn't anything truly endless and borderless, except God Who is One by nature and in the proper meaning. So, the mind must stretch towards the endless and actual One, namely towards God, and the mind must look at Him and to move towards Him – for this is characteristic to the mind's nature[1038].

4. Endless and borderless are also the realities contemplated around God. But neither in these ones the mind consummately finds its resting. This is for the mind searches for "The One out of Whom". This is for anyone rejoices, naturally, of the one who is like him. So, by being the mind one according to its nature, though the mind is many according to the acts of the understanding, by stretching itself and by moving itself towards God, the One according to His nature, but Who is many according to His work, the mind cannot fully rejoice before penetrating through the Ghost into The One borderless by nature, passing from the many[1039]. Only in The One God, therefore, the mind can fully rejoice. This is for each one of the existences rejoices of what is naturally characteristic to itself. But naturally characteristic to the mind, it is to move, to stretch, to reach, and to fully rejoice of God, the Only One Who is One, simply and limitlessly.

[1038] The mind, by being always in movement, it actually needs an object which the mind to endlessly occupy itself with. This object must be in itself endless and borderless. As such, that object which the mind must focus on, it must be that One Who has everything in Himself. This is because, if the One had been one of many, He couldn't have been borderless. In that had been the case, the mind should have been eternally passing from one to another and the mind wouldn't have ever found an object according to its borderless movement. So, the mind wouldn't have been able ever to rest within the endless One. Of course, there seems to be a contradiction between resting and the endless movement. But these two states are reconciled when the mind enters the endless One. Then the mind reaches its borderless movement and its resting. The endlessness of the movement it has found the endless which the mind no longer has to pass from, to something else; in Him the mind has found its resting. The mind has reached that "steadfast movement", or that "mobile stability", which Saint Gregory of Nyssa spoke about. This is no longer an actual "object", because of being possessed by understanding, so that it is limited. The infinite "Object" of the mind is actually a subject: He is the supreme godlike Subject. By and large, a subject is truly understood by another subject; only between subjects, there can be accomplished an understanding. This is because a subject can understand himself only through the mediation of another subject, by being helped by that subject to understand himself. The object cannot be understood through himself. And then, the object leaves me into darkness. It doesn't' help me to understand. But in another's subject understanding, I am, in the same time, endlessly advancing, especially in understanding the godlike Subject. I am resting myself into Him, for I no longer have to pass from something to something else; but I still advance into understanding. This is for I will never exhaust Him by understanding Him, and I won't ever get exhausted in my understanding. And by understanding Him, I understand the objects too.

5. The whole movement of the created realities, and therefore the mind's too, it hurries up towards stopping and appeasing and it tries to reach to stability and restring in that stability. This is for every created reality asks for its end and resting. But the mind is the only created reality that, by moving itself amongst the created realities, it cannot achieve stopping and appeasing. This is because, what is created, when reaching the end appropriate to it, since it has begun, the endless movement of the mind, it remains, rightly so, as such, and it asks for something which the mind endlessly to move towards. The mind wont' get appeased and the mind won't be able to reach its target, or within mind there won't take place an endless movement, as we've just said before, if the mind locks itself up amongst the bordered and limited realities. But this is far from the mind's nature, which, obviously, it is always moving. So, it isn't characteristic to the mind to find its quietude or stability into the created realities. But where the mind could use from, what is characteristic to the mind, namely to remain steadfast in movement and to appease itself in this meaning and to be at peace and to receive a true feeling of resting, if not from The uncreated and uncircumscribed One[1040]? And this One is God,

[1039] Even Saint Gregory of Nazianzus and Saint Maximos the Confessor, they said that God is of infinite times above His infinity and above all His infinite features (Saint Maximos, Gnostic Heads, I, 49-50; The Romanian Philokalia, II, p. 140-141). But the author of the present writing specifies that, the fact that God is above His features, it is explained by that that He is The One "out of Whom" these ones are. He is their Subject.

[1040] The mind cannot use what is characteristic to itself, namely the mind's endless movement, which must be, in the same time, resting, except into the borderless One, from Whom our mind mustn't pass further, namely within Whom our mind rests, or in Who our mind become stabilized, but in the same time the mind moves towards ever-more understanding. Only into Him our mind can be "steadfast through movement", or "it moves in stability".

Who is One understood in actual meaning, and Who is above the world. So, our mind must reach, through movement, in This and uncircumscribed (borderless) One, in order the mind to find its natural quietude and in order the mind to achieve the resting of understanding[1041], as it is due. This is for, no mind reached in That One will be lacking, by any means, the stability into the Ghost, or the wonderful resting, of the endless Who is the end of all realities, or the movement. This is for the mind has reached into the borderless, the limitless, and uncircumscribed, and imageless, and without countenance, and totally simple One. And this is One Who we have been talking about: God.

6. If God makes His angels ghosts - as David says (Ps. 103[1042]: 4) -, and if the people born by the Ghost are made ghost by God too, as the Lord said (Jn. 3: 6), then the man too will be angel and born out of Ghost through the manifested impartation with the Him[1043]. But the angel's thing is to ceaselessly look at the face of our Father Who is in heavens, as, again, the Lord said (Mt. 18: 10). So, the one who is manifestly imparted with the Ghost, rightly so, he also must look at the face of God, but he also must tend towards what he is looking at[1044]. That's why the Prophet David too, he teaches us by saying: "Search for the Lord and strengthen yourself; always look at His face" (Ps.

[1041] The "Understanding resting" it means either the resting opposite to the bodily resting, or the meaning of the understanding's resting. This is for into God it is satisfied the mind's thirst for understanding all realities, though advancing, in the same time, in that understanding. In the union with the beloved One, I fully understand Him and I still am always advancing in understanding Him.

[1043] Until here, the mind's resting in God has been explained only out of the nature of the mind's endless movement, and out of the One God, now it is being explained out of the Ghost's work within mind. Only the Ghost liberated the man from the law of the gravitation towards the material realities, imposed to the man by his body. Only the Ghost helps the man to overwhelming the impulses towards the lower things. The Ghost is the "dove" and He makes the man flying "dove" and alike to the bodiless Angel. The whole this teaching about God like One, a One differing from the neo-Platonic teaching about the One, by the fact that this One isn't the immanent foundation of all realities, but He is transcendent, "above world and nature" and the elevation at Him it is being done through the Holy Ghost, and not on a natural way. But the preoccupation with the One, it shows that in the Byzantine culture of the time, there was an interest in Neoplatonism, and this explains the founding of the Neoplatonic school in Florence, by Gemist Pleton, after the year 1453.

[1044] The face of God is the expression of His Subject and it must be looked at, or contemplated, but in the same time, the one who contemplates must tend towards what he is looking at, increasingly more, in order to understand God increasingly better. It is about the same stability and movement in Him.

104[1045]: 4). Therefore, he doesn't guard what is his own, that one who, by becoming partaker to the Ghost and, by reaching to experience the untold birth out of the Ghost, and by being elevated to the worthiness of the Ghost, after that, because of the impression about the apparent abundance of his glory, he closes his understanding feeling for God and he no longer wants to tend himself towards God and towards the godlike things. And he does that, regardless to the fact that the Savior commands us to remain into Him, for He too remains into us, as David says too: "Come to Him, to be you lightened" (Ps. 33[1046]: 5). And truly so, if we do the things which we owe[1047] to, and the things consequent to those, we will see in the light of God-the Father, namely into the Holy Ghost, the light from around God, namely the godlike truth, so that we will not longer happily turn back, because of our lack of understanding, from the godlike rays.

7. The mind reaches to see God, on three ways: by moving by itself, by being moved by another, and on the middle way. The moving by itself it is done only by the mind's nature, by using its will through imagination (imagining). The end of this way is the contemplation of the things from around God, which were, to some extent, imagined by the Hellenes' scholars too. The second way is above nature and it takes place only by the will of God and only through the illumination from God. That's why, the mind is, in this case, totally under the power of God and it is kidnapped towards godlike unveilings and it tastes out of the untold mysteries of God, and the mind sees how the future things will be fulfilled. And the way standing in the middle of the two already mentioned ways, it is a joining, to some extent, of both of the previously mentioned ways. For it is done through the mind's will and imagination, it is the same with the mode of the movement by itself. But it is imparted with the way of the movement through another, because the mind is united, through the godlike illumination, with itself, and now the mind sees, beyond its unity, in an untold manner, God. This is for then the mind gets out of all the seen and told realities from around God, no longer seeing the source of the good or the godhead, neither the wisdom or the-power-giver mastery, nor the Providence, neither something else amongst the godlike realities, but as being itself filled up with the spiritual light and with the joy brought by the godlike fire mixed with the love[1048].

[1047] Tending towards God it belongs to us, it is due to us, though it is being done through the Ghost. This is for, it is characteristic to the mind, to be into the borderless God. But the mind cannot jump up into the transcendent One by its own power, as this can happen according to Neoplatonism, where the One is immanent to the world. Rightly so, Lossky sees as ensured through the transcendence of the One, His personal character, unlike the Neoplatonism where the One is an impersonal essence (Essai sur la théologie mysthique de l'Eglise orientale, Aubier, 1944, chapter: The Divine Darkness).

8. The mind, using its imagination in order to contemplate the unseen realities, it is advised by faith. And when illuminated by grace, the mind received the strengthening of the trust. Finally, when kidnapped by the godlike light, the mind becomes treasury of love towards people, and all the more towards God. Thus, the job and the threefold movement of the mind become consummate, deifying, sure, and steadfast, through faith, hope, and love. And, by reaching in this wide place from the top of the city, as somebody would say, the mind has been placed in safety in the love's stronghold. This is for, as Paul said, "the love suffers all things, it endures all things", for the good of the faith and of the hope. "The love, he says, it never falls" due to its fiery union and for the untold connection with God[1049].

9. Nothing is, amongst the created realities, consummately one[1050]. This is for, it isn't difficult to see that [1048] The first mode of seeing God is the natural mode. This is actually a contemplation of the God's features, through cogitation, and the cogitation uses, somewhat, the imaginings too. The second mode is above-nature, produced within mind exclusively by the godlike illumination. This one kidnaps the mind to seeing and tasting the godlike mysteries and to know the future things. The third mode is a mix of the two previously mentioned modes. The cataphatic (the affirmative) is combined with the apophatic (the negative). The mind cogitates too, but it is helped by the Holy Ghost to see in the realities known with the mind the realities which exceed the understanding. This mode of seeing God exceeds the intellectual knowledge of God's features, for the man's understanding penetrates to the experience of the full of meanings luminous light, but also above understanding, which irradiates out of God, and it is filled up with the joy produced by the fire of God's love.

[1049] In the state of the fait, the soul if far from God, cogitating at God's features. Through hope the soul is on the way, by having something out of God, something that has come to welcome the soul. Through love, the soul is totally in the arms of God.

[1050] Somebody may say that the soul, though created, it still is one. But the soul needs to combine himself with the body. Besides that, the soul is in a dependency on God. So, the soul "gets composed" with God, by nature, without God "to get composed" Himself with the soul, each one differs from another, through some own feature. But, because of being created, no one differs from another, each of them having a beginning and an end, being them under nature, and not being, actually, one in a simple manner. "One" truly is only the Uncreated One, for He is simple, without beginning, without end, and borderless, and, that's why, limitless. And This One is God.

Only by looking towards This One, through impartation with the-life-maker Ghost, the mind receives at its turn, daily, its due growth, its unity, its simplicity, and its state of deification being strengthened[1051]. This is for, we know for a fact, that without the One and without looking at Him into the Ghost, we cannot achieve an increasingly-better mind. This is because the mind has become scattered, and weakened, by the much-divided world and by passions, and the mind needs an above-world power and it need looking at the "One" Who is above-nature, for, by being the mind kidnapped out of the divided realities, to get out of passions and out of division and to achieve the godlike image[1052]. This is because the world, by seeding into the mind the worshipping of many gods, and the mind - by looking at them and by serving them - to be persuaded to move against its own nature and to be the mind made to lust for all sorts of passions and to lust for lie instead of truth and virtue[1053]. That's why, the Holy Ghost urges us through the Prophet, by saying: "Come to Him, namely to the One, and be illuminated" (Ps. 33[1054]: 6); and in another place: "I firstly am by nature. In the same mode the angel "gets composed" with God. So that, the angel's quality as creature, it doesn't allow either the angel to eminently be one.

[1051] The mind's unity and simplicity are maintained and are strengthened, at their turn, only through God, only by looking at God. This is for, by being God One and borderless, the mind that looks at God, it no longer divides itself amongst many objects, and it no longer gets torn in its work. In this meaning, God is the source and the upholder of the soul's unity. This is for in the soul's unity are gathered up not only all the soul's powers and works, but also the God's power is being communicated increasingly more, to the soul, in the communion that the soul has with God.

[1052] Looking at The above-nature One, namely at the One Who is above the composed creation, the mind is kidnapped from looking at the composed and multiple realities, or, the mind gets out of the composed realities and it take the "image" of the borderless One, and the mind becomes thus, itself one and borderless, or the mind actualizes these qualities to itself.

[1053] The virtue belongs to the mind's unity and the virtue promotes the mind's unity, for the virtues represents the overcoming of passions as forms of the egotisms fighting to each other. The truth too, it cannot be but in unity, because ethe division weakens the reality and it makes it non-understood.

God, and I am after, and except Me there is no other God" (Isa. 41: 4; 44: 6); and again: "Listen, Israel, your Lord God is One Lord" (Deut. 6: 4). The living of the one godhead's Hypostases it doesn't divide the one Reign. The Persons truly are Three, but, regardless, God is One, in being, in power, and in will, in work and in all His other existential features. So, serving to God's unity, looking at it and gathering yourself towards it, with the whole your power, by getting out of the many realities, it is God's will and it is improvement of the mind, as it is also a way to find out the truth, and it is fruit of the godlike love and of the deification.

10. If the many divisions are a lie, and the One is the truth, the mind that is elevated into the Ghost towards the One, towards the One Who is above world, towards the One Who is raised above all realities, towards the One out of Whom the many realities are, then the mind will be elevated towards the Truth Himself. And if the mind won't be able to become free of passions if the truth doesn't set the mind free (Jn. 8: 32), it will be also obvious that the mind will become free of passion when goes towards and when it is elevated, in a unique mode, towards the One Who is above world. So, the mind is helped to achieve the dispassion, and the state of deification, and the godlike adoption, mostly by the freedom, and by no means by slavery[1055]. That's why "the servant – he says – doesn't' know what his Lord does" (Jn. 15: 15). But, while the nescience is characteristic to the servant, it is obvious that the one who has been imparted with freedom, he knows the Father's mysteries, and he is allowed to ascend, well and beautifully, towards the worthiness of the adoption. This is for, as not knowing it obviously means the opposite of the knowing, likewise the law of the servant is decidedly opposite to the law of the son. And while the one who doesn't know, he is a servant, the one who knows, he isn't a servant by any means, but he is a free man, or better said, he is a son. Likewise, while the Ghost of the truths sets us free, by itself this fact the Ghost makes the one whom He is within, as sons of God. "As many you bear the Ghost of God, he says, you are sons of God" (Rom. 8: 14)[1056]. So, while looking at the One Who is above nature, it means searching for the truth, and the truth gives the freedom as a gift, and the freedom is the sign of the godlike adoption, and if nothing is greater than this grace of the adoption, and if nothing else is reckoned as more appropriate to the rational nature, then it will be very rational and as necessary as one can get, that the mind to tend to, to search for, and to gather itself up, while being carries by the Ghost, with the whole power, towards the One Who is above-world, namely towards God[1057].

[1055] The passions show the soul's slavery. The dispassion is the liberty's sign. The dispassion opens the soul for God. And into God there is freedom. God is the borderless width, that gives the soul power to widen himself endlessly, in order not to remain attached to a limited thing, and in order the soul not to attach, to one at the time and unwillingly, to the limited things. By being into God, the soul is open to the whole, the soul is open to the bottomless depth, or to the limited-by-nothing height. Nothing stopes the mind from extending, from growing up in its content, and to embrace the whole.

11. This is for the Holy Ghost says: "Your Lord God, One Lord is" (Deut. 6: 4). By this, the Ghost's godhead elevated the man's mind towards the One from above world. This is because of not being allowed to preach about the One, while we do not turn our mind and our look towards Him. What the Holy Ghost says, He wants to be understood too. And understanding something, it presupposes tuning the mind towards that something[1058]. This is because, if it lacks the turning of the mind towards what is to be understood, it will lack also what the mind would want to understand. In such a case, preaching about The One it would be absurd (purposeless), as absurd would be the [1056] The Ghost sets us free from the body's law, from the nature's law, by strengthening our ghost that is free by nature. But the freedom of the one who is born out of the Ghost, it isn't a freedom of an individual who doesn't care about anything, but it is the freedom of the son. The son is free, but he is free in his love for the Father, and he is free to advance in the limitless love of the Father for him, and the son too, he increases in his love; the son is free to mastering upon all things, for all the things belong to his supreme Father.

[1057] This isn't a necessity that is accomplished by itself, namely it isn't a natural necessity, but it is a necessity required by the ghost, in order the ghost to grow up and to be accomplished. Likewise, it isn't a nature's rationality, that is imposed by itself, but it is a rationality required by the rationality of the spiritual accomplishment, by the committing of the existence's meaning.

[1058] This is what said before. The teaching about the One God, it would remain empty theory, if the Ghost didn't help us in order to elevate us towards Him, in order to reach to experience Him, and in order to have our life into Him. And this is done by the Ghost for He spiritualized the mind, namely the Ghost liberated the mind of passions, or of the passionate attachment to the limited things. One can reach the truth by removing his passions, namely through spiritualization. This is because the addiction took place as a falling into sin, in passions. And this is a falling off truth too. The truth is the unity, and the elevation into unity is a matter of spiritual and moral effort. So, this elevation of the mind towards the One it requires also the mind's will to turn towards Him.

faith in Him too. And if these ones were absurd, then, cogitating The One by turning and raising the mind towards Him, it would be even more absurd.

12. If the created and rational realities tend, by nature, towards the cause and their search for it by turning themselves towards it, and if all the realities have God as their cause, and God is the peak and The One in a simple mode, it will mean that the mind tends, by nature, and it searches for The One Who is the peak and Who is The One in a simple mode, turning itself towards Him as towards its cause.

13. If "out of Him, through Him, and towards Him are all realities" (Rom. 11: 36), and amongst all realities there is the mind, then the mind too, it is out of Him and through Him. End the mind is even in a special way out of Him and through Him, due to its likeness to God. Consequently, the mind, more than all the other realities, it must look at God. And the words "towards Him" show that the mind must search by turning itself towards the showing of The One Who is above the world. So, the mind must look at "The One".

14. The many realities come out of The One, but The One doesn't come out of the many realities. The creation shows the many realities. So, the creation is, obviously, out of The One. And The One is above creation, as Maker and Builder. So, the one who contemplates the creation as he should, he necessarily will conclude out of contemplating the creation, that there is One above-world. This is for the caused realities, they are very many echoes, out of which it can be known The One Who has brought to existence, through His craftsmanship, wisdom, power, kindness, and taking care, all the realities, as he wanted. That's why, Isaias too, he says into the Ghost: "Raise your eyes and see Who has shown you all these things?" (Isa. 48: 26). By saying "all of these" he named the many caused realities, and by saying "Who", he wanted to elevate the mind towards The One out of Whom all these realities are, and Who is, by nature, One in a simple mode.

15. The creation too, it is gathered in a unity, but is also composed, and it has many parts, and it is not without a beginning, since it is created. But, The One Who creates, He is not The One only as One resulting out of many and diverse things, as a symphonic whole having a sole purpose, but also for, by not being created, he is the beginning cause and before beginning, of all the realities. The mind, by raising itself towards the ultimate realities, it necessarily reaches something that is The One as beginning and ordering the seen order, of the making, of the harmony, and of the cohabitation of all the existing realities, in a unity. This is for, otherwise, the creation went backwards, endlessly, and that would be absurd. This is for, everything that moves and becomes, there was a time when it didn't exist; and if it didn't exist, it means it started existing on a moment in time. And if started existing, it means it was set in movement. But then, we must search for the One Who has set everything in movement, and Who has brought everything to existence. That One must also be totally motionless[1059]. This is because, if not so, who is the one moving the one who isn't under another power, since he is uncreated? And if he is being moved, he will be changeable too. And if it is so, of course he is simple, lest by being composed, to be changing the one who we have seen that he is unchangeable. This is for the composition is the beginning of the stability[1060]. So, at That One there is no composition so that a greater stability could result later on. And there isn't such a stability in order there not to be undoing too[1061]. And there is no undoing, in order there not to be change

[1060] Since something has been composed, its stability has started too, a stability that the movement has brought that thing to; namely, that thing started having its own shape. God, by being non-composed, there mustn't be a precedent movement in order Him to be composed. But the author of the present writing, he combines in a characteristic manner, the speculative logics with experiencing God. He logically proves that God is One above the world, and that our mind tends towards Him as towards The One. But our mind cannot raise at That One, except through the cleaning of passions and this raising consists of an imprinting of His within the mind, through the mind's looking at Him, and through the Holy Ghost. He combines in an original mode, the logics and the mystique. One leans against another. The Orthodox East hasn't separated these two, as the Christian Occident has done it by only keeping the speculation, or the cataphatic, as for instance does Vl. Lossky, by exclusively keeping the mystique or the apophatic (Essai sur la théologie de l'Eglise d'Orient, Paris, 1944). In Occident only at Nicolaus Cusanus we can found this joining, due to the influence the Christian East had upon him.

[1061] At God there is no stability as result of the movement, because, if that had been the case, starting again the movement into Him it would have led to decomposition. At God there is a stability not-produced by movement, in order Him not to be submitted, by moving, to an undoing too. At God the stability is eternal. But it is a stability that masters upon movement. The author has proven thus, in an interesting way, the Aristotle's formula about God as the motionless mover.

and move at the unchangeable and motionless One. He moves, but He isn't moved, and He is necessarily non-composed too, and that's why He is all-simple and absolute the One above world. And the mind stretching towards Him, it goes out of all realities and on all ways, due to the looking at The One Who is above kindness, and due to the desire for The One Who is above all realities, or, better said, the desire for the One out of Whom all the realities are, and towards Whom all the realities tend naturally[1062]. And by taking that one place, as it is due, the mind also gets out of passions. This is for the mind that has been elevated even above to kindness[1063], it hardly can remain in the shame of the passions. That's why, the Law says: "You will serve only Him" (Deut. 6: 16), namely to The One who is One. So, we must tend towards the One from the top, if we want to fulfill also the law of God and to be us above passions.

16. "Only the Lord, he says, was leading them and there was no foreign god with them" (Deut. 32: 12). Can you see the power of The One and Only? There was no foreign god with them, for the Lord alone was leading them. But the Lord doesn't guide the ones who turn themselves away from Him. When somebody follows someone, that means he turned himself towards that someone. If we don't want, thus, to have with us a foreign god, namely the devil or some addiction, we will have to follow to The One and Only, by turning our mind towards Him, in order to be said about us, rightly so, and to be believed that "The Lord alone guides them and there is not foreign god with them".

17. So, the many realities are, all of them, out of The One, but they diversely are out of The One, for also the way these realities come out of the first unity, it is a diverse one. This is for some of those are started and created; others are uncreated and lacking a temporal beginning. But to all of them and all the time, their cause is The One Who is above nature. But this is to some of them through creation, and to some others of them through nature[1064]. That's why, we don not get closer to all of those on the same way, and we do not impropriate them to ourselves on the same way. But, to the realities which are under mastery and in the state of the creation, we must get closer to them for som4ething else, and not for themselves, as we get closer to the mirror for what the mirror shows as image. Thus, we get closer to creation not in order to get us improved, but in order us to see the Supreme One within it[1065]. But, to the without beginning realities and which are out of Him by nature, we get closer to them also for The One Who those realities are out of. To those realities, we truly must get closer for themselves, and to them is close, by nature, the Culminant One. Better said, those realities are, by nature, close to the Supreme and from the top One. That's why we mustn't only to get closer, but we also must grow up into those realities, and we must strive through those realities, towards imitating the Prime and Unique Good, in order us to be imprinted by Him, and thus, through the together-working and with the help of the grace, us to achieve the dignity of the glory of the image of and of the likeness to God[1066]. Thus, the realities caused out of creation, when rightly looked at, they raise our mind through that looking at, to mirroring the One, and they unite our mind, by untying it of all things, in a simple mode, with the unitary meaning of The One, if our mind looks at them as it is due. And the realities which have The One as their cause and worker, by nature, for That One gives the mind a shape alike theirs, they have the power of uniting the mind with Himself That One[1067].

[1062] The One, in this teaching, He isn't the object of a simple logical and speculative doctrine, but out of Him it irradiates a power that attracts the mind, for the mind by looking at Him, on the basis of that attraction, and the mind detaching itself from the many and limited realities, the mind it becomes, at its turn, one, namely the mind is strengthened too, in unity.

[1063] "The above-kindness realities" are the features of God. The mind is elevated even above those, when looking at the Subject Whom those features irradiates out of.

[1064] Saint Maximos the Confessor, Gnostic Heads, I, 50: The Romanian Philokalia, volume II, p. 141. But the present author draws some original conclusions out of that teaching.

[1065] More limpidly said, the creation doesn't improve us through itself, but the creation improves us if we see The One through it. The creation cannot elevate us, by itself, above ourselves, since the creation is below us.

[1066] It is affirmed our possibility to non-mediately encounter the God's kindness, and His love, and His power, and through them there can take place the imprinting of their godlike Subject, on our mind itself, or on our subject who encounter them. It is often repeated the affirmation that by itself the mind's looking at God, and under the power of God upon our mind, God is imprinted on our mind, giving our mind His image of kindness, of love, of holiness, and of limitless.

[1067] By looking through the created realities, the mind gets united with the meaning of That One Who has created those realities. But, by uniting itself with the realities which irradiate, by nature, out of The One, the mind gets united with Himself The One, or with the Subject of those energies.

Consequently, out of all the realties caused on any way, either through creation, or through nature, the mind can gather itself together in a natural manner, e8ither by doing, or by contemplating, towards The One Who is the unique cause in diverse modes[1068]. And if the mind, by using either one or many from the created realities, or out of the realities natural to God, it isn't used for The One, neither in order to bring itself, gathered together, to the First One and to look wholly, unitarily, and simply, only at Him, in a holy impartation and influence of the illuminating Ghost, this is reckoned as a sin of the mind, even if this use leaves the impression of being good. This is because, the ones who use, as it is due, the realities which are from The One, those ones must bring these realities against back to the One. "The whole exit of the luminous showing, started from the Father and come to us, as a good gift, it fills us up like a unifier power and it turns us again upwards, towards the deifying unity and simplicity of God, the One Who gathers all realities together. This is for, out of Him and towards Him are all realities". And if the mind doesn't gather itself together and it doesn't raise towards Him, then the mind will have been deviated from its nature and the use of the things will no longer be done in a due mode.

18. There is a doing that precedes the contemplation and there is a doing succeeding the contemplation. The first one is done bodily, in order to give to the mind that has restrained the body's impulses and that has made the body to behave in good order, power in order the mind freely step in its things, which are the spiritual realities, and there to work well, what is useful to the mind. And the second one, starting from the mind and from the cogitation into Ghost, it gathers the mind together, towards the One Who is above mind, and Who is God, and to Who getting the mind closer, the mind actually gets closer to The One. This is for God is One.

Then the mind itself unites with itself, in a unity, and so the mind becomes undivided. This is for The One is causing the godlike unity and the simplicity, when contemplated. This is because it is impossible to the mind, by contemplating The One, not to be, at its turn, one and simple. Likewise, by looking at the divided and composed realities, the mind immediately becomes divided and diverse.

I've called as The One, simply, The One Who is simple by Himself. This is for the mind, by enduring the changes after working, and the mind itself being simple, it is necessarily simple also after working only when seeing The One. And if the mind had seen The One, while the mind had been divided at least in two, which would have been the cause making a part of it to differ from another, which sees The One? If that had been the case, the mind either would have been able to see something else, or it wouldn't have seen anything. And this last thing could have been happened due to three reasons: either because the mind not wanting to see, or due to its bluntness, or because of being made for another work, but not for seeing. But, if somebody supposed that the mind sees something else, behold the mind wouldn't simply see The One, but the mind would see two things, contrary to the rationality. And by seeing two things, the mind couldn't have been one. This is for the mind, as it has been shown, it gets cut in the realties it contemplates. And if the mind hadn't seen, this wouldn't have been because of not wanting, for the rational mind cannot be unworking even for the shortest instant. But neither the mind could have been blunt in this regard and sharp in another regard. In such a case, the mind would have been composed, and not simple; in such a case, the mind would have consisted of some non-resemblant parts, like a part of the mind would have been appointed to seeing and another one would have been appointed to other kind of work. Because this too, it would have been a sign of the composition. But this is totally inappropriate to be said, taking in account the mind's simplicity. For these reasons, when the one and simple mind contemplates The simple One, the mind must be one in working too. And if the mind is one in a simple mode, then the mind must be one in working too. And if not, the mind won't benefit anything, and the mind will work or contemplate vainly. This is because, since the mind is submitted to division, the mind will be the worker of the passions, because of not being carries by the soul's feeling towards the unitary union with The One Who is above mind. And only this union can clarify and clean up the mind's sight, and to elevate it and to direct it towards The One, and by making the mind experiencing the attaching to That One out of Who, through Whom, and into Who, there are all the realties, and towards Who are made and are existing all the realities[1069].

19. The godlike and above-mind union, with the soul, it is the highest of the desired good things. But the godlike order required the likeness to God. And for the likeness to God, one needs the mind's work, namely the contemplation (seeing)[1070]. For this is characteristic to God too, and from this work (θεωρία) God is called by us with the name Θεός. So, the contemplation scends directly to understanding God[1071]. This is for God sends from everywhere, to the seer mind, like some rays, and the seer mind has God as its target. And God is One and above world.

On the other hand, it belongs to the mind's nature to actually become what it sees. This is shown also by the speaker of God voice of Saint Gregory, who says that "the mind sees and it experiences the shininess of God". This is for, what the mind saw, the same the mind experienced, for the mind became alike. "The mind is colored, says Peter from Damascus, according to what it sees". And, like by looking at the divided and diverse realities, the mind becomes divided and diverse, likewise, by being elevated to looking at The Simple and Above-World One, the mind becomes one, as I said before[1072]. And if, by reaching into The One, the mind sees The Without Beginning, Borderless, Shapeless, and Simple One – for The One is such -, the mind will [1069] We have here a beautiful logical analysis demonstrating that only if the mind is simple, it will be able to concentrate wholly towards seeing God The One. If the mind had been composed, a part of it would have seen God, and another part of the mind would have remained addicted to things. But if that had been the case, the part remaining addicted to things, it would have disturbed the part contemplating God too. Or, if only a part of the mind had been contemplating God, the awareness of the mind's division it would have introduced a limitation also into God. If that had been the case, the contemplated One wouldn't have been The One.

[1070] The mind's work is the contemplation or the spiritual seeing. It follows to the previous work, that one of the doing, directed upon the body, in order to clean the body of passions.

[1071] Like the sensitive things can be seen for they send some kind of rays to the sensitive eye, likewise God is seen by the mind, for God sends some kind of intelligible (possible to understand) rays, to the mind. Therefore, any kind of contemplation about God, even if seems purely intellectual, it still establishes some kind of contact between God and mind.

[1072] The fact that the spiritual contemplation or seeing of God, it implies the coming of some rays from God to the mind, it has as consequence the fact that the mind - or the subject – it is imprinted with the image of God, namely the mind becomes in His likeness. Thus, the likeness of the man to God it cannot be done without contemplating God.

become, at its turn, without beginning, borderless, shapeless, and simple, according to its work[1073]. And the mind, by experiencing these things, and by being changed thus, it is in a likeness with the godhead, as much as it is this possible. And thus, the mind ascends to the highest amongst the desired good things, to the above-mind and untold union with God. But, in order to do that, the mind must strain itself, with the whole its power, towards hurrying up and towards desiring into Ghost, to reach the contemplation and the seeing of The One Who is above the world.

20. When the mind is divided amongst many realties, or at least between two, it is obvious that the mind cannot see The Simple One, and that's why the mind is bordered, limited, and darkened. This is because thus are the realities which aren't totally simple. But when the mind reaches to a touchless touching with The True One, knowing Him through a sight understanding into the Ghost, and without involving the eyer, the mind becomes without beginning, endless, borderless, imageless and shapeless, it is dressed up with the not-speaking, and it gets accustomed to the silence of the awe, it is filled up with joy, and it experiences the untold realities. But do not reckon that I say that the mind becomes without beginning, endless, and borderless, according to its being, but the mind becomes like that according to its work, for what is changes, it is not the being of the mind, but it is the mind's work. This is because, if the mind had been changed according to its being, when seeing and experiencing the godhead, or when being deified towards seeing God, the mind would have been itself God, according to the being. But, something like that cannot be even someone amongst angels, but like that is the only, the supreme, and the one God Who is God according to His Being. And, consequently, it is absurd to say that the mind is deified according to its being, then we only could say that the mind experiences the deification through itself the work of seeing. So, it isn't characteristic to the mind's nature that its being to be transformed, but only the mind's work is transformed. Besides, if the mind is naturally transformed, as it was said, according to the realities it contemplates, but the mind doesn't contemplate, by any means, the godlike Being, but only the godlike work, the mind won't be transformed according to its being, but according to its work[1074].

[1073] The seer of God, work of the mind, it actually no longer is its work, but it is the work of God within the mind, it is His active ray within the mind. But this work becomes so characteristic to the mind, that the mind lives it like its own. So, we must understand that the seer lives this work as not-begun, borderless, simple, and shapeless.

21. Shining[1075] all the realities out of The One Who is above the world, and they do not detach themselves, by any means, from That One Whom they have taken their being from, but as they have been created by That One, likewise they are uphold and consummate by Him, and there isn't anything in any of them which not to come like a flowing and like a fragrance, out of That truly One Maker[1076]. And all the partakers to existence realities, they almost speak, by unveiling not The One Who is above the world (for This One is above any contemplation of understanding), but a certain ray of The One Who is above the world. That's why, given that all the realities shout out on The One, and all realities tend towards The One, and The One Who is above the world He shows Himself through all realities, it is absolutely needed the mind to be guided, advised, and brought to The One Who is above the world. And this is done, on one hand, by being the mind forced by the urge of many creatures, and on the other hand, by the fact that Himself The Untold Creator says: "I am the life" (Jn. 11: 25); and: "This is the eternal life, they to know You The One and true God" (Jn. 17: 3); and in another place: "Search for the Lord and your soul will live" (Ps.

[1074] The Eastern discerning between the being and the work of God, it allows this teaching to speak about a deification of the mind according to the work, and not according to the being. The scholastic theology, when speaking about a contemplation of God's being, by the mind, in the future life, it should reach the conclusion of a deification of the mind according to the mind's being, and that means a pantheism.

[1075] All the things are shiny for the come from The One Who is luminous light. Rightly so, the Romanian people call the world as "lume", namely luminous light. The physical realities have the luminous light as their ultimate essence. The persons illuminate when the sincerely open themselves to others, so that they are too - in their actualization, as factors of conscious relation - luminous lights. But the physical things are luminous for they have a meaning too, a logos out of the godlike Logos Who is the supreme meaning of all realities. And the persons are luminous, for they are living within their conscience's light, and for they are searching for their own meanings in all realities.

[1076] None of the created realties stands by itself, but all of them are uphold by the Maker, through a work irradiating out of Him (απόρροια), and all of them persist and advance towards their own target, and towards a general target, not through a static connection with Him, but through a power coming out of Him in a continuous irradiation, like the rays of a luminous light source are irradiating continuously.

86[1077]: 33). This is for the sight comes from searching and the life comes from seeing[1078]. He would want to be seen by the mind, in order the mind to get gladdened, to get illuminated, and rejoice, as David says: "Into You there is the dwelling place of all the ones who gladden themselves" (Ps. 86[1079]: 7); and: "Into Your light we will see light" (Ps. 35[1080]: 9). He has made, on one hand, the mind to be seer, and on the other hand, He has sown all His features in all existing realities, so that through them, as through some openings, to show Himself to the mind, in a light of the understanding, conquering the mind, illuminating the mind, and attracting the mind towards Himself[1081].

22. God Who is the Trinitarian One Good, what He did, He did it because He wanted. But God wants the highest good. This is for the kindness is His nature. So, for He has created the mind as seer of Him, and of His realities, and this gathers the seer mind towards The One, it is a thing wanted by God that, the mind to contemplate Him (to see Him). And this is for He is through Himself the supreme Good. This is for God is One in a proper and simple sense, and the fact that the mind searches for Him and unitarily gathers itself towards Him, it is, like it has been shown, the highest good too[1082].

[1078] The seeing transforms the life of the one who sees, for it places the one who sees in connection with a seen content. That's why, when it is seen a source of healthy life, one above the passing life, this source nourishes the life and it elevates the life on an imperishable level. The view, or what is seen, it has an ontological effect – we could say. I do not change myself into life, through seeing, only by following the example of a superior life seen by me, or only for I am influenced by a bad example seen by me. But, out of the source I am seeing, it comes within me a current (απόρροια) of power, in the good or the bad meaning of the word.

[1079] In KJB we have: Psalm 87: 7: "As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there: all my springs are in thee."/ in ROB we have: Psalm 86: 6: "For into You is the dwelling place of everybody who gladden themselves".

[1080] In KJB we have: Psalm 36: 9. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[1081] The Word of God, as Rationality-Subject, He has given to the rationality-subject of the man, His rationalities-objects, materialized in things, in order there to be a common content for the dialogue with the human subject. They are equally many words of the Word-Person, towards the human persons, in order the human person to answer Him, through these ones. The things are the eyes which God looks at us through. The world is like a sift crossed through by eyes, which God-the Word looks at us through, and we too, look at Him.

[1082] God is in Himself, or for Himself, the highest Good. But the mind that is gathered, by seeing, into Him, the mind receiving God within itself, that mind becomes too, by participation, the highest good.

23. If the love usually is one and not-undoable, according to the teaching of the wisemen of God, then One will be the beloved One too. This is because, if the beloved realities had been at least two in number, there would have been two loves too, or the one love would have been divided in two, and it wouldn't have been any longer called as one and undivided. But, since we say that, by and large, the love is one and not-undone, we must understand that the beloved One is One too[1083]. But the One Who is loved, He is before the love for Him, and until somebody doesn't have something out of the beloved One, that somebody cannot have either the love for Him[1084]. And the love means that we must extensively love God, as we are required by the natural and written law of God. The natural law urges our loving of good mind, to search for the greatest good, which is God; and the written law commands us: "You will love your Lord God, with the whole your soul, with the whole your heart, and whit the whole your thought" (Deut. 6: 5); and: "Your Lord God One Lord He is" (Deut. 6: 4). So, One is the worthy of Love One: He is the Trinitarian Unit. And this precedes the mind in the mind's love for God in Trinity[1085]. So, the mind must want to extend itself towards The One Who is above the world, so that by finding Him and by seeing Him, the mind's love to be kindle for [1083] The love cannot be divided. Everything that belongs to the love is concentrated into love. That's why the love is wholly directly towards the beloved one. For this reason, even if the beloved ones are two, the love is directed wholly towards each one of them, and thus the love unites them. And the love suffers when seeing them as wanting to remain divided. The love wants to see the beloved ones as united, in order itself not to be divided. In God this desire of the love is being accomplished. Into God, the loves see all people united, for God is One and in Him everybody have their origin and support. By loving The One God, the love is satisfied in its not-undone fullness. In this case, the love is no longer exposed, to any sufferance.

[1084] The beloved One exists before our love for Him existed. Better said, if there is a love amongst us, there must existed somebody worthy to be loved, before us coming to existence, or before us being capable of loving Him. You must be aware of the beloved One and you must have something out of Him, or you must feel within yourself the quality that makes Him worthy of love, in order you to love Him. If our subject feels the need for loving and for loving in a culminant degree, it will mean that this culminant love existed before any human subject - who feels the need for love – existed, namely it existed before any human love.

[1085] If the one who loves must receive within himself something out of the one Whom he loves, before loving Him, in order that one to be able to love Him, the loved One has to communicate something out of His love to the ones into whom He wants to awaken the love for Him. That means that within the beloved One there must be a love, for Him to communicate out of that love, to the one whose love He desires. But in order to have that love in Himself, before the man existed, He must be in a communion. Thus, God as the supreme source of love and as the supreme Subject worthy to be loved, He must be a God in several Persons Who to still be united through Their love.

Him, and the man to be able to become fulfiller of the law and of the commandment, by loving, according to the things we've just said, his Lord God.

24. It is impossible to the mind that has ascended towards The One Who is above understanding, not to be filled up with love for Him. This is for the mind encounters an untold and non-comprisable beauty, starting from within That One as from an all-upholding root. That's why, when the mind is full with the godlike illuminations, so that the mind is like a fishing net on the brink of getting torn apart because of the load of fish, and the mind is overwhelmed with awe by watching at that above-mind beauty. And, the mind is even drunk as of wine, and the mind gets out of itself, and it experiences a bewilderment above understanding, because of not being able to look at that above-beauty showing of the unusual beauty. For this reason, the mind is kept, to say so, in the chains of the love and the mind feels itself burning as of a great thirst[1086].

This is for This One is and above-understanding One, but He is One preached by all realities as their Cause existing from before, as the beginning, as the end, and as the Upholder of all realities. He has brought to existence the beauties and the good things of all the beautiful and good realities, through a springing out, out of His power, of a making of beauty and good things power, while Himself remaining, endlessly and for infinite times, above all beauty and all kindness, and being Him One above world and without resemblance. Only Him is worthy to be loved, and He is above everything that is worthy to be loved, for only Him is - in an actual meaning – Good and Beautiful, and above anything that is good and beautiful[1087]. Only Him is truly worthy of being loved, through the law of the love and of the order, as the Cause od all realities. And this is all the more, as He exceeds all the realities worthy of being loved, through the overwhelming beauty and kindness and He truly is One above world, as the only One truly existing and causing all the existing realities.

[1086] Other antinomies of the love: the love makes free the one who has it, but the love still keeps him as in chains, for that one cannot forsaken the love; the love satisfies in a consummate manner, but it still persists in it a ceaseless thirst, due to a longing for even more love, a such a big thirst, that the one who loves he seems to be burning, because of love.

[1087] God fills the soul up, when He is seen as One, with so much joy and light, for His unity isn't an abstract, or mathematical, unity, but it is the fulness of life containing all the realities which are above all the world's beauties and good things. Out of God, as the only One Who truly is One, blindingly irradiates all the beauties, all the lights, all the meanings, and all the gifts.

Let's aspire, therefore, through the good zeal, to reach into Ghost to the finding and to the knowledge of The One Who only Him is One, from Who are the beginning of all the realities, and into Who there are the borders of all realities. By doing so, it surely will be opened to us, the gate of the godlike love through the grace of Christ, and we will enter the resting of our Lord (Hebr. 4: 3), in much happiness and gladness, and we will know the joy of being imparted with The One, and we will taste the godlike sweetness, by becoming us, at our turn, one too, and by no longer being torn apart and divided, according to the Savior's prayer towards the Father: "for they to be one, as We are one" (Jn. 17: 22). Then we will be the full guards of the commandment that says: "You will love your Lord God with the whole your soul, and your neighbor as on yourself" (Deut. 19: 18). Then we will have reached the consummation possible to the man. This is for "the end of the law if the love" (Rom. 13: 10). Of this consists not only the whole law and the Prophets (Mt. 22: 10), but also the ones who are consummate into Christ.

25. All realities being naturally united into the Ghost, the division means a falling off Ghost. That's why, also the mind when is divided in its work, it is outside the living into Him according to the grace. And the mind experiences this by looking at diverse things. This is because the mind cannot have the non-division while looking at diverse things. And this is because, if somebody supposed this as possible, he wouldn't be able to easily explain why the quiet mind it differs from the disturbed mind. If that had been the case, the mind of the ones who are carried by God it would have been shown like the one troubled by the passion's disorder, and that is absurd. So, the mind becoming, according to the work, like what it receives, necessarily, when looking at the composed things, the mind becomes diverse too, and, by falling off simplicity, the mind won't be able, any longer, to keep its non-division. And while divided, the mind is less clean of sin than anything, since itself the fact of being divided is reckoned as sin by the ones who can understand these aspects. If, consequently, the understanding power asks the mind for tasting – by looking towards the supreme and from above world One, and in an understanding feeling, and unitarily – the above-nature Good, while living in division, the mind falls off grace.

That's why, we must attach ourselves to The One Who is above the world, and to look only at Him, with the whole our soul, in order us to get rid of division and estrangement. But, not only that, but even if the mind looks at a sole thing, if that thing is a created one, then the mind won't be able to become non-divided. This is because the created one cannot be actually called as simple, since it is limited, composed, and circumscribed; and that's why, no one has the right to be called, simply, One. And the mind focusing its look toward a limited thing, it won't have its work simple and unique. This is for the mind's look will be limited and circumscribed and composed, as it is the thing contemplated by the mind[1088]. Consequently, it will fall off the godlike grace that was making it, before, as [1088] No only when looking towards many things, it is the mind divided and therefore disturbed, but also when looking towards a sole thing, but a created one. This is because a created thing, by being limited, it cannot absorb the whole mind in looking at it, but there remain within mind great reserves not engaged in that looking, reserves which protest against the mind's engaging against the mind's preoccupation with that sole thing, and that causes within man a tearing apart. This is a tearing apart experienced by any of us, almost permanently. In no thing we can find the whole. That's why, with another part of our being, we crave for something else. We are especially not finding the whole, when we consider anything as standing by itself. In such a case the thing still remains unexplained. The thing is potentially composed, by the fact that the thing is connected to the ultimate ground of all things: to God. Only God is explainable through Himself, for He is and He comprise everything. But each thing shows itself as composed, by the fact too, that it is limited. This is because any limit it involved the awareness about something existing beyond that limit (Simeon Frank, La connaissance de l'être). That's why nothing is, in a simple manner, One. This is because by not-comprising all the realities, it presupposes that beyond itself, and next to itself, there are other realities.

But any sort of immanent foundation of the whole, in a pantheistic sense, it cannot be The true One. This kind of one, it is forced by a law superior to it, to diversify, so that it has within itself the multiplicity in a potential manner. That one is nature, and it is not a subject. That one is identical to what comes out of itself. But it is not like that, in the case of the godlike Subject, and therefore neither is like that in the case of the human subject who is created in God's image. The divine energies aren't one with the divine being, and, on the other hand, neither are they one with the created world. The world is created through energies, and not through an emanation out of God. The danger of the pantheism stalks the Occidental theology, that doesn't' discern between uncreated energies and creation. The human subject can remain or he can become, at its turn, one, for he enjoys some kind of "transcendence" from nature. But it is a created transcendence, and not a creator one. But the human subject can be considered as participating to transcendence, for it tend to raise above the created world and for the human subject can find his accomplishment only in the uncreated world. The human subject consciously actualized his limitlessness, and he can live in the limitlessness of the divine Subject, for the human subject has become in His likeness, by receiving His uncreated energy, and by being capable of receiving that energy.

simple, without beginning, and uncircumscribed. And it will be outside The hidden and above-understanding One[1089]. That's why, the mind will be deprived of its glory, that is the joy for being the unique and without beginning origin, of the work, the joy for limitlessness, for simplicity, for having reached imageless and unitary. And the mind won't reach to receive within itself the imprinting of the above-nature and all-untold beauty. Therefore, it is due that the mind to search for and to tend towards The One Who is without beginning, simple, limitless, and truly One, and from there, the mind to hurry up to become illuminated and to join with the original unity, which gathers all realities together and, consequently, the mind will be united with itself. By this, not only that the mind will be loved by The All-Good One, as one that has become, as much as it is possible to the mind, alike the limitless and the simplicity of The One Who is imageless and shapeless, but the mind will even be able to love the godlike and above-nature beauty, for the mind will be, as I said, elevated towards its likeness[1090]. This is for, if in the one who is alike it usually is born a disposition that love the alike realities, it will be obvious that the mind will be love and it will love God, and this is for what is alike, it is alike to someone who is alike it too, and as the likeness has its complement corresponding to it, likewise the one who loves is, at his turn, loved. And between God and the human soul, there isn't a greater communion that this one[1091].

[1089] No longer being in connection with The One, by sight, the mind will be outside the grace, or outside the transforming ray coming from Him. The mind won't be actualized in its simplicity, and it won't receive in that simplicity the endless richness of The One, because of not having the grace of The One Who is truly One, or the connection with Him, and Who comprised within Himself all the realities.

[1090] Only the mind that unites itself with the godlike One, it actually united, through its works, with itself too, becoming one in work, as it is one in being. Only that mind is aware of its limitless unity and it lives that unity. Only by living its limitless unity in working, of its abyssally rich unity, the mind lives the infinitely rich unity of God. But this is valid also vice versa, namely, only by living in intimate relation with the divine Subject, the mind will live the indefinite reality of its own subject.

[1091] "There isn't a greater communion between God and soul". It is about the affection awakened by God withing the man's soul, and vice versa. This affection is not only a thought one, but it is also produced by each one's answering the desire of the another. Of course, God accepts this affection produced by the loving answer of the human soul, only because He wants. The mind's gathering together, from all realities, into God, it is a deed of the love too, it is an affectionate answer of the man to God's desire, and it isn't only an intellectual movement.

26. The mind will ascend above its nature when it consummately ascends at what is above the nature, the mind becoming imageless and shapeless and entirely deified, without beginning and endless, and, to say so, above its own unity[1092]. And when the mind keeps within itself, its understanding, even if still occupied itself with the spiritual and above-senses realities, the mind will move naturally and it will still remain in its nature. And what is above-nature, it exceeds by far what it is according to the nature, and it is far higher. That's why, we must love forcing ourselves to ascend to what is above nature, for that is better, according to the commandment that says: "Crave for the best amongst the gifts" (1 Cor. 12: 31). And the mind, while being in what is above the nature, it will be into God. This is for God is outside any nature, He being the All-Old (All-Original) and simply The One. That's why the mind must tend towards the All-Old (All-Original) and Simple One, and the mind must strive to look towards Him, in order to be elevated for, while being in The One Who is above the nature, in a manner that is above the mind's natural work, to reach a state that is better than the mind's state according to its own nature[1093].

[1092] The mind crossed into an act of total love for God, beyond itself. And for the mind is the highest in the created order, by ascending above itself, the mind is elevated to the divine transcendence. That's why the mind is made for transcendence, namely it implies in itself the relation with the transcendence. But because only the created realities are to the extent of the mind's understanding, by being elevated into God, the mind is elevated to what is above understanding. This is for the plan of the understanding coincides, in a certain way, to the created or the immanent plan. But this entrance into the transcendence plan it is an experience of the infinite and above-world richness, that one hidden in the godlike One.

[1093] The elevation of the mind above its own nature, in the divine and transcendent One, it means ascending above the mind's natural work; it means that God seed His work within the human mind, namely that God elevates the mind through His work, though the mind has impropriated this state also through its own experience. God's transcendence, in the Christian teaching, it doesn't mean locking God in a plan that is inaccessible to the creature, but it simply indicates that God is from another plan than the created, natural, immanent, and submitted to the natural laws plan. It means that there is a possibility for the creature to be elevated above nature's plan; this is for there is a plan which the creature can be elevated on. And for this plan is the plan of the sovereign will and freedom, and of the absolute power upon any law, in manifesting the good, the conscious creature cannot be elevated on that plan, except by the work of the transcendent God. God's transcendence is an active transcendence, capable of and desiring to work upon the plan of the created nature, in order to elevate the created nature on the plan of God's absolute love and freedom.

By being elevated on this plan, the human subject becomes better than he is according to his nature. Thus, the human subject reaches the plenitude of exercising the absolute freedom, unlike on the plan of his created nature where he cannot exercise it plenary.

27. Each one of the existing creatures, it enjoys its own things, and it naturally rests itself in those things. But all these creatures preexisted before, according to their cause, in the All-Original Cause. That's why, the mind will natural reach the true joys and it will have the imperishable happiness and it will endlessly rest itself, when, by crossing through and by leaving all realities behind itself, the mind will stretch itself towards that original, unique, and totally-first cause, and the mind will reach, through an understanding turning, there where all beginnings, all middles, and all ends (targets), of all realities, have come to existence; to the cause in which they have their ground from before, and which all realities are being kept through, and which are brought towards their own target through, the realities which are being consummated; to the cause which they achieve the good experience for, the realities which are imparted with this good suffering[1094], and the cause which the mind too, it has been built up by, like it is. This is for, in some mode, while the mind turns towards the cause of all realities, the mind actually turns towards itself, for that cause is the mind's prototype (model)[1095].

Actually, each one loves himself naturally, and especially the mind is the one experiencing this love[1096]. But by being supra-luminous image of the non-comprised beauty of The One Who is above understanding, the mind looks - through its turning - at its cause, with love, for, as it was said, by looking there it sees itself and it loves on itself above anything[1097]. But also differently: the ones having their being from somebody, they naturally feel an impulse of love towards that somebody whom [1094] The good suffering is the suffering of the happiness, and of the illumination, and of the love. This is for all of these are produced within us by God. Even in the purely earthly live, we cannot achieve the happiness only as a fruit of our own action, but also as a fruit of the love given us, as a gift, by another.

[1095] Only for the mind, by gathering itself into God, it finds itself, helped by its cause and model Who works within the human mind efficiently, and the mind, by exceeding itself, it experiences, paradoxically, in the same time, the fullest happiness or the best suffering. And by this, though reached outside itself, it accomplishes its natural desire for full happiness.

[1096] The mind loves itself more than any other creature, for it is aware of itself.

[1097] Thus, it is reconciled the love for the self with the self-exceeding. In its cause, the mind loves both God and itself. Besides, generally, by loving on another, any subject finds in this his own happiness. The difference from egotism is that my subject doesn't start loving another subject with the intention of finding my own happiness. My happiness will come to me without I, thinking at it, even for a moment.

they have come to existence from, and vice-versa, the parents are mastered by love for the children born out of them. That's why, within the one who turns himself towards The One Who is the everybody's cause, it springs out a great pleasure. This is for that one turns, as I said, in the same time, towards That One and towards himself. And this is for in That One existed from before, in the virtue of the cause, all the realities, so also the mind, as one amongst all, it is in The One Who is above understanding, as in the cause and the model of all realities.

28. Like all the beings are out of the One Who is above-being, out of the One Who is above-nature it is all the nature, out of the non-temporal and incomposite One are all the temporary and composed realities, and out of the uncreated One are all the created realities, likewise the imageless One has made on Himself all the images, and out of the One Who is above-world are all the shown many realties. So, the one who doesn't occupy himself with The Imageless One and who doesn't look at Him, by somehow hanging on Him, but he looks towards something else from amongst the realities seen in image and creation, that one gives primacy to the realities which are incomparably lower than The One Who sits above, and so the human mind will be almost worshipping idols. This is because what somebody occupies himself with, what he aspires to, that something conquers him too. And what conquers the man, that enslaves him too. And thus, a man like this, he ends serving the creation instead of serving the Creator. This is for each one's mind is enslaved by and it served to what he occupies himself with. And that is the things the mind loves. If, therefore, the occupation with something else and the looking at something else than The One Who is simple and imageless, it brings so much sliding away, we must direct our zeal towards The One Who is simple and imageless, in order to know Him through our understanding turning and tending, and in order us to be partakers to the treasures of all knowledge (2 Pt. 2: 9). This is for, the ones who have united themselves with Him, they are imparted with the resting or with the stopping of all contemplation, and with the stopping of all cogitation, and with the above-mind silence, and with the impossible to explain gladness, out of much awe[1098].

29. If all the existing realities desire their existence, and everybody's existence is, according to the cause, in One Who is above existence, consequently, all the existing realities, and especially the rational ones, if the move straight and as it is due, by wanting their existence, they will actually want The One Who is above existence[1099]. So, the mind that doesn't tend towards The One Who is above existence, neither it desires Him, that mind wrongly and sinfully uses its movement and it fall off its worthiness, for the mind's worthiness consists of knowing The One Who is above existence and it consists also of all-godlike and above-mind union with Him, as consists of loving Him too.

30. The causes abundantly have the beauties of the realities they cause. And everybody's cause, by and large, it is The One Who is above being. So, if the mind attaches itself to something amongst the realities which are below The One Who is above being, as a good reality or worthy of mind's attention, that mind will miss, without any doubt, its target. That mind will be loving of good, but it won't move towards the prime and own and above-being One, out of Whom all the good realities are through impartation, but that mind will move, because of its carelessness and nescience, towards the realities which are imparted with goodness. But the mind that searches successfully, it directs the sight of its understanding towards The One Who is above being, by limpidly knowing that thus it will abundantly achieve what it wants, by reaching within its cause through that understanding seeing. Such a mind will know that nobody gives the good things it has, or any other good thing, except The One Who is above nature. This is for, even if the mind reckons that some of those come out of an own power, those ones do not use to always remain in the loving mind. Only the Holy Ghost has been entrusted with doing that, and to work the good things as He wishes, and in whom He wants, for He is Lord of the mastery nature and Person of the Unity in Three Hypostases. So, the mind must turn towards The One Who is above nature. That is for, at Him, there is no only the spring of all good things, but at Him is also the unimpeded sharing of the gifts.

[1098] In the union with The One it ceases the contemplation, or the spiritual seeing. And it even ceases any effort for understanding. This is for it is no longer needed the passing to a greater understanding, to understanding some higher reality. It is a stability in The Same endless or borderless One; it is a stability above any understanding; and therefore, it is an understanding higher than which, there is no other understanding.

[1099] The existence of all realities has its origin in The One Who is above existence, in The One Who is transcendent to the creation that is multiple and composed by nature. ON the other hand, all the existent realities want to exist longer and eternally. Consequently, all of them search for strengthening their existence also in the surplus of existence into the One Who is above existence. If they do not search for in in Him, they will suffer a weakening of their existence.

31. All the existing realities naturally desire the good. And the true good is One, despite being many things called as being good. This is for the good in a simple way, and, to say so, the consummate good, you won't ever find it in the many things, but you will find in those things only a good that is called like that in the virtue of some impartation with the good, for they participate to the good coming out of The One Who is above nature; so that those things reckoned as good, they do not have the good by themselves. Only That One Who is above nature good and simple and above-kindness, and spring of all-kindness and ultimate giver of the realities belonging to Him, and Who naturally turn all realities back within Himself. He is the spring of all being, existence, skillfulness, power, movement, and kindness. Simply speaking, all the existing realities and all the realities contemplated around them, they have their origin, by creation, in The One Who is above being. That's why, the mind that is carried towards something else and not towards The One Who is simple and above being, that mind is moving in a wrong direction. That mind might be moving towards good, but not towards the simple and actual good, neither towards The One Who does the good realities and the better realities and the other realities which need the good and which need better, through an overwhelming outpouring of benefaction.

32. So, the mind of the many, by laying, because of their lack of understanding, in division, and by being torn apart b y many things, that mind doesn't know the Good, namely the One Who is simple, and that mind doesn't search for Him, neither it occupies itself with Him. About those ones, David says into the Ghost: "Many say: who will shown us the good things"" (Ps. 4: 6). But not the Good. And that is rightly so. By taking care of an by toiling for many things, they have forgotten that "only one things is needed" (Lk. 10: 42). This thing, of the part shown by the Word of God, as the good One, they overlooked it, or, by disregarding it, they have lost it, without thinking, at least, that it deserved to be searched for, above all things. And the ones who let themselves be advised by David, as by a pedagogue, and who reckoned that they must step on his tracks, they say: "It has been marked over us the light of Your face, Lord" (Ps. 4[1100]: 6), namely the knowledge of Yor one glory it has imprinted upon us as in a mirror. Thus, the numerous people rejoice of the many good things. And the ones who live spiritually, they are illuminated by the knowledge of The One and simple Good, being they illuminated in an above-world manner[1101].

33. Like the water of a river is bigger when flowing united, than when it is divided in many creeks, likewise the sight of the mind and its movement and its desire, are stronger when the mind focuses unitarily and without division, towards only one thing, and when the mind isn't divided in many and many sorts. And this happens when the mind extends, and it searches for, and it looks at The One Who is simple and above world. This is for One Who is all-simple and above-world, He truly has the power of gathering the mind together. And only when the mind is found worthy of seeing This One, it is impossible the mind not to take His shape – as much as this is possible to the human mind – like an image, and not to become unitary, and simple, and colorless, and imageless[1102], and without any quality, and impossible to reach, and borderless, and endless, and without countenance, and simply one above the world, illuminated by the rays of the godlike love[1103], and above the world, and

[1100] In KJB we have: "There be many that say, Who will shew us any good? Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us."; in ROB we have: "Many say: "Who will show us the good things?" But it has been marked over us the light of Your face, Lord!". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[1101] Here is affirmed an opposition between the people of the many, who rejoice the many pleasures, but all those pleasures being little satisfying, and the few people who detaches themselves from those pleasure and who focus themselves in the endless joy for The One Who is endlessly rich.

[1102] On the other hand, by looking at the borderless One, the mind regains, at its turn, its own limitless, and in this sense the mind takes His image (εικών), which means, in the same time, being free of any define, contoured, or with edges around, image (απεριόριστος). The author says further on: "impossible to reach", in the sense that not thing can reach that and no person can disturb of catch that.

crowned with the unveiling of the mysterious knowledge, of the silence, and of the non-understanding which is above word and understanding[1104], by being delighted with a spiritual joy and with a heavenly gladness. This is for the mind that has reached there, it has been transfigured in a more godlike mind[1105], and it has been dressed up in a godlike shape, by being spiritually imprinted by The One Who is simple, and imageless, and One, and all the other things we said previously. And if this doesn't happen, and if the mind doesn't experience such a godlike transformation, it means that the mind hasn't reached yet, the touching and the imprinting of The One Who is above the world. This is for God is unifier unity and Mind above understanding. That's why, the mind received the His above-world imprinting, when, in the same time with the said things, the mind becomes itself a unity above understanding, experiencing this through the godlike imprinting[1106].

34. The Trinity of the godhead above being, it is joined in an above-nature unity. This is for God is a threefold hypostatical unit. That's why the soul cannot reach the likeness kindred to God, as an image of God, except by remaining threefold, it becomes one with itself in an above-nature mode. And through the three parts of the soul, I do not mean the rational part, and the anger, and the lust. This is because the three parts of the soul do not consist, actually, of the three parts I've just mentioned. To the rational soul aren't too characteristic, the lust and the anger. All of these are taken from the irrational part and are added to the soul for the bodily living from here, themselves actually being irrational and darkened. And the soul is rational and the soul's nature is full of understanding light. We must say that characteristic to the soul are those realities which the soul cannot fulfill its work without. But the soul can work without anger and without lust; and this is valid especially when the soul

[1104] This lack of understanding isn't, actually, an absence of the understanding, but it is an understanding above understanding. That's why the one having it, he keeps his silence, for he realizes that he cannot express it. This kind of understanding illuminates the face of the one who possesses it, more than any other understanding illuminated it.

[1105] On any new level of the union with God, the mind becomes more godlike, not by its being, but by the richer godlike work whose subject the mind has become, through the dwelling of God, with His work, in the subject of the one who looks at God.

[1106] By imprinting Himself, into the human mind, The One Who is imageless and above understanding, the mind itself becomes one and above-understanding.

truly works, namely when the soul works without lust and anger. So, these ones aren't really part of the soul, but, as I said, they are powers of the animal and from below side, of the life, and they stay besides the soul.

That's why, the rational soul, by looking, with understanding, at the realities from above, and by being the soul imprinted with the realities known with the mind, and by extending himself, and, to say so, by jumping over himself, the soul throws somewhere far, as vain trifle, the lust and the anger, because of not having what to use these one for, there where is only simplicity, lack of image, and of shape, and of color, all the other realities requiring an untied and totally simple mind.

The soul is threefold according to its simplicity, for the soul is mind using the word (rationality) and the ghost, which are characteristic to the soul, and it harm less than all things, the soul's simplicity[1107]. This is because neither the Trinity of the one godhead, whose image is the soul, is an impediment to His unity and simplicity, but the godhead is a totally simple and above being unity and, still, no less a steadfast Trinity. Thus, the soul, or the mind (this is for the soul is mind and wholly mind), the word (the rationality), and the ghost, made on an above-nature manner, they show us the actual countenance of the one godhead in three Hypostases. And this cannot come from somewhere else except out of looking as and of contemplating the above-nature trinitarian unity[1108]. This is for this one is the one Who has made the soul too, thus, and Who brings the soul back to this state after the soul has fallen. This is because without focusing and looking at the Trinity, this is impossible to happen to the soul. And if this doesn't happen to the soul and the soul doesn't come to resemblance, we prove ourselves lacking this (trinitarian) mode of being.

[1107] Rightly so, the Holy Fathers know about two trinities of the soul: one consisting of rationality, anger, and lust, and one consisting of mind, rationality or word, and ghost. In the fist trinity, the soul's parts are less united. That's why sometimes the Holy Fathers consider the soul as differing from anger and lust. In the second trinity, the parts are so united that one cannot be cogitated as working without the other two parts. Here the trinity doesn't weaken the unity. The Holy Fathers consider the last-mentioned trinity as image of the Holy Trinity.

[1108] Only by this, the soul is one and threefold, or the image of the Holy Trinity, for the soul have been created for looking not at a unipersonal God, but of a God One in being but threefold in Persons. Even if the soul doesn't consciously look at God as Trinity, the soul still is tied to God as Trinity. The Trinity is being imprinting, starting from creation, ceaselessly, His image within the man's soul.

We say these things about the contemplative work and about truth, which are especially worthy of all zeal and without which it is impossible to us to ascend to the dispassionate state[1109]. This is for like the good requires us the doing in order us to reach dispassionate, likewise the truth requires us contemplation in order us to reach godlike at our image, by serving God in all things and by wanting to become gods through work, and to be us, as much as it is possible, in the likeness of the prime model[1110]. And if we need to become one, in order us to resemble the unity of the above-world model, and this unity is achieved within us by looking at, by contemplating at, by tending to, and by the understanding turning towards The One Who is above the world, and by steadfastly looking at This One, we must forces ourselves on all ways to look towards The One Who is above the world and above understanding and to attach ourselves to Him, wholly and with the whole zeal, with the whole our heart and with the whole our soul, and to nourish, within ourselves, the love for the One Who is above the world and above simplicity, so that His itself the love for Him to become to us simple wings in our understanding ascension towards Him. On this way, we will always be as in heavens, in a unitary and imageless state, together with the Lord (1 Tess. 5: 17), with The true Trinitarian One, and praising with our mind, with our word, and with our ghost, the Trinity, amazed, overwhelmed, and united with The One, unitarily and above-union.

35. The sensitive unity is the beginning of all numeric multitude. And the above-world unity is the beginning of all the seen and thought multitude and of all existing realities. As, therefore, every number has its beginning from unit, likewise all the existing realities start from The One Who is above the world, [1109] Here is don a connection between image and dispassion. The trinitarian image of God within man, re-actualized by contemplating the Trinitarian God, it coincides to the soul's coming back to dispassion. This is because ethe image is disturbed through the passionate attachment to the material things, through anger and lust, or through the weakening of the seer work, a work characteristic to the mind.

[1110] After the author said, in the previous phrase, that one reaches the dispassion through contemplation, now he says that one reaches the dispassion through doing, and that through contemplation one reached to deification. But this contradiction could be solved, if we take in account the fact that before starting advancing towards deification, through contemplation, we must have achieved through doing, the dispassion.

either in His quality as their natural cause, or as their Maker[1111]. But the numeric unit, because of being submitted to the senses, it is placed the first one to the ones following to it by nature. This is for, by being the beginning of the counted realities, when counting, the feeling places the unit as first. But with the above-world unit, because that unit being above-mind, it happened inversely. This is because this unity, though it is, by nature, before all realities, the mind places it after all realities. This is for no mind could start from The One Who is above world, and then to advance from Him to the many realities. But, on the opposite, from the many realities the mind ascends and is gathered together at That One. There the senses need the number one in order the senses to advance to the many realities; otherwise, it is impossible to count or to advance as it wants. But here, the mind needs the many realities, in order the mind to be able to ascend to The One Who is above the world, and in order the mind to be gathered within itself, by not being possible to ascend on any other way towards imagining The One Who is above the world.

Thus, the mind, by using the appropriate order and way, it starts from the many realities and it ends to The One Who is above the world, and Who is the top. This is for the one known with the sense, it is easily to comprise and to limits the sense places it naturally and through affirmation, as first, like its nature requires it. But the above-world unit, searched for with the mind, by being that unit above understanding and by escaping the understanding, it cannot be affirmed as the first, according to its nature, so that the mind could start with it, but, rather, by being above nature, the mind finds it in an above-nature mode, not at the beginning, but at the end, after crossing through and, to say so, after counting the many realities[1112].

This is for, the mind has the understanding by nature, and The One Who is above world, He is in Himself not-understood and unapproachable; the mind tends by habituation towards the many realities, even unwillingly, given that, on one hand, the mind cannot stop cogitating, and on the other hand, the mind doesn't have power to catch The One Who is above the world and on top. But, by looking at the many realities, the mind sees in each of them something that can be understood with the mind, but that something is seen not as standing by itself, but as belonging to a certain one. Then, by gathering out of each seen thing the meaning which that thing is transparent to, and by ascertaining through contemplation that these ones dialogue with one another, and they do not oppose to one another and they are like some flowers grown out of the same root, the mind advances from the many realities towards The One Who is on top, out of Who all the many realities are; and so, the mind is naturally gathered from the natural existences to an above-being order, in which the mind sees the One Who is above-nature and above-being, through the realities according to the nature. And by seeing, in an untold manner, the spring gushing up and making all the good things and all the beauties, and by being delighted with The One Who is above being, the mind no longer turns willingly towards the many realities, though these ones too, are existing and good and partaker to the good part[1113].

[1111] The godlike One is the natural cause of all His uncreated energies and the maker (creator) cause of the creatures.

[1112] Here isn't about the procedure of the logical thinking. This one can affirm The One Whom all the realities came from in the beginning. That is the so-called deductive, scholastic thinking. It isn't either about an inductive thinking, raising from concrete and individual to abstract or general. But it is about really experiencing The godlike One, and experience that, though real, it still is experiencing The One Whom all realities are within. One reaches this experience through spiritual growth, and that one must cross through many, and to detach itself from them, through dispassion. That's why, This One is found in a supra-natural, spiritual mode. This way has been granted priority in the Christian East. It has been absolutely required this mode too.

This is for, being the mind naturally loving the good and the beauty, the mind doesn't willingly leave The One Who is above all realities, except the mind is forced to do that by some circumstance. But, because the way to be of the existing realities it is different, the mind looks at them differently, and the mind ascends through them to The One Who is above world and nature. In my opinion, the mind must advance in stages, on the path leading to The One Who is above nature and world, in order to, by climbing as on a ladder, the mind to advance in the safest mode, and to know if there is any shortcoming in itself, or in what the mind must be, and if the mind delights itself with that shortcoming; and if yes, the mind must realize what is wrong and what it separated it from the godlike feast; and what should the mind do, in order to get back to where the mind has rolled down from. In this way, the mind will know both the mist of the passions and the transparence of the clean heart, and it will mirror the knowledge of the truth, by seeing the truth as the truth actually is, and the mind will be made partaker to heavenly views, and it will receive a godlike feeling and it won't pass unnoticed to itself, its own increase or decrease. Everywhere, the mind will know many wonderful things and the mind will understand what the purpose of the appeasement and of the locking up in the monastic cell is.

But about these latter things, we want to speak right here: All the existing realities are divided in created ones known with the senses, in created ones known with the mind, and in uncreated and know with the mind (intelligible). And above all realities, there is The One Who is uncreated and Who is above mind and being. By passing, the mind's eye, from one to another, amongst the first realities, and by deeply looking within them, after the mind has chosen to appease itself through ascesis, the mind ascends from the doing into loneliness, of the due things, as from some level, at the contemplation (the looking at) of The One Who is truly existent, and to the occupation with Him, as also at the delectation with the heavenly realities, at the happy living into the truth's rays, and to the endless enriching with the eternal realities and at the wonderful sweetening with them. And, it might be, that through the together-working of the grace, and by advancing in time, the mind will even be kidnapped from earth and, by getting steadfast through habituation in the light of the understanding, the mind will reach insensitive to the realities from here, for the mind gets under the mastery of The One Who is above-mind, and the mind will be imprinted by The One Who is incomparable and above all good.

This holy ladder, which is divided in five, and on which we climb exactly like on some steps towards the ultimate target, it doesn't have a spatial distance between steps, but it has a difference, namely an order of the quality characteristic to each step. As existence, the creatures submitted to the senses and the creatures known with the mind, they are likewise. But the last ones exceed, to a large extent, the first ones, like the mind exceeds the feeling, through its feature. And again, the uncreated realities which are known with the mind (intelligible) they exceed, to a large extent, the creatures known with the mind (intelligible). But both these two levels are amongst the existing realities, and that's why, the uncreated ones which are known with the mind as existing and as subordinated to The Uncreated One, they are above-mind[1114]. From here, it is obvious that the highest seeing and contemplation of the mind, it is that one through which the mind rests within the One Who exceeds all realities, after the mind passed further from doing and it has reached the hidden of that ultimate top, which is placed above all realities; and therefore, the humblest seeing and contemplation of the mind is that one moving amongst the realities submitted to the senses, or better said, that one belonging to the doer man[1115].

So, by being the mind, by nature, lover of good (beauty), it must desire what is, in all regards, better (more beautiful), not only in order to have that, but in order to suffer the transfiguration in better, or above-mind, as it is due, for, as It was said, the change received by the mind is according to what the mind sees or it delights itself with. But, because the fickleness intertwined with the mind's nature, it won't leave the mind as long as it is the day today (Hebr. 3: 12) and, as they say, until the shadows keep moving (Song of Songs 2: 17), namely until we won't pass away from the present life, which it shows as in a mirror, in riddle and overshadowed, the truth, it is necessary, when we fall off the contemplation and the seeing of The Uncreated One, The One Who is above-mind, for force ourselves to stop at the uncreated realities which can be known with the mind, and which are the closest to Him, in order our turning back to The Uncreated and above-world One, to be easier to us[1116]. And if the thicker mist falls over the mind, darkening the mind's understanding and bringing the mind's contemplation to idleness, we must go back to prayers accompanied by the doing out of the humble heart, in order us to be delivered from darkness through the power of the prayer and through tears, and thus, us to build up again some foundation out of the creatures submitted to the senses[1117]. On this way, by dwelling the understanding light within heart, through a spiritual work, with the spring of the Ghost's Hypostasis, and the mind skillfully taking the mastery upon the doing, the mind climbs as on a mountain peak and as to an observation heigh point, where the mind can contemplate from, the realities which remain to the many not only as unseen, but also as unsearched for and not-understood. This is because, without that, nobody will see either himself or God, not even passingly. Speaking now about this doing, it may not be totally besides our purpose.

[1114] The uncreated intelligible realities, or the uncreated realties known with the mind, as there are the uncreated godlike energies and features, as there are: the kindness, the righteousness etc., they have in common with the intelligible ones, as for instance with the angels, or with the soul, the fact that they can be known with the mind (intelligible) and they can be experienced and, as such, they belong to the realities which can be reckoned as existing. As such, they too are subordinated to God as being, as One Who is threefold in Persons, and Who is above-existence, and as such He is above-mind, or above-understanding.

[1115] Here is mentioned also the mind's resting into The One Who is above-mind, and above-seeing, and above-contemplation, after in another place the author reckoned this resting as above seeing and contemplation. But the terms expressing the living on those spiritual heights, they always are insufficient. That's why one can use them in both situations. Everything depends on what these terms are understood like. The fact is, that the author admits the conscience of a resting within The One Who is threefold in Persons, without meaning through this that God's being can be understood or contemplated.

33. Three are the inwards things which the soul must have in sight, on the stage of the doing: the power of the rationality, the anger, and the lust; and there are three things from outside too: the desire for glory, for pleasure, and for more. These two trinities are healed by the soul by looking at the Jesus Christ's living into body, through the four general virtues, namely through: wisdom, righteousness, temperance, and manhood – and with the grace of Lord Jesus[1118].

By this the mind is given the power to ascend in a non-darkened manner, and to look at the godlike realities and to contemplate God. When Lord Jesus was taken into wilderness by the Ghost, having to defeat the devil, He healed the lusting part of the soul, through fasting; and He healed the rational [1116] The true aspiration of the mind, or of the human subject, it is that of reaching within the godlike Subject. Only in His love the mind can find its resting, like a relative resting can be found by the human subject only in the ambience of a loving person. Any of our preoccupations with impersonal goods and values, it is a falling into a state lacking the true satisfaction.

[1117] The doing doesn't' consist only of actual good deeds, but also of everything that helps to our cleaning up: prayer, tears, fear of eternal punishments, restraint, patience, humbleness etc. But in all of these, there is also an attitude of differently understanding the things, of differently using the things, or better said, a detachment from considering the things as the ultimate reality.

[1118] Unlike the philosophical, natural morals, which reckon that the four cardinal virtues can be gained by the man by his powers, here they are placed in connection with Christ. Only by looking at Christ and by receiving the help from the grace, those virtues can be fully achieved.

part, through taking vigil and quiet prayer; and He healed the anger by resisting it in word; and He healed the love for pleasure, for glory, and for money, because, when getting hungry, He didn't ask, as the devil suggested Him, the stones to be transformed in breads, neither did He throw Himself off the temple roof, with the intention of being extolled by multitude that He wasn't harmed by falling, and neither He let Himself to be convinced to worship that one, after that one promised Him that He will be presented the richness of all kingdoms. But, by angrily, but wisely and rightfully and temperately and manly resisting satan, He rejected that one, teaching us too, how to defeat any devil's attack[1119].

One can see and he can know the same thing in the Savior's cross too. We see the Savior, when the time was coming closer, that He was praying, getting away from His disciples (Mt. 26: 26). This brings the healing to the rational part. He took vigil and He endured the sufferings of the cross. This heals the lusting part. He didn't answer back, He didn't quarrel, He didn't shout out, not even when He was rebuked, but He prayer for the ones who were tormenting Him. This is for it depend on the good use of the anger to topple the devil over, by resisting him with the word. But He answered the people who were tormenting Him - because of they being also tormented by satan – by keeping His silence, and with the long-suffering, and by praying for them. He was spit at, He was slapped on His face, and He endured mockery. This is for healing the love for glory. He was given to drink with vinegar, He was nourished with gall, He was crucified, and He was pierced with the lance. This is medicine for healing the love for pleasure. He was nailed on the cross, naked, He was sleeping outside, He didn't have a dwelling place, He was disregarded by everybody because of being poor and beggar. And this heals the love for money.

The Savior showed, therefore, twice, the medicine for healing the passions, inside and outside: when He started to show Himself to the world, with the body, and when He left the world. That's why, the one who looks at Him, and at His teaching and cross, and who becomes - as much as this is possible to the human being – Christ's follower, wisely, and righteously, and with temperance, and manly, that human being will stop at his turn, as Christ did, the passions' work directed towards evil, and by that, he will be able to stop all the other bad things. He will be able to use those virtues as it is due, and after that he will use all the things appropriately, and he will be a true doer man, and as ready as possible in order to look at God and to occupy himself with God, in focusing his understanding.

Thus, the mind, by starting with the many creatures submitted to the senses and by seeing their good composition, and by understanding then the creatures which can be known with the mind (intelligible) and by moving itself to the uncreated realities which can be known with the mind (intelligible), the mind has climbed, as on a ladder, all the four steps[1120]. And to these ones it follows the non-speaking, the silence, and the godlike awe, and, in short, the looking at and the contemplation of The One Who is above-world, and the above-understanding union. This is the crown of the silence, the highest and the most consummate good thing, as much as it is possible in this life, it is the end of the truth, it is the fruit of the faith, it is the shiny ray of the hoped glory, it is the foundation of the love, it is the balance of the mind, it is the steadfastness replacing the ceaseless mind's movement[1121], the not-understood resting, the unitary state, the earnest of the future age, the source of a unimaginable joy, the chamber of the peace, the quenching of

[1121] The ascension towards The One it wasn't only an intellectual ascension, but it was also one through doing, through praying, through strengthening our love for God as the Unique and All-Comprising Good. The state lived in union with God, it is, on one hand, a state of supreme focusing and quietude, and on the other hand, it is a state of endless joy. It is a state of supreme quietude for nothing attracts the soul towards something else, any longer, and the mind is in this state rejoicing of the limitless depth of the whole and of the endless love. But just because of being this Good endless, the soul never ends tasting Him and the soul never gets satisfied. This stability is, in the same time, therefore, a ceaseless movement. The idea of the stability while always be in movement, or of the eternally stable movement, formulated by Saint Gregory of Nyssa, it is opposite to the Origenistic idea about the boredom of the soul that has reached within God and the soul's coming out from Him, of falling from Him, in order to have another adventure. "The mind's balance" it is the equilibrium achieved by the mind out of knowing all things and the rejoicing of all things within The One.

the bodily cogitations, the turning back from the present age, the becoming addicted to the future age, the detachment from the passionate life, the inward growing up of the dispassion, the soul's gladness, the gathering together, the resting and the guarding of the soul's movements and powers and, saying all in one, the godlike knowledge and dispassion.

If the mind gets scattered again, due to our drowsiness, or due to some external circumstance, we must take care to bring the mind back again to its own good, namely to the contemplation, by rejecting the passion that constituted an impediment and that deviates the mind from its purpose. We must take heed how far the mind is from its highest good and why is that. We must see: is it the look directed towards the creatures submitted to the senses, or towards the creature known with the mind (intelligible), or towards the uncreated realties known with the mind (intelligible)? Or, is it the mind separated from The One Who is above-nature, the Only One Who is true and above any other one, because the mind having vain thoughts or a certain need? And, by knowing this, let's remove the impediment staying in the middle, in order the mind to turn back again, unitarily, as itself the order requires it, to the contemplation and to seeing The One Who is above-world. This is because, by being the mind outside The One Who is above-world, uncreated, and above-mind, the mind will linger in division and it will have not reached the actual good, even if the mind moves well. This is for the Good from the top is The One Who is above-mind and above-being, uncreated and simple. And That One is the highest end Whom the mind tends towards. One must search for The One Who is above-mind, one must contemplate The One Who is imageless, and one must reach at The One Who is non-comprised, in order to reach the unitary inheritance of The One, of the supreme God, with the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ and of the-life-maker Ghost Whom being us illuminated through, to be us found worthy of receiving the gift of the contemplation and us to become gods by work, and deified through the gift from God.

37. Once the mind elevated on the land of the godlike hidden, the mind naturally keeps it silence, for being united with the simplicity, and therefore being unitarily united with The One Who is above-understanding and illuminating for being imparted with the Ghost[1122]. This is for, what could the mind have to say, once it has reached above its understanding powers, and once being outside any meaning and totally emptied, as being above-understanding[1123]? This is for, the mind still needs the word in order to speak, and therefore it is obvious that the mind still understands. This is for any word comes consequently to a meaning. And if the mind still understands something, how could the mind be in the land of the hidden? For that isn't an actual hidden, and what isn't seen by any other organ, it still can be seen by the mind. For, thus, many realities would have been called as hidden, because very many of them, or, to say so, all the realties seen by the mind, the mind sees them by knowing them through the mediation of another organ that sees them. Consequently, the hidden realities could have been almost endless in number, and that is absurd. But only one is the actual hidden, which the mind ascends to, after crossing through all realities, as at The One Whom all the realities are form, either seen, or cogitated. So, the mind too, by ascending at Him as at The One Who is above all realities, either seen, or said, or cogitated, the mind gets out of understanding, out of seeing, and out of speaking. And we can even say that the mind hasn't ascended there yet, neither the mind has reached into the godlike hidden, as long as the mind still is able to speak. This is for the mind still is able to understand, as long as it speaks. But the hidden is impossible to understand, because of being above-word[1124].

[1122] Once reached in the hidden intimacy of God's love, the mind keeps is silence. This is for, that simplicity, more than full of all the good things, it cannot be described by our words, because our words can only catch small pieces of it, and our words, regardless how much we would use, are insufficient to express this infinite fullness of the godlike simplicity. The infinite simplicity requires to be lived with our endless simplicity, in its impenetrable intensity, and by no means trying us to break is in small pieces, which cannot either separately or together to express it in its fullness. This is because, who could describe the love lived while being held to the bosom of the beloved one.

[1123] The mind is there as emptied of meanings, of notions, and not because it would have become totally depleted of those, but because the mind has exceeded all of them, or the mind is above all of them. All the meanings have become unseen through overwhelming. What the shards will be good at, if somebody has the unbroken vessel? But the vessel implies all the shards, but also it implies endlessly more than the sum of the shards: it comprises the shards' harmony, the shininess of this harmony when in sun rays, and the capacity of the vessel of holding a content.

[1124] This is a logical demonstrating, to say so, of the fact that the godlike hidden isn't a hidden only to the sensitive sight, but it is so also to the mind's understanding. This is for, otherwise, the hidden no longer would have been one, but many. This is because many are the realities

38. While the words usually make the mind to thrive and to advance, they elevate the mind, in this advancing, where the word becomes insufficient, namely all the way up to the work that is being done in silence. And, if the mind always had used words and if the soul always had needed words, I wouldn't have ben able to tell you what would have been the advancing of the mind by speaking. But the speaking isn't useful only for doing, but it is useful also for contemplation, for the mind ascends from the words about the realities which have an image, to The One Who is imageless, The One Who is simple and above word, unattached to anything, and actual, where any word appears to be meaningless, or, rightly speaking, the words are even an impediment[1125].

This is because the words are used as long as it is done a passing from a meaning to another meaning. But The One Who is simple, detached from all realities (absolute), borderless, and imageless, The One Who is simple and pure and above-word, how could He need the word in order to be done the passing from Him to somewhere else?[1126] Or, how could have been God unseen by the sensitive eyes, but know with the mind. This is a proving of the apophatic theology. But this isn't only an intellectual renunciation to expressing what is above-understanding, but it is a positive experience of union with The One. This is for the mind is "illuminated by The One", or by the Holy Ghost, in this union. As such, the mind knows about this union, but the mind also knows that that union is above understanding. The mind knows the "that" of the union, but the mind doesn't know the "how" of that union.

[1125] This is an argumentation by reducing to absurd. If the mind had always needed words, the mind wouldn't have actually needed the words, for, if that had been the case, the words wouldn't have helped the mind to advance beyond words, because of keeping the mind within their limited realm. A resembling example: if a plane hadn't tended during the whole flight to the landing strip, that plane wouldn't have ever flown. The words help the mind to ascend beyond words' realm. This is the use of the cataphatic or affirmative theology, for the apophatic theology, or of the silence.

[1126] A word follows to another word, for we pass from a meaning to another. By stringing the words, it is shown the connection of a word with another word, or the dependence of an affirmed meaning, on another meaning that must be affirmed, and therefore it shows the dependence of the things on one another. But the mind that reached within God, where that mind would pass beyond Him, by using a word or many words? God doesn't need to be explained through other words, namely through other realities, for all realities are inferior to Him, so that they cannot explain Him. By using words, we only can show God as connected to other realities. But God is absolute, namely detached from all realities (απόλυτος, ασχετοσ). Of course, we can speak about God, when showing His descent amongst people, and His savior deeds done for us; or when the one who experienced Him, he wants to express something of that experience, to other people. Or, we can speak about God, even when we haven't reached to experience Him, an experience surpassing the meanings and the words, but we still speculate about Him by using our rationality. But the happiness of the man who has reached within God Himself, it cannot be described, and also that man doesn't need to describe to himself. One encompassed? This is because, the words it usually encompasses something. But The One is non-comprised, because He is borderless and shapeless. And if the word isn't appropriate for The One Who is hidden and above-mind, because That One is non-comprised and shapeless, it will be obvious that the most appropriate is the silence. Therefore, the advanced ones, they must reach from speaking to silence, for they have advanced to the simple, imageless, and shapeless contemplation.

39. The words are used for the known things, while the hidden is unknown, so that the hidden is outside the word. And if the knowledge of the hidden is above-knowledge, and what is above-knowledge it doesn't need knowledge, the less it will need the word. So, the mind that has ascended to The One Who is hidden and simple, it keeps its silence naturally. And while the mind doesn't keep its silence naturally and without being forced to that[1127], that mind still hasn't ascended to The One Who is hidden and more than simple.

40. As the people toiling with the quietude, by sometimes getting out of their monastic cell, they know by their own deed itself, the difference between staying inside and getting out, likewise the ones who, by being close to the glory of God, through contemplation, they experience the silence, but sometimes they start speaking again, so that they know themselves what state there are in, when the silence falls upon them by nature and not by will, and how they are when tending towards speaking. When the silence comes upon them, they desire that they wouldn't have ever been given the speaking, and they want to remain in that state. This is for, they are like some angels on earth, and united with the truth: unitarily, imageless, without bodily seeing, shapelessly, and simply, through mind's sights, which do not pass from a reality to another, they having within themselves only the overwhelming and the awe, without understanding anything, batter said: looking, without bodily sight, at the godlike and without beginning illuminations. And cannot speak about God in a fully adequate manner, also because God is "shapeless". The shape as defined in itself, it can be described to others, while the shapelessness cannot be described; if we tried to ascribe a shape to the imageless One, it would limit Him.

[1127] The silence of the one who has reached the union with The One Who is endless, it isn't imposed by the will, it isn't intentional and aiming to make a good impression, but it is imposed naturally, non-forcedly, by itself the lived infinite of The One.

when the mind descends from there, as one that is changeable, they start speaking and they pass with their understanding from a reality to another, through many and diverse crossings. And in order the state of silence to come back to them, which is much higher than the state of the speaking, they embrace the quietude and they guard their senses against the realities submitted to the senses, and they use their whole skillfulness, in order to avoid not only the speaking, but even the understanding itself, in order they to be able to say, together with David: "I got muted and I got humbled and I kept my silence about the good things" (Ps. 38[1128]: 3). Therefore, speaking even the good things, it is inferior to the silence[1129].

41. The godhead isn't unveiled, but the godhead isn't either totally hidden. For the godhead exists, the godhead is an unveiled fact, and even a very clear fact. But what is this "is", it is a hidden aspect. And we must know that "what is", it very much differs from "that is". "That is" is shown out of work, but "what is" is shown out of being. The las aspect wasn't allowed to be known even to angels. This is for God is endlessly endless, and above all existing realities[1130], and He is above all the mind and the understanding. So, when the mind occupies itself with the realties showing that God is, the mind has many to tell and it can philosophize very beautifully. The man can be name then as philosopher and theologian. But after the mind has ascended higher, due to the knowledge that God is, and the mind has been engulfed by the godlike hidden and crossed by the imprinting of the work of what the mind is, and the mind has become, by grace, imageless, without the possibility to be touched[1131], and without eyes, so that any word that one can say about God, it ceases, and the unified mind remains motionless[1132], once the mind has entered The One Who is non-understood. Then the mind surrenders, wholly, to The One Who is beyond all realities, where there is no word, neither meaning, and where the diversity of the thinking can no longer advance from, but where there is the simplicity, the non-comprising, the silence, and the awe. There the mind sees The One Who is imageless, endless, and borderless, and the mind rejoices unusually and wonderfully of seeing The One Who is unseen. And by seeing the imageless image[1133], the mind becomes, rightly so, at its turn, detached from all realities (absolute) and imageless[1134]. And to say it shortly, the mind is contaminated, like the realties contemplated by the mind in an unseen manner and looked at without bodily eyes, by the above-nature godlike beauty, and the mind extolls God, within itself, for God has created the mind thus.

[1129] In the Greek text: της μετα λογου σιγης = the silence in word. The silence isn't the muteness of the total darkness, of the absence of the conscience and of all knowledge. It is a silence that speaks, that says more than the words could say, but one that can be manifested also through words. It is a silence that comprises the non-comprisable One, in words, namely, it is a silence comprising more than all words can comprise. The one seeing this non-comprisable reality, he keeps his silence, because of not being able to express the non-comprisable, but this silence irradiates out of him, for it irradiates out of him the living of the non-comprisable. This silence irradiates through words too.

[1130] υπερ παν ειναι – God is above any existing reality, and He is, by and large. This is for, is it means noticeable by the realities rejoicing of existence, it means being in the context of the existing realities, it means depending on all realities, and, in the last analysis, it means depending on God Who all realities depend on. We fully are here in Areopagite's terminology. But the author of the present writing, he always brings a new interpretation, as we can see in his following affirmations. A German philosopher or theologian, he would translate the distinction between "that is" and "what is", by using the terms "das Dass" and "das Was".

42. God is named as The One, not only for He is simple, being above any composition, but also for He actually exists amongst all the realties said as existing, but which have their existence from Him. This is because what doesn't exist in an actual and simple sense, neither is that, as One in an actual and [1131] The mind that has reached that mysterious experience, it is beyond any contact, and nothing can touch it (ανεπαφος), not even spiritually. This is for the mind lives the godlike reality that overwhelms the feeling of any touching coming from something else. The mind lives the reality of God not only above understanding, but also above any somehow thickened feeling, being noticed through a feeling above-feeling. It is a supreme experience of subtlety and finesse. The mind doesn't feel itself as touched even by things, and the persons experience in an accentuate manner, the mysterious transcendence of the mind. These descriptions are on the level of the ones belonging to Meister Eckart, but still not stained by any pantheistic shadow.

[1132] The mind's effort of understanding, it comes to an end, and, in this sense, the mind remains motionless, though the mind still is, otherwise, in a ceaseless movement of awe, towards the godlike infinity.

[1133] Το ανείδεον ειδοσ. God is the actual One, imageless, without contour, but on the other hand, this limitless of His richness, of His power, and of His love, it still is an "image".

[1134] The mind, by looking at the imageless image of God, it is imprinted, at its turn, by that imageless image, namely by the "image" of the limitlessness and of the infinity, in the joy and the richness received, by the mind, from God. By this, the mind becomes, at its turn, absolute and detached from all realities, as God Himself is. This is because the mind no longer feels anything of the created realities. The mind no longer feels either the relation with God, as a relation of dependency, for, by being filled up with God, the mind lives His sovereignty and absoluteness. On the other hand, even understanding God, while the mind is detached from any relation, as God is (in an absolute state), it belongs to the mind's nature.

simple sense[1135]. Al so, He is called as One for He is the same everywhere, in a non-comprisable manner, and for He alone is unlike any other reality and for He is outside any reality; then, God is called so, for He is eternal, and without beginning, and ceaseless, and for He is equally sending to all realities, in an all-clean mode, the godlike ray of His Providence, even if not all the realities receive His Providence in the same manner. Finally, God is called like that, for He makes Himself know to everybody, without being Him submitted to the relation, and requiring a mind that isn't submitted to variety, an imageless mind, a shapeless mind, a colorless mind, a mind that has gone out from the touching with all existing realities, and simply, a mind detached from all realities, elevated to the infinity of the endlessness, above time, above place, and above nature, and above the natural realities, in order to make Himself somewhat seen by them, unitarily, and above the understanding union[1136].

43. Because the spiritual union accomplished between God and mind, it is above understanding, it is said that the mind is above its nature, during those moments, by perceiving The One Who is hidden and above-nature, through an understanding feeling, in a manner detached from all realities (in an absolute manner). Despite all these, what the mind experiences it is appropriate to the mind's nature as cleaned up by grace[1137]. This is for, the understanding id sot the mind what [1135] It is made here the connection between the fact that God is One in a simple mode, and the fact that God is the only one existing in an actual mode. In addition to that, God is the only One existing in a simple mode, for, when speaking about Him, we do not need to mention anything else, in order to determine His existence, as it is in the case o all the other realities.

[1136] Because God exists in a simple mode, not needing, in order to exist, a relation with other realities, the mind must, at its turn, to reach such a state, in order to be able to understand God's existence.

[1137] In a mode detached from all realities (in an absolute mode – απολυτως). In the feeling, which God is noticed through, on that spiritual height, it is not implied the feeling of anything else, and the mind is not determined by anything else. This is for the mind is elevated, then, above its nature, and he mind feels God not through its natural feeling, and the mind feels God not through its natural feeling, but through a godlike work which the mind is imparted with, as with a feeling. Although, what the mind feels out of God, it is somehow accommodated to the human mind. The feeling which the mind is imparted with, out of God, it has become a feeling appropriated to the man. Although the mind is extended beyond itself, it still isn't confounded to God. This is shown especially by the fact that the mind still remains aware of itself. Although the mind is extended beyond itself, it still sees itself that state of being extended beyond itself. This is explained by the author of the present writing, in the following rows, by using the example of the eyes seeing into darkness.

seeing is to the eye. Let's use an example: He who looks into darkness, on one hand he doesn't see anything, but on the other hand he sees that that darkness is one, and he also sees that he doesn't see; and this is because, if he covered his eyes, he still would reckon that there is light around him, or that there are some things around him, but thus, by seeing, he clearly sees that he doesn't see. In other words, the crossing through the darkness, of the seer power, and the seeing of the realities hidden into that darkness, it is above the eyes' nature, but not is such the fact of seeing that it doesn't see. Likewise, it is the mind: by being elevated into the godlike hidden, and by being elevated beyond understanding, the mind doesn't see anything. Because, how could the mind see something? But the mind sees that it doesn't see anything, and that it doesn't see The One Who is hidden like in a mist, The One Whom all existing realities come out of, either seen or thought, either part of the creation, or uncreated and eternal. If the mind hadn't seen this, it wouldn't have seen itself extended beyond itself. But, because of seeing this, the mind sees as clearly as possible that it doesn't see, and what the mind doesn't see is above-seeing[1138], and impossible to be seen. Entering and seeing inside the one hidden, that one hidden that is above-mind, it exceeds the mind's nature. But looking at the godlike darkness of that hidden, that is, above-all, in an untold mystery, and seeing that it doesn't see in that darkness, it is characteristic to the clean mind that sees into Ghost.

This is because the mind doesn't have the understanding seeing locked up and unworking, when the mind sees that it doesn't see except in a simple mode the One Who is the Godlike One hidden into hiding. This would be the sign of the [1138] The mind sees that it doesn't see. But the mind sees not only that it doesn't see, but the mind still feels that The One Whom it doesn't see, That One is Somebody. The mind is aware of the existence of The One Whom the mind doesn't see, namely the mind is aware of God. And the mind is too, aware of not seeing Him. So, the mind doesn't' see for it is above the act of seeing. Namely, by not seeing, the mind knows more than when seeing, and the mind knows more intensely The One Whom the mind doesn't see. And the mind is more aware of its helplessness of seeing Him, namely the mind is more aware of itself and if its limitations. In order to know about this non-seeing, the mind need a conscience, or it needs a more intense sight that its own. This paradox comes from Socrates who said: "I know that I do not know anything". Saint Gregory of Nyssa introduced a dynamism in this paradox. He said (The Life of Moses): "To the extent that the mind ascends, it ascends in knowing that it doesn't know". The author of the present writing brought a new specification: "I see that I do not see The One Who is in darkness".

nescience[1139]. A contrary, when it sees more clearly, then it ascends above-mind and it contemplates (sees) its non-seeing, by looking into the hidden of the All-Simple One. This is for the mind sees limpidly that This Hidden One is The One Whom all the realities are coming from. But what This One is, the mind cannot see it[1140].

And the reason why they say that the mind is in the realities which are above its nature, it is because the mind looks into the all-simple hiding of God. But this is something appropriate to the mind's nature when the mind reaches to be clean. This is for, one can say that it is appropriate to the mind's nature to ascend in what is above-nature, stepping without seeing, namely in a not-understood mode, in the unitary godlike hiding, that is above simplicity and mind. The mind doesn't have, then, any knowing perception, except the perception of The One Who is not outside Himself[1141]. Reached there, the mind, through a movement characteristic to the mind, it reached a stopping and a resting. Not in a resting from contemplating – this is an insane passion – but in a stopping and in a resting from passing from a meaning to another meaning or view. This is because the mind, after it has been elevated up there, by falling into the depth of the endlessness or limitlessness, where the mind sinks into the understanding light of the non-comprised godlike hiding, and it becomes astonished, and it stops, to say so, by no longer experiencing anything else than the awe in that untold understanding brightness. And by no longer passing from a meaning to another, the mind still experiences the work of a [1139] Therefore, one cannot say that the mind, when elevated above understanding, it is totally unworking. Even the fact that the mind sees that it doesn't see anything else except The One Who is simple and hidden into darkness, it is a proof that the mind's working isn't totally suppressed. If that had been the case, it would have meant, simply, the nescience. But the experience the mind has about The One from the darkness, it isn't simply a nescience, but it is more than any pretended knowledge about Him.

[1140] By looking in sight, in addition to the fact that the mind only sees that there is hidden The One, the mind it sees also that out of This One are coming all realities, though the mind cannot see what This One is.

[1141] It belongs to the mind's nature, the mind to ascend above its nature, namely to look at The One and at His hiding, without using any bodily sense. And this is the thinnest noticing of the All-Thin One. In that supreme thinness of God, there are the roots of all the more or less thick realities, as also in the ultimate thinness of the mind are the roots of all the thickened mind's works. Through its unique thinness, the mind notices The One in His supreme thinness Whom all the realities thicker than He is are comprised in.

understanding illumination[1142], by motionlessly looking in the above-being hiding, being the mind filled up with non-understanding, and being the mind beautified in a unique and unitary mode, by the unapproachable depth of that brightness that doesn't scatter[1143].

If the mind stopped the contemplation, how could the mind experience the awe and the enlightenment? So, we say about the mind that it stops, in the meaning that, once reached there, the mind no longer passes from a reality to another, but it contemplates The One, for the mind is addicted to His shininess, the mind rejoicing itself and being filled up with brightness, and no longer moving from the stability it has reached at. Consequently, the mind doesn't lock up its joy of contemplation (of seeing). This is because, not contemplating at all and nothing, it is a passion one must avoid, and which isn't commendable by any means, but it is full with the darkness of the nescience. The mentioned stability of the mind, it is born and it is upheld through the unapproachable shininess of the light, and it is a contemplation that doesn't wan any movement, but it wants resting and steadfastness. This is for, That One is above nature, hidden in His mystery and above being; He is endless and limitless to any mind; and He won't let the mind that contemplates Him, to look elsewhere, if that mind has been imparted with the cleanness appropriate to it, and with the godlike help. And the mind won't fall off this godlike contemplation and off this above-beauty-and-infinity shininess, except if it is attracted by a thing which the mind is addicted to, or by the natural fickleness which the mind suffers of[1144].

[1142] The "understanding light", that is the translation of the Greek expression: νοερο φως, it doesn't mean a light understood by the mind, or which the mind understands through, but it simply is a spiritual light, one opposed to the sensitive luminous light.

[1143] The mind experiences the work of a spiritual enlightenment, which the mind looks through, with a helplessness of understanding and with an endless awe, in the abyssal and infinitely rich inside of The One. The mind doesn't pass to something else, neither is the mind dead, but the mind is in a work received from God, a work meaning another kind of movement, but unmoved towards something else. The not-understanding, which end the mind never reaches despite the mind's unmeasurable capacity of understanding, it keeps the mind in a ceaseless relation of understanding increasingly more.

[1144] This hints to the Origen's theory, according to which, the soul, by getting bored of the monotony of the life into God, it wants to get out from there, and so it falls in an earthly experience. The infinite beauty and richness, of The One Who the mind reached in, it won't ever cause such a saturation. A leaving from there, of the mind, or a desire of living from there, it is unimaginable. Outside God, there are only things, and feelings, and knowledge, which are infinitely inferior in beauty, and in the richness of meanings, and in the power of attraction.

44. It belongs to the mind's nature, to understand. And the understanding is done in motion and in movement[1145]. But, because the mind reached into God, it is above understanding and motion, rightly so, one could say that the mind ascends above its nature when contemplating God as detached from all realities[1146]. This is for any meaning is given by a thing. And where there isn't contemplated a thing, there isn't born and there isn't a meaning. So, not being possible by any means, to see God as a thing, God shows Himself to the mind, through the realities naturally being around Him, namely through the realities which He works through, works that unveil the power springing out of somebody who is powerful. For, so, the mind uses to contemplate, in all the other realities, the powers together with the realities having those powers[1147], and therefore the mind searches, at God, for the same thing. But because the mind is unable to succeed in that, because God is above the nature of any created mind, the mind contemplates the realities from around God. And the mind represents God to itself, without seeing Him, namely through a simple, and lasting for a moment, intuition[1148]. But, by advancing in the sky of the quietude and gaining the godlike benevolence, and by working the Holy and extolled Ghost, within the mind, the mind will be increasingly often kidnapped from the work of understanding, towards the [1145] The understanding is done in the motion and in the movement from a meaning to another; in adding new understandings, which to bring a surplus of light in the realities the mind has known before, through: association, examples, and contrasts, or contradictions.

[1146] We understand any thing in connection with other things. That's why our understanding increases by passing from something to something else, by finding out the connection of one thing with other things. But despite all this increasing, we still remain on the limited plan. The one who has reached into God, he no longer needs this passing from a meaning to another, for God is no longer understood in connection with other realities, but He is detached from all realities (He is absolute) and He has in Himself all the realities.

[1147] We contemplate the powers together with the subjects, or with the sources those powers star from.

[1148] The mind, in its striving for understanding, it always searches for the subject of the powers through which are accomplished, in the world, diverse effects. Only then, the mind reaches, somehow, a satisfactory end of its understanding. And only God is the consummate Subject suffering nothing from the world, but all the realities from within the world depend on Him. In order to find God, the mind must exceed all the realities from within the world, and the mind must contemplate the powers from around God, the powers which God has created and upholds the world through, and the mind sees that the world couldn't have been created and upheld by the human subjects. By contemplating the powers from around God, or His works, the mind sees in them, through a simple and simultaneous intuition, their Subject; it is an eyeless sight. But also logically, the mind presupposes a Subject as ground of any manifestation.

imageless, without quality, and simple state, by quickly penetrating within the heart, through the above-nature power of the Ghost[1149].

By stopping itself here, in the feeling of the godlike presence, and by not understanding anything, the mind is above-understanding. And by the fact that form understanding the realities from around God, the mind has ascended at feeling the godlike presence, the mind has become, as I said, simple. And, for the mind is above-understanding, we say that it lives above its nature.

45. All the realities which are called as hidden, they necessarily have something shown outside, out of which one can intuit that hiding. Because, otherwise, they rather would be reckoned as inexistent. This is because, a reality that doesn't give any kind of knowledge showing its existence, it could be reckoned as equal to what doesn't exist at all. So, without any doubt, the hidden of God too, it is accompanied by some showings.

BY stepping of the tracks of these showings, the mind receives a feeling of the godlike hiding, and the mind ascends from the comprised realities belonging to God, to something that is non-comprisable. And by being elevated up from there, the mind knows with certitude that there is something escaping its natural comprising capacity, namely something being above any possibility of comprising with the understanding, either be it that understanding even angelic, or above-nature. Also, the mind know that that something is hidden also in the beginning and in the end of this nature and being (created) of all existing realities, endlessly above the whole existence; the mind know that that something is uncreated, without a beginning, borderless, and non-comprised either by nature, or by space and time. This Something is The One Who is hidden and above-mind. From Him it naturally starts the diverse godlike understanding[1150], one that elevates us again, and that turns us back through advices and understanding elevations, towards The One Who is hidden and above-nature and the beginning of all the realities.

[1149] The "sky of the quietude" is the ambience which lives in, the man who is spiritually advanced. Only in this state the kidnapping will take place. This is for the quietude is too, an undisturbed focusing of the mind towards God Who is endless in His beauty. But this is done through the work of the Ghost and in the same time with the mind's penetration within the heart, in the deep of the own being, after steadfastly leaving the scattering.

[1150] If we understand God in any way, it is for Himself understands Himself. He shares this understanding of Himself, to us too. He makes Himself, His understanding towards us.

And the mind unites so much with Him, that the mind understands that He is One; and the mind also know that He is impossible to be understood, in all aspect, regarding to what this One is. And about what is above mind and it escaped the understanding, what the word could say more? So, by the fact that the word cannot say anything more about This One, the mind will look at Him, speechlessly, and without words, in total silence, and unitarily, and above understanding, as to something hidden, and the mind will rejoice as of the Creator and of the Giver of all the realities. Also, the mind will wonder of Him as of The One Who is much more luminous, and much more kind, much more wise, much more powerful, and the mind will feel a godlike joy, by the fact that the realties which The hidden One - and Who is above-being - shows Himself through, are endless and borderless, and especially by the fact that He makes Himself known to the rational nature. But, by being the mind in ones like these, the mind won't reckon as appropriate to us and to string up words, by passing from one to another.

So, the one who doesn't use the silence, but he uses the speech, he isn't in the highest state of the mind. This is because the highest state of the mind, as the ones who value nothing more than they value the truth, they will affirm too, it is that of being the mind on the highest level of its work. And the highest level of the mind is that of looking at what is the highest, a looking which we say about that is done without sight (eyes), so that, even more so, without the possibility of being described in words.

46. The mind, by entering the all-godlike and unique hiding and without beginning and from on the highest top, without using the bodily sight, the mind receives there some kind of unseen, unique, and unitary, and full of a more than beautiful shininess, and more than luminous and untold, a wave that calls the mind, silently, in a depth of the wondering and of the awe and it fills the heart up with a spiritual work and with a sweet joy. This wave becomes to the mind as understanding luminous light, shininess, and godlike love, on the mind's measure, as also gladness spread in rays. It has its departure point into God, where all the good gifts are coming from (Jas. 1: 17), being us imparted with it, through the mind's cleanness, and having its content, as somebody would say, in the godlike unveilings of the Scriptures and in the creatures contemplated wisely and rightly, in quietude and in prayer. This is for the godhead's hidden and most-inward and above-understanding unity, it cannot be seen anyhow, but only in the unitary ray starting from there and that filles up, overwhelmingly, the understanding sight and contemplation. Not experiencing this, the one who ascends from outside and in rational manner, and through natural knowledge, towards the One Who is above-understanding and hidden and simple, that one won't receive the godlike work within his heart and he won't be enlightened in an understanding mode[1151].

Especially His above-nature understanding it exclusively belongs to Him. 'Into Your light, I shall see light".

47. The all-transparent, unique, and unitary sight of the mind that has reached into God, by penetrating into the one godlike hiding, and by receiving in a lightning of shininess, a godlike ray out of the without beginning and endless spring of luminous light, it doesn't ask only for the mouth's silence, but it also asks for the mind's silence. This is because of not being possible, even when the mouth keeps its silence, the mind to move inwardly towards something, and to move from a thought and from a meaning, to another, and to occupy itself with diverse things. These ones are the so-called inward word, which the mind that has been elevated at the shapeless and all-simple hiding of the godlike unity, it is far away from it. This is for, something else is the contemplation of the mind, and something else is, its inward movement towards, and its cogitation about something, which is one with the inward word[1152]. By being the mind in the created and composed realities, or which are diverse in other aspects, the mind firstly looks at them, and then it

[1151] The one who wants to reach the godlike One through rationality and by using the natural knowledge, and by stepping not on an inward path, but through reasonings upon the external things, he won't receive the godlike work within his heart, neither he receives the light of the above-nature "understanding" (non-sensitive). This is the rational "theology", one not reaching to experience God, but one that speaks about Him as about an external thing. The Byzantine Fathers and writers, they don't even call this as theology.

[1152] The inwards word or work, it is the cogitation's movement from a thing to another. By this, the cogitation won't reach into God, even if it occupies itself with God.

cogitates, by alternating its work. This is for the mind often finds out, in a single thing, not a few meanings[1153]. But in that godlike and all-inward hiding, unique and unitary, the mind raises and widens its seer (contemplative) eye, and it is illuminated by the simplicity of the godlike luminous light, but the mind doesn't move itself in a cogitation work. This is for, that unitary simplicity, it escapes the cogitation that passes from a reality to another, or it escapes the pleasure for variety; and the hiding doesn't allow to be said about itself, with the mouth, things the mind would think out of pleasure. Due to these reasons, the man, after he has bee understandingly elevated into the godlike extolled and unique hiding, he naturally keeps his silence, both with his mouth and with his mind.

48. When the mind, by turning, it wholly tends towards God, and when the mind's seer work it sinks in the all-shiny rays of the godlike beauty, and it ascends, without imagining, at the simplicity and the limitlessness of The One Who is hidden and imageless, and when the mind is made one with itself by its stretching towards and its looking at The One, under the breeze of the Ghost, the mind reaches in the manifest state of the little child, and the mind tastes the untold and above-nature Kingdom of God, according to the Lord's word: "If you do not turn yourselves and if you do not become like the children, you won't enter the Kingdom of Heavens" (Mt. 18: 3). This is for, then, the mind exits any connection and relation with any reality, being the mind elevated above the borders of the whole knowledge, or any kind of understanding, above any composition and diversity, and the mind is stretching itself towards The One Who is untold, and above-mind, and unknown[1154]. That's why, the mind

[1153] When the mind occupies itself with the created and composed realities, the mind firstly looks at them globally, and then the mind cogitates at them, by analyzing them. Usually, the mind, by looking at something, it embraces that something in its wholeness. Then the cogitation analyzes the elements and the composing aspects of that something, and so the mind is filled up with a variety of meanings by what is being singled out by its own knowledge, or by the self-knowledge, and it successively take the image of the meaning cogitated by the mind, one at the time.

[1154] The little child doesn't know about the implacable character of the natural laws, which impede him doing a thing or another. The little child lives his full freedom, by only knowing about his love for his mother. Likewise, the spiritualized mind knows only about its love for God. While sunk in the love that shines of the luminous light of the love coming from God, the mind has forgotten about itself, it has been elevated above itself, but in the same time, it has been made one with itself, and thus the mind has exited the self-forgetfulness, which the mind

naturally keeps its silence, due to its present state, a state that isn't only above-world, but it is also above the understanding work, a state which the mind is having in, The One Who is hidden and above-nature and imageless, together with His joy and sweetness, through an understanding impartation[1155].

49. The seers contemplate God in an imageless image, and in an above-light beauty, one immaterial and non-composed, in His all-simple face[1156]; the see The One as unitary, crown with countless good things, and adorned with countless splendors, and enlightening the whole mind with the rays of a shiny beauty; the mind contemplates the untold and impossible to tell happiness, the spring of the good things and of the beauties, the inexhaustible and always gushing up abundance, the above-fullness treasury, inexhaustible, and non-emptied, of the glory, which fills up, the eyeless minds, with a great delectation. This is for, out of that spiritual and above-nature unity, placed above all the realities in that impenetrable hiding, it springs out, mysteriously, joy, content, and clean gladness, in an always flowing river. Out of it, it is outpoured an unpassable and non-comprisable torrent of untold kindness, of unexplainable love, and of non-understood care, through a borderless power and through an untold wisdom. This is because these realities, as realities which are above-mind, they remain non-understood even by angels and seraphs. This is for, even the realities born within us, during the present time, in an untold mode, and which will be plainly shown in the future age, as through some kind of birth, and which will be done, they kidnap even the cherubs mind, though the cherubs mind only understand those realities in an overshadowed manner. O, the

is lost in, when caught up with all sorts of worries. The mind needed to come back to itself, in order its transparency to be penetrated by the luminous light of the godlike love.

[1155] The mind sunk in the luminous light of the parental love of God, it is above the understanding work, like the little child lives, in the bosom of his mother, his and her love, beyond any effort of understanding. The understanding has here the meaning of our usual understanding. But the author, by saying, immediately after, that the seers rejoice of the sweetness they are tasting it in the union with God, in an understanding mode, the understanding receives in the vision of our author, another meaning too: it is the simple understanding, one that doesn't try to understand more, because of being aware of the limitation of the present understanding. The "understanding impartation" it means here, also a non-sensitive impartation. It is a contact, an unmediated encounter with God, a receiving of Him within the soul, but not as a reality submitted to the bodily senses.

kindness, the counsel, the love, the mercy, the power, the 3wisdom, and the taking care from God! Truly "blessed are them, whose lawlessness has been forgiven, and whose sins have been covered" (Ps. 31[1157]: 1). And: "blessed is the man whom God will guide, and out of His law and out of the law of the Ghost will teach him" (Ps. 93[1158]: 12).

50. The realities unseen by the people living in the world, for they cannot receive the Holy Ghost (Jn. 14: 17), as the Lord said, are unveiled to the ones who love to withdraw themselves and to sit far from the world and from the things from the world. To those ones, it shined, through the godlike grace, the light of the understanding and: "the sunrise from the height" of the spiritual Sun (Lk. 1: 78) had opened the eyes of their heart and they have received help from God, in order to "put ascensions in their hearts" (Ps. 83[1159]: 6) and to be lighted by the rays which they see God through. Consequently, they are shown very clearly other many godlike and spiritual mysteries, worthy of the spiritual time. In addition to these, to the ones who live in a pious mode, it is unveiled their future state, worthy and without blemish, one that won't only be above senses, but it will also be above mind. This is for, then, they will be entirely changed, by reaching an above-mind state and an above-understanding delectation. They will delight and rejoice themselves, as some gods through work, before God Who is God by nature, of the above-nature good things. This is for, they will stay in a circle around Him and they will feast, in an all-holy and all-clean manner, the godlike and above-mind holyday, composing, together with all the well-ordered angelic groups, the celebratory and more than happy assembly, one full of that famous delectation and of good gladness.

Great and non-comprised is the flowing river of the clean gladness of the above-beauty gifts! This is because, if the seen beauty, that one made known to the mind through senses, it is limited and submitted to the division and that isn't either simple, nor uncreated, but still uses to produce, to the soul, a non-charmless delectation, it won't be difficult to the ones who have mind, and who take heed to the difference of plans, to know, and to understand, what they felt, if they would be in front of the beauties thought with the mind, but in the same time being above-mind, borderless, and imperishable, which spring out of God, out of Whom are all the good and beautiful realities, and which aren't either created or conceived – and this towards their joy and gladness, through the impartation with the godlike life and with that age's state.

[1157] In KJB we have: Psalm 32: 1. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[1158] In KJB we have: Psalm 94: 12. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[1159] In KJB we have: Psalm 84: 5: "Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee; in whose heart are the ways of them.; in ROB we have: Psalm 83: 6: "Blessed in the man whose help is at You, Lord; he has put ascensions in his heart". (E. l. t.'s n.)

51. The mind, by rejoicing of getting out from the lengths of the distances of space and time, and of getting out of their features which set borders, it truly empties itself, through the unitary simplicity and through the non-masterly and imageless life, which the mind is elevated at. And the mind steps above-being, without any cover and without any impediment, through non-understanding and non-speaking, in the land of the lack of beginning, of non-comprising, of limitlessness, and of infinity, spiritually moved by the godlike power and illumination from within heart, a power leading the mind towards limitlessness, a power extending together with the mind's seeing[1160]. Then rises in the soul the God's peace and the untold joy of the Ghost; and an impossible to describe gladness it is poured within the soul

[1160] All over the present writing, the author thoroughly explains the processes taking place within heart, when the mind, by entering the heart and by living within heart, through ceaseless prayer, it sees the endless light of God, and it is kidnapped by that light from all the worldly realities. All the authors' descriptions serve explaining the hesychast teaching and practice. We have here an original joining of Areopagite's influence and of hesychast preoccupation, or, in other words, the Areopagite's intellectual vision is being warmed up by a fiery feeling in hesychastic ghost. Only in the mind emptied of the ideas and of the images of the things, the godlike light can find a place to dwell. Only such a mind has become transparent to that godlike light, and able, through the regained limitlessness, to contain the godlike limitlessness. In order to achieve that, the mind must get out not only from the limited images of the things, but also out of the limitation of the distances of time and space, connected to the things' images. Thus, the mind liberated from all images, ideas, and spatial and temporal limited dimensions, it is not only empties, and so come back to its limitless depth and to its limitless width, but the mind is too, disrobed of the covers of those images, ideas, dimension, and addictions, which have been keeping the mind until now, inside some borders and impediments; and, but this, the mind has become transparent. The expression: "empty mind" has both the meanings: emptied and disrobed. In this sense, the mind shows itself to God, as emptied of any other content and non-covered, or transparent and open, in order to receive Him; the mind better stretches towards God, through the unique preoccupation with Him, manifested in the ceaseless prayer addressed to Jesus. And this prayer is done, by the mind, in the heart's ambience of feeling.

and an awe higher than the knowledge[1161] engulfs the soul, making the soul to sin, together with the Psalmist: not that "He will show Himself", but that "the God of the gods shows Himself in Sion" (Ps. 83[1162]: 8), namely in that mind that travels on the peaks and that watches from height. "Lord, God of the Powers, blessed in the man that hope in You" (Ps. 83[1163]: 13).

52. When the mind lingers in awe, enlightened by an indescribable and non-understandable presence, by seeing itself between God and the godlike realities[1164], the mind eats, if I could say so, the true fruits of the spiritual knowledge, and the mind stays under the deifying work, and it rejoices and it increases in love, by not saying and by not working anything, either inside or outside, and not even thinking, but looking with understanding[1165] and unitarily, in the light of the truth and of the Ghost and making out of the seen realities, an occasion for delectation, without passing from a thing to another.

53. When the mind's face, by bowing down inside the heart, it sees the light to the Ghost as springing out of the heart, in an eternal gushing up, then will be the time for mind's silence[1166].

[1161] The awe is higher than the knowledge, than the understanding. The awe sees more out of the God's reality than the knowledge or the understanding, because these last ones limit the perception of God, to their limited capacity of comprising.

[1162] In KJB we have: Psalm 84: 7. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[1163] In KJB we have: Psalm 84 ending with the verse no. 11; the verse mentioned in the writing isn't present in KJB; the verse no. 11 (the las verse of the Psalm 84) in KJB has the following content: "For the Lord God is a sun and shield: the Lord will give grace and glory: no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[1164] The mind "sees itself between God and the godlike realities", namely between the Giver and the gifts, here looking at Him, there looking at them, or looking, in the same time, at God and at them, as lacking their personal support. They have the whole value only by being gifts given by the godlike Person.

[1165] In that state, the mind doesn't speak and it doesn't carry on a discursive cogitation, but the mind still looks with understanding. That is an understanding above the natural cogitation and understanding.

[1166] The light of the godlike love, it is communicated to the mind as to an organ that knows through the heart, for the heart is the spiritual organ of the feeling. The heart loves, the heart received the God's love. But only a heart having within, the mind's understanding. A darkened, blind heart is carried away by the vehemence of some disordered feelings. But the love of God is luminous light. The mind's face, bowed down towards the heart, it is the mind's sight. Through this, the mind sees the God's love as a full of meaning light.

54. When the entire understanding face (of the mind) sees God, or, better said, when the entire mind reaches inside God, or, to say so, when God comes within the whole mind, then is the appropriate time to be silent[1167].

55. When the mind shows itself to God, by looking at Him wit the whole its understanding, for the mind is imparted with the Ghost, and when the mind rejoices of God's glory and of His face shininess, as much as the mind it is allowed to, it is due and it is very appropriate the mind to watch in silence and without disturbance. And if any sort of darkness cloud interposes between mind and God, you throw in that cloud, as a dreadful fire, a luminous and burning fire, a short word, but out of the godlike unveiling. Thus, by quickly banishing away, the darkness with the light, and the mist with the warmth, and by enlightening the whole mind and by warming it with that word, the mind will succeed in being again together with God, as before, and to look at God's beauty and to rejoice, as it is due, of Him, and to beautify itself with God's beauty and to experience, to say it briefly, the realities coming from God, through the understanding sight, in the same time with receiving the-life-maker Ghost. In the same time, the mind will succeed in becoming simple, and in detaching itself, into Ghost and truth, namely into God, from all realities, even from those around God[1168].

These things happen, as it is due, to the seer. But the one who is attached only to the doing, he need many things in order to reach this state, because of not being united with himself yet, and, through himself, with God. So, it is no wonder that, this one, he sings and he speaks in all ways, much and [1167] Then they meet one another, or, then dwell one into another, the two faces, or sights, or loving intentions. Then the mind feels, with a supreme intensity, the look or the loving intention of God, or it feels the whole pulsation of endless love, from God, we would say of God's heart. Then is the time to be silent, in order not to scatter this untold charm.

[1168] The author of the present writing constantly highlights the fact that the seer is elevated up to intuit God as Person, so that the seer doesn't stop at contemplating God's features as good things and values in themselves. If that was the case, this would be philosophy and not theology. Of course, God as Person doesn't lack His features and His uncreated energies. God is seen as their subject, or He is seen through them. But Himself is seen in them, and they aren't contemplated alone. And seeing God, it determines the mind to forget about them. When you see the beloved person, you see also that person's kindness, but you forget about kindness when looking at that person. The kindness is absorbed into person. In this sense, the mind must detach itself even from contemplating the realities from around God.

often, out of the godlike realities, frightening and banishing away, as through some ceaseless arrows, the one who hates us much and who angrily wages war to us. But the time of that one will also come, if the doer has patience, through the wave of the Ghost. Namely, when the shininess of the many hymns, songs, and godlike words, they will join in a great blaze[1169]. Then the one who prays will defeat the enemy more easily, by mortally wounding the enemy, namely by burning up and by tearing apart, and especially banishing away the enemy's darkness, and the one who prays will enlighten himself and he will warm himself up by this fire, which will move him towards the godlike love. In the same time with this, he will raise towards God, silently, a hymn of his heart and the whole his awe, he showing to himself the above-nature wonders of many mysteries. This is for, not unjustly, the one who suffer, they are blessed by the Lord. Actually, with the passing of the time, they will inherit, as ones who will become gentle, the spiritual land of the promise (Mt. 5: 5) into Christ our Lord.

56. When the mind, by being envelopes by all the luminous light outpouring of the Ghost, it gets dizzy and it no longer know what to do, and it sees itself extending and being transformed according to the One Who is endless and borderless, then it is the to be silent.

57. And when the mind feels tired because of the all-luminous views and the mind wants to express those in words, as weakening the strength of the experience, to find a little resting, it is the due time to speak (Eccl. 3: 7), of course, short words, and appropriate to the godlike illumination.

58. When, by running away through the middle of the waters, from that pharaoh, thought with the mind, the mind crosses through its night in a light of fire and its day under a cloud cover (Exod. 13: 21)[1170], then it is time for blessed silence and for quietude. This is for, then it truly starts the cleaning up of the soul. And when the thought with the mind grizzly Amalec, and the kinships following to that, they come against the monk, impeding the monk's crossing towards the Promise Land, then the time is right for speaking; but the mind must be upheld, in the mind's focusing towards God, by the understanding doing and by the due contemplation, as were yore the hands of Moses upheld by Aaron and Orr (Exod. 17: 12).

[1169] The deeds of the ones who are on the level of the doing, those deeds were reckoned in the hesychastic movement, starting with Gregory of Sinai, especially the singing and the reading of the holy books, unlike the ceaseless prayer of the mind within the heart, one reckoned as characteristic to the seers, of to the contemplatives. This was due to the fact that the doers were monks too, namely withdrawn from the world. Of course, the Christians living in the world, they are called also to do the good deeds of the patience, of serving and loving the people. The monks banish away the temptations brought by the enemy, especially through singings and readings. But the song and read words must be uttered with so much warmth of the faith, so that the hot and luminous sparks out of each of them, to grow up and unite in a ceaseless blaze of the love for God.

59. When is gushes up within heart, out of the endless depth of the godlike spring and out of the understanding sight, the spiritual power, that is due time for being silent. This is for, it is being done, in an untold mode, the holy religious service and the mind's worshipping towards God in Ghost and truth. And this takes place in a true understanding feeling[1171].

60. When, through the understanding looking towards God, the rational part of the soul is being filled up with a godlike awe, and the understanding power is being filled up with sight, and the soul is wholly filled up with joy, then is time to be silent. This is for the mind sees then, with good-feeling, the truth, in a concentrated manner, and the mind extolls, by worshipping - while being bewildered – God Who shines within the mind[1172].

[1170] At night, the monk gets rid of the unsee enemy through the water of the tears and he is being led towards the Promise Land of the union with God, through the fire of the prayer, and during the day, the monk is covered with the grace of the humbleness, in order him not to be defeated by the vain glory.

[1171] To the seen religious service and worshipping, brought to God, there must correspond also an unseen and wordless religious service (λατρεια) and worshipping. But in any religious service brought to God, the man encounters God. So, also in the inner religious service brought by the mind into the heart, it takes place this encounter. This is for, through the heart's altar, which the heart liturgizes at, the spiritual power gushes up out of the godlike abyss. Tis power catches the mind's worshipping and it offers that worshipping to God. What is being committed, it is so overwhelming, that the mind feels the need for being silent. This is a religious service offered by the mind, with an intense understanding feeling, like the seen religious service is perceived by the bodily senses. By committing the prayer within the heart, the mind is living, through understanding, a state of ceaseless worshipping. The mind is upheld by the "seeing" of God and by feeling God, namely by perceiving God through mind, which is different from perceiving the material things with the senses, but it is equally manifest like that one too.

[1172] The rationality, by no longer being able to function, it falls in awe, and the understanding becomes "seeing". The rationality is accompanied by awe in its judgments too, through which

61. The one who worship God in a due manner, in Ghost and in truth, and who serve Him as it is due, they not only don't' worship and serve in a certain place, but not even with uttered words. This is for, as the understanding feeling, by raising righteously, it no longer wants to worship the One Who is non-circumscribed, in a certain place, likewise, by attaching itself to what is required in order to remain in truth, it naturally no longer suffers to worship and to serve - The One Who is endless, borderless, without a beginning, imageless, consummately simple and, generally speaking, above-mind – by using diverse words and limited utterings. When, namely, the time has come for the mind to unitarily shine the knowledge of the godlike truth out of the breeze and the breath of the Ghost, while the mind generally detaches itself from all the realities and it goes out above itself, the mind no longer sinks only into speechlessness, but also in a blessed understanding, as one that occupies itself, joyfully and with awe, with the realities which are above-word and above-mind, which the mind contemplates in the understanding light, motionlessly and unchangeably, in an eyeless gazing, as one that has reached - through union – above itself.

62. The mind, by taking heed at itself, it must carefully guide its understanding state, thoughtfully, wisely, and with right-judgment. And when the mind feels itself as contemplating the simple and imageless mysteries of the knowledge of God, the mind will immediately have to stop, in quietude and in silence and in awe, but not far from its heart worked and illuminated by the Ghost. This is for, then it is the time not only for appeasing all the feelings coming from the realities usually submitted to the senses, but nevertheless will be the time for being silent of any undertaken speech. And, even more that that, then will be the time, for the ones whoa re on the level of the knowledge[1173], to indulge with occupying itself with the quietude and with the

it discovers new sides of the reality. All the more the rationality is being filled up with awe when knowing the whole concentrated truth. This is for the rationality sees in that truth, in the same time, all the sides, which the rationality would have seen them one at a time and separately. The mind has a sight too, as the body had. It is continuously affirmed the mind's contact with God, and not the rationally deducing Him from distance. This feeling has not only the meaning of perceiving, but also of sentiment, as the body's feeling hast it too.

[1173] The knowledge's level is one and the same with the contemplation's level.

understanding not-looking[1174]. This is because of needing a total motionlessness into senses, in words, and in understandings, in order the mind to attach itself to The One and Only, but Threefold God, freely and in a direct impulse, by unitarily and uniquely looking at God. By this, the mind will see, as much as it is allowed to, the endless, the without-beginning, the non-comprised, and, to say it briefly, all the other godlike features, unchangeable and absolute (detached from all realities), and the mind will be united with God, transformed through contemplation, and simplified, and wholly become in the godlike image, with the help of the grace and full of joy and awe. And for the mind would want to tarry in this state, if it was possible, but it cannot, because of being changing and because of living together with the changing realities, and because of being connected with the body and with the surrounding things, when falling, the mind must known and not to get too far from the unitarily seeing and not to speak too much, but to say only a few things and those to be about the godlike lights, so that, thus, the mind not only to be able to return again, easily, to the above-mind union with God, but to feel, even more manifestly and more steadfastly, the union with God. This is for, the more the mind will guard the gathering in itself and the non-spreading, the more the nourishing out of God it will bring the mind more quickly towards the godlike union, and the mind will be united with even more manifest and more fruitful glows, by ceaselessly habituating to the godlike realities[1175].

63. Once the mind has been changed, by experiencing the godlike showing through the understanding sight, and once the mind is overshadowed by the light of The unknown One Who is beyond all knowledge, the mind becomes undivided, simple, and borderless, by being unitarily enlightened like in a [1174] There is an understanding quietude, unlike the sensitive, exterior, one. But there is too, an understanding sight, unlike the sensitive sight. But both that quietude and that non-seeing, they have a positive meaning too. They are a quietude and a non-seeing which understand more than the inward disturbance and more than the rational sight, or, above all, the spiritual sight. This is because that unmatching is caused by an overwhelming light. And through non-seeing one can feel the intensity of that luminous light.

[1175] The mind cannot stay continuously in the ecstasy of looking at God. But when the mind falls off that ecstasy, then the mind must occupy itself with singings and with godlike words, in order the mind to be able to come again, easily, to that ecstasy state.

darkness[1176]. Then the mind contemplated the borderless beauty due to the overwhelming simplicity, that one imageless in order to exceed any image, that one without beginning and above any beginning, non-comprised, but comprising in itself the borders of all realities and everything that is bordered, and filling up all the realities as one that is above-fulness and it is endless[1177]. Shortly speaking, when the mind, by looking from above, it sees, by looking at The One, all the realities, on the untold ground of a understanding power that is above-understanding, it is the time for keeping its silence, and for being mysteriously and in a above-world manner - or, to say so, both without seeing and speechlessly – delighted with the impartation with the truth, through a godlike penetration into the truth. And when the mentioned aspects lack from within mind, and when the mind sees division around itself, then is the time for speaking, namely for speaking the word appropriate for leading to silence. This is for the above-word silence is better than any word, namely that silence very appropriately called as "the silence at its time", as Solomon said too, when placing this silence in the first place: "The time is to be silent" and then "The time is to speak" (Eccl. 3: 7). Actually, the best thing, and first to be honored, it is that of keeping the mind its silence at due time. And if this isn't present yet, and the mind still isn't unitarily in the above-world realities, let there be at least the second thing, namely the speaking at due time, for in his way, the speaking to be kindred with the silence and nigh to it. Thus, as the silence, likewise the [1176] The seemingly paradox of the "illuminating into darkness" it can be solved, if we take in account that this is the darkness of a too intense light, or the "supra-luminous darkness", as it was called by Dionysus the Areopagite. This darkness means too, the state of non-specifying into shapes, namely contemplating, in an undifferentiated manner, all the realties. That's why the mind can be plenary enlightened into that "darkness", for this darkness comprises all the meanings, or the meanings of all realities, and it comprises infinitely more than all the realities together. But the concentratedly comprised realities aren't differentiated in God Himself, through the understanding of an evolution, in the sense of that one thought by Jacob Böhme. They are differentiated only a created world, when God wants to created the it. In God there is another differentiation, actualized from ever: that of the Persons' Trinity.

[1177] We always are here in full Areopagite's terminology. Only in what is composed, there are limits of the component parts. Within the absolutely simple One, there isn't any limit. God is imageless, not because of being uniform or chaotic, but for He virtually comprises in Himself all the shapes, in such a consummate harmony, that they for an all-simple unit. In The non-comprised and borderless One, are comprised and are overwhelmed the borders of all realities. God isn't incapable of giving border to the realities He creates. If that had been the case, God couldn't have actually created the realities, but to His chaos it would have been corresponded the emanations' chaos.

speaking, let them be at due time, and let the speaking to strive to come back to silence. And this happens to the one who ceaselessly speaks and cogitated at the godlike realities, and who sees the creation as mirroring the Creator and as talking about Him. This means speaking at due time. But about these aspects, we must speak more detailed.

64. When the mind, by naturally crossing above all the realities from here, it embraces the silence, it is the time for delighting with the above-world and untold realities. This is for, it is the time form the illumination and for the understanding light, for the union between mind and sight, for the limitlessness, for the above-nature knowledge and, in short, it is the time for receiving the godlike wisdom and for being imparted with the godlike wisdom, which the mind is consummated through, in resting and in silence from all realities, by achieving the untold joy in awe[1178].

65. When the soul, by getting drunk with feeling the truth, as out of a too strong goblet of the grace, it feels himself as he would have left his mind, let the soul know that is the time for being silent.

66. When the inward man's mood feel that it must shout out: "Lord, how much got multiplied the ones who trouble me! Many are rising up against me" (Ps. 3: 1), then it is the time for speaking; it is the time for speaking in words as it is due, not vain things, but pondered words, against the enemies, as it should[1179].

67. When the light of the Lord's face it has been shed upon the soul, so that the soul is getting beautified and it is [1178] The awe is the above-understanding state of understanding, it is impartation above-word, in silence. As such, the awe doesn't mean the mind's paralysis, but it is a state of fulness, or of supra-fullness; it means experiencing the realities which cannot be known only with the natural mind, despite making efforts for knowing and understanding.

[1179] A too strong goblet means here a too strong wine. It is the too strong wine of the overwhelming truth. It is called the wine of the grace, for the truth is given to the mind united with God not by the mind's own power, but by grace, or as a gift. The mind is getting drunk of this overwhelming truth, by being filled up with enthusiasm. This truth isn't known simply intellectually, but it is intensely felt, for the mind baths in God's light, a light that is, in the same time, the God's love.

68. When the soul sees rising up unjust witnesses against himself, asking him about the things he doesn't know and disturbing him, it is the time for speaking, namely, it is the time for answering back against.

69. The highest good and, to say so, the good that is on top of all existing and thought realities, it is God. And in all the sees realities, the highest and the unmatched and the best according to the nature, it is the man. And by grace, the man is even above the angels. So, the seer's mind, by getting closer through the very many realities existing between God and people, to the One Who is above-understanding, the man will be filled up with fear, if he hasn't had plentifully the experience of the illuminator grace[1180]. But if the man has tasted, as one could say, out of the spiritual power that is working within heart, the man will be elevated at the highest good, at God, and the man enters God, through an even more godlike gift, and the man looks at God, unitarily, and the man is filled by awe, while silently dwelling in the above-mind depth. And this is, like one would say, truly the warranty of the first resting, one that has as role model the God's resting after creation (Gen. 2: 2-3)[1181]. And about the second resting, a higher and more enlightened one, having as image the resting ordered on behalf of the people of God (Hebr. 4: 9), the mind rejoices by turning back to itself, from God, and by knowing itself as image of the prototype (role model) and all the realties existing between God and man, as they are. This is for, then the mind not only reached the above-mind and the above – understanding realities, in a corresponding manner and in a wonderful awe, but it is filled up with joy, too, and not with any kind of joy, but with the spiritual joy, and the mind silently rejoices of the rays which show God, and the mind rejoices of the deifying works coming upon itself, and is being [1180] Between God and people, there are very numerous realities: the seen realities, the angels, the uncreated energies, and the features of God. Across all of those, and by getting through all of those, the man gets closer to God.

[1181] In the Greek text, this resting is called as "Sabbath-ism" (Sabbatismos), for the seventh day, which God rested Himself on, in Hebrew is called Sabbath.

united with the above-nature Unity of the godhead, into Christ Jesus[1182].

70. When the mind reckons that it has removed all the created realities, as they wouldn't existed, then the mind intuits, in an untold mode, the One Who truly exists, contemplating Him above any word and understanding union, into ghost and truth, through the endless raising above the godlike realities which are in connection with the existing realities[1183]. Then the mind becomes unitary, or one, to say so, and through this light, the mind passes under the mastery of the silence, in an untold mode. Also, the mind is filled up with love and with joy, and that isn't only a simple joy, but it is the delectation with the effects of the Ghost's work, one which the angels too, are partakers to.

71. As You are, Lord, non-comprised according to Your being, by anybody, and by any rational and understanding nature, or by any created knowledge, not even by that one of the cherubs, but You are outside and above, endlessly endless, to any knowledge, likewise, Master, are endless and borderless the realities from round You. That's why, through Your immeasurable taking care of us, You have commanded Moses, the lawmaker of the Old Testament, to herald You as The One Who Are and like The One Who called Himself as such. And again, You, the all-true One and the only Supreme Truth, You said about some people of Yours that You showed Yourself to them, but You didn't unveil them Your name. This is because You name is unparalleled and above any name (Philip. 2: 9), not only above any name on earth, but also in heavens. This is for the ones who are full with Your light, they describe You as a being, but without being them able to tell anything about Your being's content. So, they show You as above-being and as a support (subject) that cannot be understood. And You make Yourself known, manifestly, above-understanding and endlessly unknown, to all the ones who have the power of knowing You; and above them.

[1182] The man, by crossing through all realities, and by reaching at God, it finds the first resting. This first resting is the sinking in the God's depth, as into the consummate and endless Good. This first resting it has a model the God's resting after He created the world, or His turning back into His endless depth form the exist into the creation's deed. The second resting s the turning back of the mind to itself, but without exiting God. This is the second act of the resting. If the mind doesn't become aware of itself, the mind won't be able to fully rejoice of the resting into God. It is being highlighted here the preservation of the human person in his union with God. That's why, only know the mind fully rejoices of the union with God, by surrendering itself to this union while having the clearest self-awareness.

[1183] Between God and people, there are very many realities: the seen realities, the angels, the uncreated energies, and the features of God. Through all of those, and by crossing through all of them, the man gets closer to God. The mind makes a hypothetical abstraction not only of all the created realities, but the mind even exceeds the thinking at the godlike features and energies related to the created realities, so that the mind focuses on their divine Subject itself. And this isn't an intellectual act of the man, but it is a sight into the Ghost and truth, and above any work and above any union with the godlike features and works.

You sometimes show Yourself as consummately above time, without beginning, as being the limitless life itself, and as escaping any spatial understanding, and You are present everywhere in the same time, above all realities, as The One Who made all realities by Yourself. But You are the content of the understanding natures, and You are their impassable place[1184]. And You exceed the mind's quickness and thought, as The One Who is above all realities and the hand all-upholding all the realities, in a non-understood mode. You aren't submitted to the nature's borders, for You are borderless. This is for You are, in an above-nature mode, non-comprised not only according to Your nature, but also in the natural realities which are around You, as One Who are wisdom above wisdom, power above power, and love and kindness above the whole meaning of the love and of the kindness.

What somebody could name You like? Unapproachable light? But you are above light. Judge Who knows everything from before being done? But You are all-above any judge. Have we call You as Maker? But what kind of Maker are You, for You create through a simple inclination of Your will, the many and diverse material existences? But what could we say about the immaterial realities? O, what a depth exceeding everything! Through a simple inclination of Your Ghost, are produced all the spiritual realities, which are of one nature, but which are very numerous according to their dispositions, and, if you want, also [1184] "God is the content (περιοχή) of the rational natures and their impassable place", or unexplored. The spiritual beings aren't on a given place, and all the less is God. Although, God is the "garden" receiving all of them and the unexplored "place', which they are their steadfastness in, despite the fact that this "garden" and this "place" are infinite. Otherwise, who would have kept all of them together? They would have scattered and they would have been abolished it id hadn't been so. God is infinite, but He still constituted for them a "place" and a "land" keeping all of them in connection and giving them a "house". The God's infinity isn't a chaos, but it is a very well composed and steadfast and springing out the whole good composition, or of all structures.

according to their persons. And this is what is most wonderful, and what escapes, because of overwhelming any understanding, of whosoever cogitates. I wonder, are these ones characteristic to the Maker? Not at all. Should we call You as Builder and Craftsman? But what builder builds without a foundation, even the tiniest thing, as You did, Master, the so large earth, with so many mountains and rocks and other materials, and by founding it on nothing (Job 26: 7), and being the earth such a steadfast one? Or, what craftsman brings to existence the inexistent realities, and even in a moment and only with the word and so many and great things, as You have brought them to existence? So, by somebody saying that your things are those of a builder and of a craftsman, will him say what is due? By no means. For You are endlessly above a builder and a craftsman, o, God!

Then, who have seen, heard, or done, such a love as the all-illuminated one which, into Your kindness, You have shown it to us, by taking our nature with all the awful suffering You endured for us, above all hopes? The one who contemplated this fact, as much as it can be contemplated through the grace, they enter the widely open torrent of the love and of the wonderful taking care, and they reach totally outside themselves (in ecstasy), comprised, at their turn, by an overwhelming love for You. And they do not know what to truly and appropriately call like, the aspects of this oikonomia. This is for the aspects belonging to Your embodiment, they abundantly overwhelm the mind and the word and all the hearing and understanding, You the All-Good God. Are You and are You called as Father of all realities? But You exceed in parenthood, in untold mode, any mind, according to cause, to mastery, and to taking care, to advising, to long-suffering, and to lenience. Are you called as Emperor? Yes, and You equally are so, and not less for the present time and not more for the time to come, or for the time past. And how? Wonderfully, totally freely and simply. This is for Your Kingdom is the Kingdom of all ages together, of the present time, pf the past time and of the future time, and You mastery is from generation to generation (Ps. 144[1185]: 13).

Thus, in all realities and in all modes, You are placed infinitely above all realities, being You simply and freely beyond any imagination, and exceeding, to say it shortly, in any aspect, all the realities, both You, non-comprised Lord, and the realities from around You. The mind, by imagining these realities from around You, the mind has them as the soul's guide, towards seeing (contemplating) of You. And, by entirely receiving the instillation of the Ghost, the mind enters like a mysterious darkness, not being the mind able to see consummately You, because of the limitless and unapproachable Your glory. And for this reason, You rest them with an above-world resting, in an untold manner, on the ones who contemplate You and who love You, they wondering – but they not totally being outside seeing You – what is the reason why, You are resting them for[1186], You the untold One, You the non-understood One, You the limitless One, You the non-comprised One, and, in short, You the All-Unknown One, both according to Your being and to Your work. Amen.

72. When the mind moved away from the multitude of thought, by shaking off their diverse and much divided meanings, and thus the mind raises above the scattered cogitation, through the breeze of and the impartation with the Holy Ghost Who unifies the mind and Who ceaselessly blows in an continuous springing out (αεἰβλυτα) upon heart; when the mind enters the godlike places[1187] and it is crossed through and imprinted by the thoughts about God, and, through a understanding focusing, unitarily and in the same time, and with love, the mind mirrors all the realities existing around God, and then the mind achieves, manifestly, the godlike resting, by rejoicing of a deep and godlike peace, and of an endless and serene resting of the heart into Christ Jesus, our Lord[1188].

[1186] God rests the one who have reached into Him also for they do not see Him consummately, for they do not try to get out of Him in order to have a new experience, because of being bored after finishing to know Him; but also, for they aren't totally outside seeing Him, a fact that would determine them to make other efforts in order to reach to see Him.

[1187] The "godlike places". Each godlike meaning is a place, which the mind can deepen itself in, and it can be stabilized in. But, in the same time, each godlike meaning has diverse layers, or it can be seen together with other meanings, which can be reckoned as several "places" and a only one godlike 'place". But these places are also the diverse densities of the godlike energies, or of the God's presence through those energies, which the spiritual man reaches onto, by experience. Thus, it can be reconciled the affirmation from this paragraph, that the mind must enter "the godlike places", with the affirmation that the mind must be unified, by contemplating, in the same time, all the realities from around God.

[1188] The peace, or the resting, or the quietude, it has two reasons: the appeasing of the thoughts regarding the life within the world, which are equally numerous worries (Heidegger), and the

73. When the mind speaks to God and it prays, as a son prays his all-loving Father, and, by seeing the light of Jesus, the mind gladdens itself, overwhelmed and amazed by the godlike and above-nature love, and for it limpidly feels the work of the Holy Ghost within the heart; when the mind wants to fly mysteriously and in an above-world manner, above the godlike unveilings and consummation, then the mind truly stops itself from all its things, being elevated above understanding, after the mind has understood, and it is wonderfully sweetened, with the truly resting in the peace of the-life-maker Ghost of Christ[1189].

74. "God rested of all the things He started doing" (Gen. 2: 3); but only after the fulfillment (unfolding) of all the things done through Word and Ghost. Likewise, the mind in the image of God, it rests from all its things, which it started doing towards the completion of the thought (intelligible) world of the virtue; but only after the mind searched and steadfastly consummate in the Word of God and in the of-life-maker Ghost, the whole world and the meanings (the intelligible) from within the world, and after the mind ascended again from these ones, in the Word and in the Ghost, to the ones called by some people as natural, and after the mind has ascended to the mysterious, simple, and detached from all realities views, of the knowledge of God (of the theology)[1190]. This is for, by reaching the resting then, the soul overpouring within heart of the comforting from the Holy Ghost, of His fullness of love, one that overwhelms those worries, by consummately giving the soul everything the soul needs. The soul no longer feels the need for searching for something else, in order to comfort himself. This isn't a sentiment of emptiness and of tiredness, but of fullness.

[1189] It is being described here what happens within the hesychasts' mind, when, through the Prayer to Jesus, they see His light within their heart. The hesychasts didn't describe in a more detailed manner, this experience of theirs. Not even Saint Gregory Palamas, their defender, did it. Our author affirms here too, that, then they enter a quietude, a resting, a peace above any understanding. But he highlights here too, that this resting, or peace, or quietude, it is not given except when exceeding the contemplation of the God's features and energies, which He shows Himself through; that peace isn't given except when surpassing those realities and encountering God as the Subject of those features and energies. The author constantly highlights that the human person cannot find his resting except by encountering God as Person.

[1190] Here is being affirmed again that the mind doesn't rest in contemplating the natural features of God (infinity, kindness, righteousness etc.), as looked in themselves. These ones, as values in themselves, they have been called by some people as metaphysical (Aristotle). The mind doesn't rest except after ascending above these, in their godlike Subject, in the love of God as Person. Until the mind occupies itself with those natural features of God, the mind is being consummated through deeds in the virtues which the mind imitates those godlike tastes much resting and peace, by knowing the truth of the understanding[1191], and it is deified through the light of the knowledge and through the impartation with the-life-maker Ghost into Christ Jesus, our Lord.

75. When God was resting, He didn't rest from all things, but only from those things which He started doing. From the without beginning and uncreated and characteristic to Him by nature, He didn't rest. Likewise, the mind, by imitating God, after the mind searched into godlike Word and into the Ghost, and after the mind has crossed through the seen creation, it doesn't rest from the things characteristic to its nature, things having no beginning and no end, but the mind rests from the seen things, which begin and end. That's why, resting the body into motionless, a resting accompanying the one who has appeased himself, it is an opposite state to that of mind. This is for, if the mind hadn't entered, in a continuous motion, through a ceaseless breeze of the Ghost, in the contemplation of the seen things, the mind wouldn't have known if there is an understanding resting, one that turns in a ceaseless motion, and unitarily, only around God, a resting that deifies the one who is partaker to it, in an untold resting into Christ[1192].

features through. But the resting comes to the soul after the mind ascends beyond this endeavor of the doing that has as purpose the achieving of the virtues. Until the mind still has something to do, the mind won't rest. The resting comes after the soul has finished everything it has had to do, as a gift from the Word and from the Holy Ghost. Better said, in the Word and in the Ghost the mind worked in order to achieve consummation in virtues, and also in the Word and in the Ghost the soul finds the resting of this endeavor. This is for, in the Word and in the Ghost, there are the mysteries of the endless love of God, the simple mysteries, the mysteries detached from all realities, the mysteries of the true knowledge about God as Subject. This is for, what is simpler, what is more detached from anything, than experiencing the love from a person, especially when that Person is God, or than experiencing the supreme communion with persons.

On this way, one can say that the resting of God it coincides to the resting of each soul and, by and large, it coincides to the resting of all human beings who will be saved, at the general resurrection, and at the final judgment. This is because, until the souls are working in order to achieve this resting, God works too, within the souls. "Jésus sera en agonie jusqu'à la fin du monde" (Pascal). Besides, even the author here, he tells it in the next chapter.

[1191] The fully real truth isn't an object, but it is a subject. The object doesn't exist for itself, but for subject. Through subject, the object is lightened. And the supreme Subject is God.

[1192] The mind firstly searches and crosses through the creation into the hypostatical Word and into the godlike Ghost as Person, the mind understanding the creation in the supreme Rationality and Life, as its cause. But after this, the mind doesn't rest, but enter the accomplishing of the things regarding the mind's consummation, namely the things "characteristic to the mind's nature". These things are, in the same time, the works of God

76. "Do not hurry, says Solomon, to say something before the face of God; because God is in heavens, and you are on earth, down" (Eccl. 5: 1). By saying this, he very wisely and directly clarifies which is the time for being silent. Because he says: because you, despite you being down on earth, you are before the face of God Who is in heavens, and Who made you worthy of so much grace, so that you, the one from below, you can cogitate at and you can see the things from above, and, by entering them in an understanding mode, to stay in front of God - so, do not hurry to say a word; for that is the time to be silent. Aspire to be in an understanding mode[1193] under the work of the truth, unitarily and in a godlike mode. This is for, this means being in front of God, while the mind is contemplating, unitarily and in a simple and unique seeing into God, the many realities from around God[1194]. So, by experiencing this, and by standing in front of God, do not hurry to say something, unless you want, willingly and in an unskillful manner, to descend from there[1195].

But one can tell also the following thing, to the ones who try to explain the meaning of this word: There was a time when the human nature was intact, and, that's why, rightly so, the human nature was far from all bad things, and it was close to within the mind, which neither begin nor end. By this, the mind enters the contemplation of the things from within the world, namely the seeing of those things into God, or of seeing God into those things. Then the body rests. But the mind doesn't rest. The body's resting, equal to motionlessness, it accompanies the one who has been rested of the world's things. But the mind's resting equals a ceaseless motion, namely the mind doesn't consist of motionlessness, as the body's resting does. So, the motionless resting of the body it is contrary to the mobile resting of the mind. The ceaseless motion of the mind around God, it itself is a proof of the mind's resting into God.

[1193] "Experiencing in an understanding mode", "you to be in an understanding mode", namely not bodily. It is not here about understanding that state, though that state doesn't lack a certain understanding.

[1194] Here the author is explaining what the "face of God" is, which he spoke about in the head no. 55 too. This face is the presence of God as Person, intuited by mind through His works and features. The mind doesn't stop at these ones, as in case of reckoning them as standing by themselves. But the mind sees in them, in a spiritual (understanding) mode, or the mind feels God as Person through them, as looked at in His unity and simplicity, unlike the variety of His works and features. Even when living, through all the manifestations of a human person, their subject, you live their subject as a unitary and simple reality, though when starting describing him, the words are insufficient.

[1195] If you start describing the way you are experiencing the godlike Subject in, you will come down from that experience, to the speaking about His features. A resembling thing takes place when you start describing the subject of your fellow human. Immediately you have started that, you will exit the direct and intense intuition of him.

God, contemplating God and being delighted with gladness and with awe, by the glory of the beauty of His face, in our ancestor Adam, in an immaterial, understanding, heavenly, and incorruptible delectation. This is for much grace was overpoured within the soul of the first man and his mind, that was in a godlike manner, it was full, over the top, with many knower views and elevations towards God, rejoicing, in the seen Paradise, of the unseen (intelligible) Paradise, or, to say so, rejoicing of the happy life, for Adam's mind was united with itself and with God and it was tarrying into itself and into God, as it is due. Adam's mind was, namely, in a unified and resembling to God state, and it was totally deified. And thus, rightly so, since it has been created in the image of God. Behold, in short, the goods we have from God.

But the cursed devil couldn't stand that, because of being wounded with envy, and because of being the enemy of our lock and glory. And that's why, the perdition-monger, he was making all efforts to delude us and to deprive us of what we hoped for, by giving us so-called good advises, and by igniting our lust for a deification higher than the one we had, by slandering - the beginner of the evilness – the justness of the God's commandment. Out of that deceiving has come to us our pitiful perdition and we have been removed from God and from the godlike delectation; because of that we have fallen, miserably, form the spiritual living and from the unified mind and, so, from contemplating the face of God, and from being glorified and transformed through the ray of the spiritual beauty. And this has brought us to preaching many separated gods, instead of a threefold hypostatical godhead, namely we have fallen to worship the ones who aren't really gods, but they are deceitful demons, and perdition-mongers, and envious. So, we have lost The Actual One and the unitary life and order, and we have been broken in many and diverse parts; and our understanding power, as also its power of focusing, or, better said, its strength, they vanished, and not without reason; and we have fallen in the depth of an immeasurable evilness, and we have chosen, we who are the images of God and worthy of living above and heavenly, to recklessly thinking (Col. 3: 2).

But, given the fact that we aren't unchangeable and impossible to be budged, we can, happily so, as we have rolled down from the much glory to the lowest dishonor, to turn ourselves back again and to look upwards and to see the all-worshipped face of God. We no longer see His face as close as before Adam's falling, but we see it now from far away, but we still can see it and we still can experience the brightness of God's beauty.

So, the godlike Moses, and the entire group of the Prophets and the ones from before them, namely Abraham and the ones like him, they saw, as much as it was possible to them, very clearly, this beauty, and they were delighted, satisfactorily, with its shininess. But, because of being overwhelmed by God's unapproachable glory, some of them were crying for their unworthiness (Isa. 6: 5), others reckoned themselves and called themselves as dust and dirt (Gen. 18: 27); others, again, they weren't even capable of speaking because of the overwhelming greatness of the glory of the seen One, and they were rebuking their weakness and their cumbersome speaking (Exod. 4: 10). And many other blessed states they experienced in a worthy of being praised mode. That's why the godlike David, in love with the shininess of the beauty of the Lord's face, it shouts out towards God: "When will I come and show myself to the face of my God?" (Ps. 41[1196]: 2). And by wanting to show the state of his soul when seeing the face of the Lord, he says: "The righteous will dwell together with Your face" (Ps. 139[1197]: 13). And in order to wisely present the strength which the soul is given to, by the seen face of God, he says: "You turned Your face away from me, and I got troubled" (Ps. 29[1198]: 7). And if the turning away of God's face, it brings fear, it will follow that its showing, to the soul, and the soul's looking at it, it brings spiritual peace to the soul.

And this is an all the greater gift, as after the godlike love and joy, there are shown the charismas of the Ghost, or His fruits, which present the ones who live in holiness and awe, as walking in the Lord's light. That's why he says: "Lord, into the light of Your face they will walk and into Your name they will rejoice all day" (Ps. 88[1199]: 16) – of course, here is about the spiritual gladness, given that the understanding and untold Sun sends within the inwards man, unstained and of-life-maker His rays, and through this there start shining within mind, the realities from above world[1200].

Meanwhile, the whole soul's memory is elevated from on earth and it is moved to heavens[1201]. And the man rejoices and jumps up and, by singing hymns, the man stops and gladdens in so much joy, delectation, and satisfaction, as one cannot tell, and the man happily spread out of him, the shininess of the Lord's face. That's why the man prays, on one hand, to God, by saying: "Do not turn Your face away from me, in order I not to resemble to the ones who descend into grave" (Ps. 142[1202]: 7). This is because the turning away, of the Lord's face, from the man, it is cause for darkness, and the turning towards the man, of the Lord's face, it is cause of all the understanding light, and, rightly so, also of the spiritual joy. That's why he says about himself too: "It has been marked, upon me, the light of Your face", and he adds: "You have given gladness into my heart" (Ps. 4: 6-7).

And again, by confessing that the spiritual gift of the godlike grace has come to him out of the light of the Lord's face, and by asking himself: who are the ones staying before the Lord's face and worshipping Him, he answers: "The rich in understanding, of the people of God" (Ps. 44[1203]: 14), namely the saints and the people of God, who are many, but not all of them. This is because of not being all of them able to see the face of God and to live the angelic life, until they still are living on earth. This is for they still need more, in order to reach that. To this are partakers only the ones who reckon that it is due to serve God with godlike wisdom and with knowledge, and that it must be brought Him worshipping into Ghost and truth. Only thus could be called, appropriately, as "the rich ones of the people of God", as ones who are illuminated by the mysteries of many views and they have, as richness, the depths of the much-wisdom and of the godlike and spiritual knowledge, which, according to Paul, it

[1200] The Holy Fathers speak, by and large, about a "mind's feeling", or about "the understanding feeling". As we have often said, it means that the understanding or the mind, it doesn't relate, from distance, to the godlike realities, but it lives in their ambience, and it experiences them. This thing is said here, for it is affirmed that feeling God, by the mind, it is set in working by God's rays, or energies, which come within our mind or soul.

[1201] The mind no longer remembers about the earthly realities. The mind's memory has been moved to the heavenly realities. The mind remembers all the previous experiences it had with God.

[1202] In KJB we have: Psalm 143: 7. (E. l. t.'s n.)

is not had by many (1 Cor. 8: 7). That's why, the wonderful David says towards God: "And Your face will be worshipped by the rich ones of the people".

Solomon, by knowing this better than everybody, for he was full of wisdom more than everybody (3[1204] Kings 3: 12), and who has a special gift in teaching us, he says: "Do not hurry to s-peak before God, for God is in heavens and you are on earth" (Eccl. 5: 1). Namely, when you reach, by the godlike gift, in front of God, and when you are partaker to a godlike and unitary view, namely when the mind's sight raises up to there, it is time to be silent. So, do not hurry then to say not even one word, by vainly following your habit of speaking, because then it isn't the time for speaking. This is for, then, you too are being made god, while you still being on earth, for you are looking, like the angels, at the face of The God from Heavens.

Actually, the angels too, as the Savior said: "they always see the face of the Father Who is in heavens" (Mt. 18: 10). That's why, when you hear Solomon saying in another place: "To the righteous one it always springs out light from the face of the Lord" (Proverbs 13: 9), you think at the fact that they too experience this, like the angels do, by the godlike grace, by always looking at the face of the Lord, out of which it springs the light like from a spring. This is for the man can become and he can be an angel on earth, not to say another god, and he turns back to the gift of being in the image of God, by the grace of the Lord. Thus, you, by becoming down on earth what God is in heavens, namely god, do not tear apart this wonderful thing by uttering words, neither you pass from a meaning to another, by moving you cogitation, through a division of the understanding, but get yourself close, unitarily, and watch, like God does, eyeless and motionless, through a simple and unified sight, delighting yourself with the unapproachable and all-luminous shininess that springs out of the face of the Lord.
